SMITH, C. This is an appeal by the defendants Pausman from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage of defendant Mark Dallamore to plaintiff. The case is: Mark Dallamore, one of the heirs of the deceased Elizabeth Dallamore, and as such entitled to one-third of her estate, by writing of date November 18, 1901, mortgaged to the plaintiff his interest in a lot belonging to the estate, to secure his promissory note for the sum of $200, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per month, and for further security also assigned to him his whole interest in the estate, with power as his attorney to demand and receive the same from the administrator. Afterwards (it is alleged in the answer of the defendants Pausman), by an order of the superior court in which the matter of the estate was pending, the lot referred to in the mortgage was sold to the Pausmans by the administrator for the sum of $5,500, and, the money having been paid, the sale was confirmed by the court, and a deed executed to them by the administrator. Since then it appears there has been an order of final distribution of the estate, and there is now in the hands of the administrator, to be distributed to the heirs of the deceased, the sum of $5,009.50, being, it is found, proceeds of the sale; and of that amount one-third ($1,669.69) belongs to the defendant Mark Dallamore. The amount due on the note is found to be the sum of $200, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and costs of attorney's fees, aggregating $314.66; of which amount the sum of $280.26 (the aggregate amount less costs) is found to be a lien on the mortgaged land, and also "upon the money in the hands of the defendant (administrator) belonging to the defendant Mark Dallamore." The judgment is for the foreclosure of the mortgage, and for payment of the deficiency, if any, by the defendant administrator, out of the money of the mortgagor in his hands. No specific mention of the rights of the defendants Pausman is made in the decree or in the conclusions of law, unless it be that it is recited in the decree that they had appeared by counsel, and that it was ordered that "judgment be entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants" generally. But from the general terms of the decree it can hardly be construed otherwise than as foreclosing their rights. No briefs are filed on behalf of the respondents Dallamore, and the rights of the plaintiff will not be substantially affected by the result of the appeal, provided the sum due her is paid either by foreclosure, or out of the fund in the hands of the administrator. There is, therefore, no question as to the substantial rights of the parties. But some embarrassment arises from the indefinite character of the findings of the court with regard to the probate sale set up by the defendants Pausman. With regard to this, as stated above, it appears from the specific allegations of the answer that the land in question was sold to the Pausmans for the sum of $5,500, under order of the probate court; and that the sale was confirmed, the purchase money paid, and the deed executed and recorded. But the finding is simply "that the property was * * * sold at private sale by the administrator to the defendants Pausman" for the sum named; and the question is whether this is to be construed as an affirmative finding upon the issues presented. If so, we think, the judgment should be modified; otherwise there is an entire absence of findings upon the defense presented in the answer, and the judgment should be reversed on that account. The question is, therefore, immaterial except as affecting the form of the judgment to be rendered here. On this question it is assumed by the counsel of both parties in their briefs that the finding is to be construed as above indicated; and, comparing it with the other findings and the answer, this, we think, is the correct position. For, properly speaking, to say that the land was "sold" by the administrator is to say that it was sold under the order of the court, for in no other way could the administrator have sold it. And that this was what was intended by the court is indicated by the reference to the administrator's petition for sale immediately preceding, and also by the findings as to the payment of the purchase money, and its distribution by final decree, and as to the lien of plaintiff on the mortgagor's share of the money in the hands of the administrator; from which it is also to be inferred that the sale was confirmed and the deed made as alleged. Nor is it to be presumed unnecessarily that the court did not intend to find upon the issues presented. We are of the opinion, therefore, with the counsel of both parties, that the findings are to be construed as indicated.

Upon this assumption the position of the appellants is that under the provisions of section 1555 of the Code of Civil Procedure the title acquired by the Pausmans related back to the time of the death of the decedent, and conveyed her title as it then existed; from which it would follow that the interest of the mortgagor in the mortgaged premises is now vested in the Pausmans, free of the lien of the mortgage. The contrary is claimed by the respondent on the authority of the decision in the Estate of Packer, 125 Cal. 396, 58 Pac. 59, 73 Am. St. Rep. 58, and upon the principle asserted in Brenham v. Story, and other cases cited, that the title of the heir becomes vested upon the death of the ancestor, subject only to "liens of creditors, * * * expenses of administration, and the temporary right of possession of the administrator." The position assumes that the provisions of section 1536 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1893, in so far as they authorize a sale "for the advantage, benefit, and best interests of the estate," are unconstitutional. It was so held in the Estate of Packer, supra, as to titles vested prior to the date of the act, but the decision was limited to such cases; and the question of the validity of the section with reference to titles of heirs vesting after the amendment took effect is expressly left untouched. Nor do we think it necessary to determine it in the present case, for it appears from the findings that the sale was in fact made for debts and expenses of administration; and, though the aggregate of these was small compared with the value of the property sold—which was a city lot—we cannot inquire as to the propriety of the action of the court in ordering a sale of the whole of the lot instead of a part only. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the contention of the appellants on this point should be sustained, and that their title must be regarded as vested as of the date of the death of decedent, as provided in section 1555 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It follows that the judgment of foreclosure was erroneous for the double reason that the interest of the mortgagor has become vested in the appellants free of the lien, and that —there being no longer any interest in the mortgagor to be sold—a sale would be an idle act. Civ. Code, § 3532; Toby v. Oregon Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 495, 33 Pac. 550; Merced Bank v. Casaccia, 103 Cal. 641, 37 Pac. 648; Savings Bank v. Central Market Co., 122 Cal. 33 et seq., 54 Pac. 273, and authorities cited.

It is, however, found by the court that the plaintiff has a lien on the funds of the mortgagor in the hands of the defendant administrator; and for the purpose of securing the amount due her she is the assignee of the mortgagor's interest therein, with power as his attorney to demand and receive the same. She is therefore entitled to recover of the administrator, payable out of the share of Mark Dallamore in said estate, the amount due her, with costs as found by the court, and it should be so adjudged. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1666, 367; Curtis v. Schell, 129 Cal. 208, 61 Pac. 951, 79 Am. St. Rep. 107; Martinovich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 354, 70 Pac. 459. The defendants Pausman are entitled to their costs in the lower court.

We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to modify the judgment as indicated in this opinion, and that the judgment as thus modified shall stand affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to modify the judgment as indicated in this opinion, and that the judgment thus modified shall stand affirmed: VAN DYKE, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.

CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL — REVERSAL — JUDGMENTS—DIRECTIONS—ERRORS—SURPLUSAGE —PROCEEDING BY TRIAL COURT.

1. Where on appeal in a criminal case it was held that the information was insufficient, and the trial court, on reversal, was directed "to sustain the demurrer" thereto on the erroneous assumption that the objection was raised by demurrer, when in fact it was raised by motion in arrest, the direction to sustain the demurrer should be treated as surplusage by the trial court, which should enforce the judgment by dismissing the information.

In Bank. On rehearing. For former opinion, see 76 Pac. 1127.

BEATTY, C. J. The opinion delivered by the court in deciding this case is reported at page 1127, 76 Pac. After the remittitur had been regularly issued our attention was called to the fact that we were mistaken in stating that the defendant had demurred to the information; his objection having been raised, not by demurrer, but by motion in arrest of judgment. As a result of this mistake, we added to the judgment of reversal and order remanding the cause a direction to the superior court to sustain the demurrer. A motion is now made for an order recalling the remittitur and revising the judgment upon the ground that the superior court cannot follow the mistaken direction to sustain a demurrer which has no existence; and cannot, therefore, do anything further in the case.

There may be a question of our power to recall a remittitur issued under the circumstances of this case, but this is a question which it is unnecessary to decide; there being nothing to prevent the superior court from proceeding as it could and ought to have proceeded if the direction to sustain the demurrer had been omitted from the order remanding the cause. The direction is no part of the judgment, and was wholly unnecessary; the judgment itself being a sufficient guide to the superior court in its further proceedings. There is no difference between a motion in arrest of judgment and a demurrer based upon the same grounds, except the time at which the objection is interposed, and the effect of sustaining the motion is the same as the effect of sustaining the demurrer; i. e., the information or indictment must be dismissed. Here the grounds of the decision and the judgment of reversal, if they had been followed by no specific direction, would have required a dismissal of the information, accompanied by such order or direction as to the filing of a new information as the superior court may have deemed proper. The direction, therefore, which is no part of the judgment, and was wholly unnecessary, may be treated as surplusage. The court cannot obey it, because there is no demurrer, but it can dismiss the information, and it can make all other proper orders called for in that connection.

The motion is denied.

HOOPER et al. v. FLETCHER et al. (S. F. 2,890.)

OLMO et al. v. SAME.

NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION OF COURT—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—MECHANICS' LIENS —ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. The order of the trial court granting a new trial will not be disturbed on appeal unless an abuse of discretion in making the order clearly appears.

2. Where the only question raised by the answer of the landowner in an action to enforce mechanics' liens is decided in his favor, it is improper to impose a lien on his land for attorney's fees in addition to the balance due on the contract, unless the answer was interposed to delay and harass the lien claimants.

3. In an action to enforce mechanics' liens, the court found that the landowner "participated in the trial, and entered into a contest in favor of certain lien claimants and against certain other lien claimants, and generally contested as to the disposition of the fund deposited as the balance due on the contract, and delayed and harassed the lien claimants in the collection of their claims out of the fund," and imposed on such owner additional attorney's fees. Held, that the question disposed of by the finding was properly before the court, and presented an issue of fact, the determination of which is reviewable on a motion for a new trial.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Two actions, one by S. A. Hooper and others against L. N. Fletcher and others, and another by Frank Olmo and others against L. N. Fletcher and others, which were consolidated and tried together. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs and certain defendants, and on motion of defendant Simas a new trial was granted, from which certain parties appeal. Affirmed in part.

Wickliffe Matthews, William H. Jordan, Wilmer Muma, Richard P. Henshall, Barna McKenna, C. L. Dam, J. S. Macks, and William Tomsky, for appellants. Stafford & Stafford, W. F. Sawyer, Daniel C. Deasy, and Hu Jones, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. These are consolidated cases brought to foreclose mechanics' liens against a house and lot of land on which it stands owned by the defendant Henry Simas. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs and certain defendants and cross-claimants, but afterwards a motion of defendant Simas for a new trial was granted, and from the order granting the new trial certain parties have appealed.

Simas, the owner of the land, entered into a written contract with the defendant Fletcher for the construction of the house in question for $2,050, payable in four equal installments. The appellants are persons who furnished labor and materials for Fletcher. Simas made the first two payments, but retained the last two, amounting to $1,025, and this last-named sum was the only amount in which he was liable to the lienholders, provided the said contract with the original contractor, Fletcher, was a valid one under the mechanic's lien law. The contract, in form and substance, was in compliance with the law; but it was averred in the complaints that it was void because it had not been recorded, in which event the lienholders would be entitled as against Simas to the full amounts of their liens, which greatly exceeded the said $1,025. Simas answered, denying that the contract had not been recorded, and averring that it had been so recorded and was a valid contract. This was the only issue he made in his answer. He admitted that he had the said $1,025 in his hands, averred his readiness to apply it to the payments of the liens, and that he had paid it into court, and asked the court to determine the shares of each lienholder in the fund, and that his property be released from the liens. He had not then in fact paid the money into court as averred, but he did so before the trial. The court found in his favor as to the issue of the validity of the contract with Fletcher, that it had been duly recorded, and was a valid lien, and that "the amount of the contract price that is liable to the liens and claims of plaintiffs and defendants who are cross-complainants herein is the sum of * * * $1,025, and the said property is subject to said liens for said sum." But the court found in finding 12 "that said defendant Henry Simas answered to the complaints of plaintiffs and cross-complaints of defendants herein, and participated in the trial herein, and entered into a contest in favor of certain defendants and lien claimants and against certain other defendants and lien claimants, and generally contested as to the disposition of said fund so deposited, and delayed and harassed plaintiffs and defendants, who were lien claimants, in the collection of their claims out of said fund." And the court decreed that, in addition to the said balance of $1,025 unpaid on the contract price, there should also be a lien on the said premises of Simas for a large amount of attorney's fees amounting to $500, and also interest on the $1,025 from January 30, 1900, which was the thirty-fifth day after the completion of the building; and judgment was so entered. Defendant Simas moved for a new trial on various statutory grounds, and, among others, the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and specified its insufficiency to sustain the finding 12, above quoted. The court granted the motion for a new trial, but had made a previous order to the effect that such motion would be granted unless within a stated time "counsel fees and interest are remitted," which was not done. From this order granting a new trial this appeal is taken.

Of course, the general rule is that the order of the trial court granting a new trial will not be disturbed here unless an abuse of discretion in making the order clearly appears; and we see no such abuse in this case. The court was clearly warranted in holding that the said finding 12 was not supported by the evidence, and upon that finding alone could the lien for the attorney's fees be sustained. As to the only question which the respondent Simas raised by his answer he was the prevailing party, and there was no ground for imposing a lien on his land for these onerous attorney's fees, in addition to the balance due on the contract, unless the facts found in finding 12 were true. That finding was obviously made in view of the decision in De Camp Lumber Company v. Tolhurst, 99 Cal. 631, 34 Pac. 438, which was a mechanic's lien case, and in which the court said that: "The appellants, however, retained the money, and apparently without cause or right raised a contest on every point, and fought the case through to the end. By so doing they delayed the respondents in recovering money to which they were justly entitled, and put them to unnecessary expense. Under such circumstances, we think the respondents' costs and attorney's fees were properly allowed and made payable out of the proceeds of the property ordered to be sold."

Appellants contend, however, that the question whether the attorney's fees were properly allowed was a pure question of law, and could not be reached on a motion for a new trial. The position taken is that there can be a new trial only on an issue of fact; that, under former decisions, the trial court may award attorney's fees in a mechanic's lien case whether or not there is any averment, or prayer, or traverse on that subject in the pleadings, and may allow such fees in excess of the amount prayed for; that, as pleadings on the subject are not necessary, there can be no issue of fact involved; and that, therefore, finding 12 is outside of the issues, and should be entirely disregarded. In answer to this technical point of view it might, we think, be properly said that, as appellants made no such point in the court below or in the proceedings on motion for a new trial, they are equitably estopped to raise it here for the first time. But however that may be, we think that the question disposed of by finding 12 was properly before the court for adjudication, and presented an issue of fact the determination of which is reviewable on a motion for a new trial. It is true that issues of fact are generally raised by specific averments and denials in the pleadings; but in a case like the one at bar the law imposes upon the court the duty of determining whether attorney's fees should be allowed, and, if so, for what amount; and upon this question each party has the right to introduce evidence. It cannot be said, therefore, that a finding of fact as to attorney's fees is really outside the issues in the sense that it has nothing to do with the case and is to be totally disregarded. The law itself brings the question of attorney's fees into the case for adjudication, and when, as in the case at bar, the court makes a finding of fact on this subject, which finding is necessary to the support of the judgment, such finding, like any other finding of fact, is reviewable on motion for a new trial. Under these views it is not necessary to inquire if the alleged error of awarding interest can be reviewed on the motion here appealed from.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

On Rehearing.

In Bank.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing is denied. The opinion and judgment heretofore rendered herein is modified by striking out the concluding sentence of the opinion and the mandate, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

We are of the opinion that the defendant was not liable for interest or costs. The order granting a new trial is affirmed, so far as it grants a new trial upon the issue as to attorney's fees. In all other respects said order is reversed, and the cause is remanded for retrial solely upon the issue as to attorney's fees and costs; the respondents to recover costs of appeal.

ELLIOTT v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (S. F. 2,988.)

CARRIERS — PASSENGERS — TICKETS—VALIDITY —TIME LIMIT—DEFAULT OF CARRIER—FRAUDULENT CONCEALMENT—REMEDY OF PASSENGER —EJECTION FROM TRAIN.

1. In an action against a railroad for the wrongful ejection of a passenger, evidence held insufficient to support findings that the conductor received plaintiff's ticket as entitling him to travel, or without notifying him that it was of no value, or that plaintiff intimated in any way that he would pay his fare or present a valid ticket if the ticket which was taken up should be returned.

2. Where a railroad sold special excursion tickets limited to three days, which expired on July 6th, and could not be used within the prescribed time, owing to a strike and interruption of train service, an extension of the time limit for six days from July 13th was a reasonable period of extension; nor was it rendered unreasonable, as to a particular passenger, by reason of his having no occasion to use his ticket until August 13th.

3. A railroad may limit the time within which a ticket sold at reduced rates may be used.

4. The fact that a railroad which sold limited return-trip tickets failed, owing to a strike, to carry the passengers on the return trip within the period prescribed by the ticket, and thereby put them to the trouble, inconvenience, and expense of returning by other means, while it might give rise to liability for damages proximately caused by its failure to perform its contract according to its terms, did not give the passengers the right to enforce a passage under the original contract, and on another journey taken by them within a reasonable time subsequent to the time specified in the contract.

5. Fraudulent concealment by a railroad company of the fact that it might not be able to carry a passenger on his return trip within the time prescribed in a ticket which is sold to him does not give the passenger a right to use the ticket at a time subsequent to that limited in the contract, and thereby make a new and different contract.

6. Under Civ. Code, § 1568, providing that consent to a contract is deemed to have been obtained through fraud only when it would not have been given, had fraud not existed, concealment by a railroad ticket agent of the fact that the railroad might not be able to return a passenger within the time limited by the ticket sold him is not such a fraud as to vitiate the contract, where it is not shown that, if the passenger had known the fact so concealed from him, he would not have purchased his ticket.

7. A statement by a railroad employé, two days after the sale of a ticket, that it would be good as soon as trains began to run, was not a waiver of the time limit on the ticket, where the employé making the statement was not the one who sold the ticket, and he was not shown to have any authority to make the waiver.

8. Under Civ. Code, §§ 487, 2188, providing that a passenger who refuses to pay his fare or exhibit or surrender his ticket when reasonably requested so to do may be ejected, a passenger who exhibited a limited ticket, which had expired and was void, and refused to pay his fare, was properly ejected, although the conductor wrongfully retained the void ticket presented by the passenger.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Samuel W. Elliott against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. A. Moore, for appellant. George Lezinsky, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $700, and from an order denying its motion for new trial. The action was for damages alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff by reason of his alleged wrongful and forcible expulsion from a train of defendant on August 13, 1894, on which train, it was alleged, the plaintiff was a passenger. The case was tried without a jury.

The record shows the following facts: On August 13, 1894, the plaintiff boarded defendant's train at the Oakland Pier, Alameda county, for the purpose of being transported thereon to Pleasanton, in the same county. He presented to the conductor for his passage on such train a round-trip ticket, "From Pleasanton to San Fran. and return," which he had purchased from defendant's ticket agent at Pleasanton on July 3, 1894, at a reduced rate, to wit, one fare for the round trip, viz., $1.10, and which he had used on July 3d in traveling from Pleasanton to San Francisco. This ticket was distinctly marked upon its face, "Void after July 6, 1894," and this limitation, and the fact that the ticket was sold at a reduced rate, were known to plaintiff at the time he purchased the ticket. The conductor at once handed the ticket back to plaintiff, informing him that it was no good; that it had expired. The plaintiff told the conductor that he thought he was entitled to ride on it; that he had bought and paid for it; and that it was no fault of his that he had not ridden on it. The conductor then left the plaintiff, but, returning presently, said, "Let me see that ticket," and, upon plaintiff handing it to him, said, "That is no good," and put it in his pocket. He further said, "You will either have to pay your fare or get off the train at San Leandro." Plaintiff said, "Then give me back my ticket." The conductor said, "Well, I will look out for that ticket." When near San Leandro, he returned and said, "Now you will have to get off here or pay your fare." The plaintiff said, "I don't propose to do either until you give me back my ticket." The conductor said, "I will take care of the ticket. You will have to get off the car." The plaintiff said, "I don't propose to do either." The conductor said, "I will put you off," and plaintiff said, "Bring your crowd." The foregoing statement as to what took place on the train is from plaintiff's testimony, and is as favorable to him as any of the evidence given. The plaintiff forcibly resisted all attempts to eject him, and was by means of force ejected by defendant's servants from the train, but no more force or violence was used than was reasonably necessary to effect the ejection. "Neither his [plaintiff's] bodily suffering nor his mental suffering were very great, nor were his bodily injuries serious."

The foregoing statement of facts is in accord with the findings of the court, except in so far as certain findings may be capable of being construed as showing that the conductor received the ticket as in any degree entitling plaintiff to travel, or without notifying plaintiff that it was of no value and that he could not honor it, or that plaintiff intimated in any way that he would pay his fare or present a valid ticket if the other ticket should be returned. In so far as the findings may intimate any of these things, they are not supported by the evidence, as is fully shown by plaintiff's testimony on this subject, which has already been stated. The case in this respect is simply one where the conductor repudiated as absolutely void, and expressly refused to honor for passage, a ticket that was absolutely void, but, after so expressly refusing to honor it, nevertheless took it into his possession and retained it.

It was further found by the court substantially as follows: From July 5, 1894, to July 13, 1894, defendant, notwithstanding its desire and attempts to operate its passenger trains between Oakland Pier and Pleasanton, was absolutely prevented from doing so by the forcible violence of a large body of men; the trouble having been caused by a "strike" of "engine firemen in its employ." On July 5 and 6, 1894, it did not operate any of its ferryboats between San Francisco and Oakland Pier. It did, however, operate a ferryboat between San Francisco and a place in Oakland near a station on the railroad from Oakland Pier to Pleasanton. On both days, the plaintiff went to the proper place in San Francisco for the purpose of taking passage, and learned that defendant was not operating its boats or trains. He however, on July 6th took passage on the ferryboat running to Oakland, using his ticket for that purpose, and, having arrived at the landing place in Oakland, proceeded upon his journey to Pleasanton, where he arrived the same day, walking a part of the way, and riding the remainder of the way upon conveyances not operated by the defendant. Train service was resumed on July 13, 1894, and defendant, by its order to its conductors, extended the time within which plaintiff and others similarly situated might use tickets of like character for return passage about six days, which period elapsed in the month of July, 1894, but the fact of such extension was not communicated to plaintiff. The court further found that such period of extension was not a reasonable period; that the first opportunity that plaintiff had of using said ticket for transportation between Oakland Pier and Pleasanton was on August 13, 1894; and that this was a reasonable time within which to use the same. These findings are attacked as not being sustained by the evidence, and the attack is, in our opinion, well founded. Six days was twice the original life of the ticket, and certainly much more than sufficient to enable one who had come from Pleasanton to San Francisco upon such a ticket to make his return journey. August 13th was not the first opportunity that plaintiff had of using said ticket, for the train service had been resumed on July 13th, and continued uninterrupted thereafter. The only basis for a finding that August 13th was the date of plaintiff's first opportunity to use the ticket is the evidence of plaintiff that after July 6th he was not again in San Francisco or Oakland until August 13th; in other words, that he did not again have occasion to go from San Francisco or Oakland to Pleasanton until that time. This cannot, in a case of this character, be the criterion as to what was a reasonable time or the first opportunity. The court further found that, at the time defendant sold the ticket to plaintiff, it knew, or had good and sufficient reason to know, from facts and circumstances then existing and within its knowledge, that it would be or might be unable to transport plaintiff upon said railroad on July 5th or 6th; that it did not communicate these facts and circumstances to plaintiff; that plaintiff did not know thereof; and that, if he had known thereof, he would not have purchased the ticket. There is absolutely no evidence to sustain the finding embraced in the last clause. The court also found that, in selling the ticket under such circumstances, the defendant committed a fraud upon plaintiff. The plaintiff testified that on July 5th, when at San Francisco, he found that the trains were not being operated, he asked a man who was stationed at the ticket window of defendant to give him his money back. The man told him that his ticket was good until the next day, and, in response to plaintiff's inquiry as to what would happen if the trains were not then running, said: "It will be good when they do start." It further appears that on August 13th plaintiff, in San Francisco, purchased a ticket from San Francisco to Pleasanton, which, however, he never showed or offered to the conductor.

The foregoing statement presents all the facts necessary to a discussion of the legal questions involved.

There can be no question as to the right of a railroad company to limit the time within which a ticket sold at reduced rates may be used. As has been said, the passenger, by accepting and using such a ticket, makes a contract with the company according to the terms stated, and the reduction in the fare is the consideration for the contract. The passenger cannot take advantage of the reduction of the rate, and reject the terms on which alone the reduction was made. See 1 Fetter's Carriers of Passengers, §§ 285, 289; 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1598, and cases cited therein. Plaintiff's counsel, recognizing this now well-settled doctrine, admitted on the trial that defendant had a right to limit the ticket; that, under ordinary circumstances, the ticket in question would have expired on July 6th, and that, if on July 5th and 6th defendant had been ready to carry the plaintiff, he would have had no rights under the ticket if he had failed to avail himself of the opportunity to be transported according to its terms. It is, however, contended that the inability and failure of the defendant to perform its contract of carriage within the time limited extended the time, and gave to the plaintiff the right to demand performance "at a reasonable subsequent time," and also that the limitation was void by reason of fraudulent concealment by defendant of facts and circumstances which it knew or ought to have known at the time of the making of the contract, and which it failed to communicate to plaintiff, and that therefore plaintiff was entitled to use the ticket within a reasonable time, "the same as if no such limitation was set upon the ticket at all." We know of no principle of law or decision of any court that would warrant the application of these suggested rules to the circumstances of this case. The contract on the part of defendant railroad company was that it would, in consideration of the $1.10 paid, not only carry the holder of the ticket from Pleasanton to San Francisco, but also carry him back from San Francisco to Pleasanton, on any day not later than July 6th. Under its terms, the holder was entitled to be transported by the railroad company when he presented himself for passage on July 6th, the last day of the life of the ticket. The company failed to perform the obligation imposed on it by the contract, and it may well be that this failure on the part of the company constituted a breach of contract on its part, and that it became liable to the holder of the ticket for all damages proximately caused by such breach of contract. Defendant being unable to perform its contract, the holder of the ticket thereupon made his return trip to Pleasanton without the aid of the company and by other means. He thus completed his journey and measured his damages. Whatever damages were caused by the failure of the railroad company to carry him back on or before that day had then accrued, and his cause of action against the company by reason of the breach of contract was then complete. It had failed to perform its contract to transport him from San Francisco to Pleasanton, and could not thereafter perform it according to its terms. The railroad company had never undertaken to carry him on any other journey than that for which the contract was expressly made, and no such liability could be imposed upon it in the face of its express contract to the contrary. The plaintiff could not, because of the failure of the railroad company to perform its contract, make a new contract for the company. This was not his remedy for the breach of contract. The law gave him a full and adequate remedy by way of action for damages for such breach, and this, under the circumstances of this case, was his sole and exclusive remedy.

In this connection, it would seem entirely immaterial whether or not there was any fraudulent concealment by the company at the time of the making of the contract of facts from which it might be inferred that it might not be able to fully perform the contract according to its terms. Such concealment could not operate to make a new contract between the parties. For it, if it existed, the law gave plaintiff certain remedies, but the making of a new and different contract by him alone was not one of them. The record, however, does not show that plaintiff's consent to the contract was induced by any fraudulent concealment. The finding to that effect in response to the issue made by the pleadings finds no support whatever in the evidence. By express provision of our Civil Code, consent to a contract is deemed to have been obtained through fraud "only when it would not have been given had such cause not existed." Section 1568. See, also, Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 351, 399, 23 Pac. 16, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137. So the question as to the effect of fraud is entirely eliminated.

It has been frequently said, in effect, that a limitation as to the time within which the passage contracted for must be made must, in view of all the facts and circumstances existing at the time the contract is entered into, be reasonable, and that, if it be unreasonable, the passenger, availing himself of the first opportunity to complete his journey, may so complete it under the contract, although the time stipulated therein has expired. But the rule here suggested, we are satisfied, goes no further than above stated. Thus, in 2 Wood's Railway Law, 1403, the instances suggested to support the statement that conditions of this character must be reasonable or they will have no validity, and, if impossible of performance, they are unreasonable, are, first, that if a ticket is issued from A. to B. and return, "good for this day only," and there is no train which leaves B. on the return to A. after the arrival of the train, the condition would be unreasonable, and the holder would be entitled to a return passage to A. on the first train leaving B. for A. on the next day; and, second, if a ticket is issued from A. to B. "good for this day only," and by some accident to the train the trip is not completed until the next day, the ticket is good for the balance of the passage. Elliott says that the limitation must be reasonable, and in the note thereto that if the company runs no train on the day to which it is limited, or if it is a round-trip ticket, and there is not time to make the round trip within the period of limitation, or if it is a through ticket over connecting lines, and the time is too short to reach the last line, where there is no delay within such period, "we suppose the traveler could take the first train on the next day." 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1598, and note. Fetter says that the time limited must allow sufficient time "for a person using ordinary diligence to accomplish the trip," and, quoting from Little Rock & F. S. Ry. v. Dean, 43 Ark. 529, 51 Am. Rep. 584—a case strongly relied on by plaintiff—says: "The carrier must afford a purchaser of a limited ticket the necessary facilities for accomplishing his journey within the stipulated time, and upon his failure to do so, he is not in position to treat the contract of carriage as forfeited, and demand a repayment of fare for the same passage, at least if the ticket holder avail himself of the first opportunity to complete his journey after the expiration of the time limited." The italics are ours. The case cited was one where the passenger, having a through ticket over connecting lines, took the first train on defendant's road that left the place after his arrival therein, on a train of the connecting road. Gulf, etc., R. Co. v. Wright (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 294, cited by plaintiff, was a case where the stipulation on the ticket was that it should be entirely used within three days after being stamped for the return trip; and the passenger, traveling diligently, failed to finish his journey within that time owing to delays in the movements of trains on the part of the railroad company; and it was held that he could finish his journey. The only other case cited by plaintiff at all applicable upon this point is that of Auerbach v. N. Y. C. & H. R. Co., 60 How. Prac. 382, where, in deciding for the railroad company, the court said, in effect, that where the agreement is that one must use his ticket for a continuous passage prior to a certain date, and begins his continuous journey in time to reach his destination in the usual course of travel, but is prevented by delays occurring upon the railroad from finishing his journey in the lifetime of the ticket, he may continue his journey to its end. Although this was mere obiter—the court holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for the reason that he did not commence his journey in time to reach his destination in the usual course of travel within the lifetime of the ticket—it is in line with the statements heretofore mentioned as made in the text-books and the cases already cited. It may be noted that the judgment in this case was reversed by the New York Court of Appeals upon the theory that the passenger did commence his journey on defendant's road in time, and that, having so commenced it, he was entitled, under his contract, to pursue it continuously to the end, notwithstanding that the time expired while he was still on the train, pursuing such journey; the case, in this respect, being similar in principle to Lundy v. C. P. R. Co., 66 Cal. 191, 4 Pac. 1193, 56 Am. Rep. 100. See Auerbach v. Railroad Co., 89 N. Y. 281, 42 Am. Rep. 290. However, there is nothing in the Auerbach opinion in 60 How. Prac. 382, or in the other cases cited by plaintiff, or in the views of the text-book writers, or in the cases cited in the text-books, as to unreasonable limitations as to time, that supports the position to which plaintiff is forced by the circumstances of this case, viz., that because the railroad company failed, through its own fault or inability, to transport him upon his return journey, and he was thereby put to the trouble and inconvenience and expense of returning without its aid and by other means, and he did so return, he may enforce a passage under the original contract upon another journey taken by him at a subsequent time, and after the expiration of the time specified in the contract, provided he does so within, as plaintiff says, "a reasonable time."

There is a plain distinction between the case where the passenger, seeking diligently to pursue his journey to its end, is prevented from so doing within the stipulated time by reason of the fact that the time allowed was too short to admit of the accomplishment of the trip, or by some fault or inability of the railroad company, and takes advantage of the first opportunity afforded by the company to complete such journey, and such a case as is here presented. In the former case the passenger is diligently proceeding under his original contract, availing himself of all the means offered by the railroad company to complete his journey, and the limitation as to time is ineffectual against him only to such an extent as is necessary to enable him to reach his journey's end. In this case the plaintiff was not proceeding under the original contract at all, but was simply seeking, by reason of defendant's breach of such contract, to enforce a passage upon a subsequent and distinct journey, commenced long after the expiration of the time stipulated in the contract. We know of no principle of law that would warrant him in so doing.

There is nothing in the suggestion that the statement of defendant's employé at the San Francisco ticket office on July 5th, in response to plaintiff's query as to what would happen if the trains were not running on July 6th, that "it will be good when they do start," operated as a waiver by the railroad company of the stipulation as to time. It will be observed that this is not a case of a statement made by an employé of the company at the time of the sale of the ticket and the making of the contract, but, if the statement was made at all (there is no finding of the court upon the subject), it was made two days after the contract was entered into, and by another employé, who was not shown to have any authority to make such a waiver, even if the language used could be construed as a waiver at all. The only case cited by plaintiff to sustain his contention on this point is that of Nelson v. Long Island R. Co., 7 Hun, 142, where one of the three justices participating held that the statements of the ticket agent selling the ticket were admissible for the purpose of determining what the original contract was. Such cases are, of course, not in point.

It is further contended that the defendant could not, while retaining the void ticket offered by plaintiff, legally demand the delivery of any other ticket or the payment of fare, and could not legally eject plaintiff for failure to comply with such demand. As already stated in our discussion of the findings of the court on this subject, the conductor expressly repudiated this ticket as absolutely void, and notified the plaintiff that he could not honor it. It was, as a matter of fact, entirely without value.

We are not at all satisfied that the conductor had any right to retain this ticket, but we cannot see how an improper retention of a worthless ticket by the conductor could give the plaintiff any right to remain on the train without the presentation of a valid ticket or the payment of fare. He had not exhibited or surrendered a valid ticket, he had given nothing of value to the conductor, and he had refused and continued to refuse to pay his fare. The statute provides that if any passenger refuses to pay his fare, or to exhibit or surrender his ticket, when reasonably requested so to do, he may be ejected at any usual stopping place or near any dwelling house. Civ. Code, §§ 487, 2188. The conditions under which he might lawfully be ejected had thus arisen, and the improper retention of the worthless ticket could not impair the right of the railroad company to prevent him from riding without payment of fare. Upon this question the case of Rahilly v. St. Paul & Duluth R. Co., 66 Minn. 153, 68 N. W. 853, is directly in point. The court there said: "We are all agreed that, even if the conductor had no right to take up the ticket, this would not give the plaintiff any right to refuse to pay his fare until and unless the ticket was returned. Having no right to ride on the ticket, it was his duty to pay his fare or leave the train, and then pursue his remedy against the defendant for wrongfully withholding the ticket from him." Plaintiff cites the case of Vankirk v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 76 Pa. 66, 18 Am. Rep. 404, which is somewhat in line with his contention on this point. The case, however, differs from this in the fact, apparently considered material by the Pennsylvania court, that the plaintiff there offered to pay his fare, provided the ticket already delivered was returned to him. The opinion there proceeded upon the theory that the conductor had no right to demand anything in addition to the accustomed fare, and, the plaintiff having offered to pay this upon the return of the ticket improperly retained, the conductor's refusal to return it was a demand for something more than the accustomed fare. In the case at bar the plaintiff did not offer to pay his fare in the event that the ticket was returned. He simply said, in effect, that he would neither pay his fare nor get off the train until the ticket was returned, and the evidence clearly shows that he intended to ride upon the worthless ticket or be ejected from the train. The case of Bland v. Southern Pacific Co., 55 Cal. 570, 36 Am. Rep. 50, cited by plaintiff, is clearly not in point. There a passenger from San Jose for San Francisco, who had failed to purchase a ticket, gave to the conductor, when the train was about four miles out of San Jose, $2, which was the regular ticket price to San Francisco. The conductor put this in his pocket, and then demanded 20 cents additional, the extra amount due for fare to San Francisco when a passenger failed to procure his ticket at the station. The passenger refused to pay this, and the conductor then and there stopped the train, and, although the plaintiff then offered to pay the twenty cents additional, ejected him, without first returning the money already paid. It was said by the court that the conductor certainly had no authority to eject the passenger and keep the money paid and received as fare, and that the stopping of the train and the actual amotion of the plaintiff were parts of a single act by which the servants of the defendant asserted a right to do that which they were not authorized to do while retaining plaintiff's money. This was clearly right, but the distinction between this case and that is obvious.

The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are reversed.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing of this case. I think the case of Bland v. S. P. Co., 55 Cal. 570, 36 Am. Rep. 50, is very clearly in point. The circumstances were different, but the cases cannot be distinguished in principle. The ticket which the conductor took and retained was the property of the plaintiff and had a legal value. It was evidence of a broken contract; and on the principle of the Bland Case the conductor had no right to eject the plaintiff without first returning the ticket. This is said, of course, upon the assumption that the plaintiff's account of the transaction was true. It was contradicted by the conductor; but here we must accept the evidence, which supports the findings of the trial court.

SELFRIDGE v. PAXTON et al. (S. F. 2,995.)

PARENT AND CHILD—NECESSARIES—LIABILITY OF PARENT—CUSTODY—STATUTES —APPLICATION.

1. Civ. Code, § 4, provides that the Code establishes the law respecting the subjects to which it relates; section 196 declares that the parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support; and section 207 declares that if a parent neglects to provide necessaries for his child, "who is under his charge," a third person may supply them, and recover the reasonable value from the parent. Held that, where a divorce decree awarded the custody of an infant child to the mother, a third person furnishing medical services to the child with knowledge of such decree could not recover therefor from the child's father.

Action by Grant Selfridge against Blitz W. Paxton and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, Blitz W. Paxton appeals. Reversed.

See 67 Pac. 138.

James W. Oakes, for appellant. Morrison & Cope, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought against the defendants to recover for medical and surgical services rendered to Roma W. Paxton, the infant daughter of the said defendants. The case was tried without a jury, and the court made findings and rendered judgment for plaintiff. From the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the defendant Blitz W. Paxton appeals.

The facts material to the determination of the case are, in brief, these: For several years prior to the 17th day of September, 1894, defendants were married to each other, and during that time the said Roma W. Paxton was born to them, as the fruit of their marriage. On said 17th day of September, 1894, the defendants were duly divorced by a decree of court. The decree gave to the defendant Bessie the care and custody of the said Roma; providing, however, that the defendant Blitz might visit the child upon reasonable occasions. But the decree had no provision as to the maintenance of said Roma, and had no other provision whatever. After the date of the decree the defendants lived separately; Blitz residing in Sonoma county, and Bessie in San Francisco. Roma resided with her mother, and was under her custody, in San Francisco. The divorce was obtained at the suit of the wife, on the ground of desertion. Afterwards, and about March 19, 1900, Roma, still a minor, became severely ill; and, at the request of the mother, Bessie, plaintiff commenced attending her professionally, and continued to do so until some time in the following June. He performed on her some difficult surgical operation. His services were necessary, and their value was as found by the court. The first surgical operation was performed a day or two after plaintiff was first called to attend Roma, and on March 22d he wrote to the defendant Blitz, informing him of Roma's serious illness, and of the operation; and he received a reply, dated March 30th, in which said defendant acknowledged receipt of plaintiff's letter, and said that he would be obliged if plaintiff would advise him of any change in the patient's condition. Plaintiff, at the time he rendered the services, knew of the said decree of divorce, and that Roma then was, and for several years theretofore had been, living with and in the custody of the mother, under said decree.

The foregoing are, perhaps, the only facts necessary to be considered, but the following facts also appear: On the day of the divorce the defendants, Blitz and Bessie, entered into a written contract, which, in brief, is as follows: Reference is made in the contract to the pending action for a divorce, and Bessie agreed to take upon herself the maintenance of the said Roma, and also another child of the parties, and Blitz agreed to give her $5,620 in money, which he did then give her, and to pay the premiums on, and make certain disposition of, a certain policy of insurance, and to pay her, in addition, for the support of the children, $13,200, in installments of $100 each month, until the whole should be paid, provided that, if both of the children should die before the whole amount was paid, then the payments should cease, and he gave security for the payment of said money; and Bessie released all interest in all other property, whether community or separate property of Blitz.

It is apparent that the evidence does not show any contract, either express or implied, on the part of defendant Blitz to pay for the said services rendered Roma, and the court does not find any such contract. The finding merely is that the appellant was notified of the illness of Roma, and did not object to respondent's services. The case, therefore, seems to present the naked legal question whether, under the law of this state, a third person can recover of a father for necessaries furnished his infant child, when by a decree of court the care, custody, and control of the child had been taken away from him and given to the mother, who, to the knowledge of the person furnishing the services, is exercising such custody under such decree; and our opinion is that this question must be answered in the negative.

As to what the rule on this subject is under the general law, and without reference to any statutory provision, the decisions in other jurisdictions are, no doubt, somewhat at variance. In McKay v. McKay, 125 Cal. 65, 57 Pac. 677, Mr. Justice Harrison, speaking for the court, says: "The question of the father's liability for the care and support of his children after a decree of divorce, in which their custody has been awarded to the mother, has been frequently presented in actions brought therefor by strangers or by the mother, and courts have almost invariably held that an action against him to enforce such liability could not be maintained." Citing many cases. This would be determinative of the question, if it were not that, perhaps, as contended by respondent, the language above quoted was not necessary to the decision of that case, and was therefore dictum. But the rule stated in that case is the one declared by the statutory law of this state, which, of course, must govern. The law as to the liability of a parent for necessaries furnished the child comes within the declaration of section 4 of the Civil Code of this state, that "the Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates." The Civil Code, commencing with section 193, under the caption of "Parent and Child," clearly "establishes the law" respecting the rights, duties, and liabilities which arise out of that relation, and the law touching the question involved in the case at bar is found in sections 196 and 207. These sections are as follows:

"Sec. 196. Obligations of Parents for the Support and Education of Their Children. The parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances. If the support and education which the father of a legitimate child is able to give are inadequate, the mother must assist him to the extent of her ability."

"Sec. 207. When a Parent is Liable for Necessaries Supplied to the Child. If a parent neglects to provide articles necssary for his child who is under his charge, according to his circumstances, a third person may in good faith supply such necessaries, and recover the reasonable value thereof from the parent."

By these sections, the duty to support a child, and the liability to the third person for necessaries furnished it, are clearly confined to a parent "entitled to the custody" of the child, and having it "under his charge"; and no such liability attaches to a parent who has been deprived of such custody and charge. In the opinion delivered by the learned judge of the court below, for whose judgment we have the highest respect, much weight is given to the consideration of the injustice which might follow if a father could escape liability to support his children on account of a decree of divorce founded on his misconduct; and counsel for respondent also urge that consideration. But strong views have been expressed the other way—to the point that a father deprived of the custody, control, and services of his child is not justly liable to third persons who choose to furnish it supplies. In Ex parte Miller, 109 Cal. 648, 42 Pac. 428, Justice Temple, in a concurring opinion, says: "When a parent is deprived of the custody of his child, and therefore of the right to its services and earnings, by a summary proceeding, he is no longer liable for its support and education. This is true as a general proposition of law, and it is recognized by our Code. Section 196 of the Civil Code provides that a parent entitled to the custody of a child must give him support and education suitable to his circumstances, plainly implying that the parent does not owe that duty to a child when he is not 'entitled to its custody.'" And he further refers to section 207, as providing that, when a parent neglects to provide the necessaries for a child "who is under his charge," then third persons may do so, and recover the value; and he further says that in no instances except those specially provided for in the Code "has the court power to deprive the parent of his authority, and yet hold him liable for the maintenance of his child." Whatever may be thought as to how the law should be on this subject, we must take it to be as it is written in the Code. It must be presumed that the lawmakers looked at the question from all sides—considering the interests of the child as well as the proper liability of the parent—and concluded to enact the law as it stands. Of course, the court, when rendering a judgment of divorce, may provide for, and generally does provide for, the maintenance of the children of the parties; and it may afterwards so provide when it appears necessary. We cannot know why there was no such provision in the decree involved here. Probably it was because the court knew of the said contract between the parties, and thought that it afforded sufficient guaranty for the maintenance of the children.

Under the foregoing views, it is not necessary to consider the other incidental questions discussed by counsel.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

In re BOLLINGER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 3,740.)*

CONTINUANCE — DENIAL OF MOTION — DISCRETION OF COURT—ABUSE.

1. A will contest came on for trial in September, 1900, and the jury disagreed. The case was again set for trial for September 17, 1901, and was continued on contestant's motion to September 24th, then to September 25th, and then to October 1st, because one of plaintiff's attorneys was ill, and the other attorneys were otherwise engaged or insufficiently acquainted with the facts. The attorney who was ill had not, however, taken part in the first trial. On October 1st another motion for a continuance was made, although the court had stated on September 24th that contestant would have to obtain other counsel if he was not ready on the 25th. The last motion asked for a continuance for three months, as the case was of importance, and it would require an attorney from 60 to 90 days to familiarize himself with it. Held, that the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the last motion.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Contest of the will of Christian Bollinger, deceased. From an order of dismissal and from a final judgment against him, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Foote and J. F. Conkey, for appellant. Charles W. Slack, V. A. Scheller, and Rodgers, Paterson & Slack, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is from an order dismissing the contest of appellant and from a final judgment against him. The question to be determined is as to the ruling of the court on appellant's motion for a continuance. Appellant had filed a contest, after probate, of the will of deceased, which came regularly on for trial in September, 1900, and after a trial occupying several weeks resulted in a disagreement of the jury. Appellant was represented of record in the contest by three attorneys—W. W. Foote, J. J. Lermen, and Nicholas Bowden. The case was again regularly set for trial for September 17, 1901, and was then continued on motion of appellant's attorneys to September 24, 1901. This continuance was granted upon a statement made by one of appellant's attorneys that Mr. Foote was ill, and unable to attend the trial. At this time the court informed counsel that if they were not ready to proceed with the case on September 24th they must obtain other counsel and be ready to proceed on that day. On September 24th appellant appeared by his attorneys, Bowden and Lermen, and again moved for a continuance upon affidavits showing that Mr. Foote was in poor health and unable to attend the trial; that Lermen had expected Mr. Foote to try the case, and had made his business engagements accordingly, and had other cases set in court for many succeeding weeks; that Bowden had been employed only to assist in selecting a jury, and was not sufficiently familiar with the facts of the case to proceed with the trial. The court denied the application for a further continuance, and thereupon attorneys Bowden and Lermen withdrew from the case, and refused to proceed. The court thereupon excused the jurors who were in attendance and ready for the trial of the case, and continued it again to September 25, 1901, at which time Mr. Kerwin appeared for appellant, and asked for a further continuance for three months, stating that he appeared solely for that purpose. No reason was given as to why appellant had not employed other counsel to appear for him generally. The court, however, again continued the case to October 1, 1901, at which time Mr. Kerwin again appeared for the sole purpose of moving for a further continuance, and in support of the motion read affidavits stating that the case was one of much importance, and that it would require an attorney from 60 to 90 days to familiarize himself with the law and facts and to prepare for a trial. The court thereupon denied the motion for a further continuance, and, contestant declining to proceed, the court made an order dismissing the contest.

*Rehearing denied February 9, 1905.

The court did not abuse its discretion in denying the continuance. The case had been pending for a long time. Mr. Foote did not appear or take part in the trial which took place in 1900. More than a year had elapsed since that trial. Appellant had been given every opportunity to employ counsel if he so desired. In important cases courts should grant reasonable and proper time to parties to employ competent counsel and prepare for trial, and, to the credit of trial judges, they are seldom appealed to in vain for a reasonable continuance. It is much better to "make haste slowly," with the view of allowing all parties a reasonable time to procure their witnesses and prepare for trial, but at the same time the ends of justice require that cases should be tried, disposed of on their merits, and unreasonable delays prevented. Estates should not be tied up by contests and kept in court for many years, regardless of the rights of the heirs or devisees. If a contest of a will is initiated in good faith, and the contestant shows due diligence, every opportunity should be given for a full investigation of the issues made by the contestant, but, if a contest must be continued for an indefinite time every time an attorney withdraws from the case, there would be no end to the matter.

In re NOLAN'S ESTATE. (S. F. 3,729.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1904.)

ADMINISTRATION—FAMILY ALLOWANCE—ORDER—CONCLUSIVENESS—SETTING ASIDE.

1. Where the probate court made a family allowance to the administratrix of an estate as the widow of the deceased, as permitted by Code Civ. Proc. § 1466, which was not appealed from, as permitted by Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3, it became final; and though, on a partial distribution, the court found that the administratrix was not the widow of the deceased, the family allowance could not be set aside on an order settling the account of the administratrix.

2. Where a probate judge had made a family allowance to one as the widow of the deceased, which has become final, he had no power to suspend the allowance without a petition filed or notice given.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Accounting of Mary Nolan, as administratrix of the estate of James Nolan, deceased. From an order allowing a sum as family allowance to the said administratrix as widow, the heirs appeal. Order affirmed.

Frank J. Fallon and Mullany, Grant & Cushing, for appellants. James G. Maguire and Edgar D. Peixotto, for respondents.

COOPER, C. Appeal from order settling account of Mary Nolan as administratrix of the estate of James Nolan, deceased. The item of $625, being the amount of family allowance for 25 months at $25 per month, paid by the administratrix to herself, is the subject of contest.

Mary Nolan filed a petition in the superior court praying for letters of administration upon the estate of James Nolan, deceased, in which she alleged that she was the widow of said deceased. After notice given, an order was made appointing her administratrix of the said estate. She duly qualified, letters of administration were issued to her, and she has ever since been such administratrix. In January, 1901, she filed her petition praying for a family allowance, in which she alleged that she was the widow of deceased; and the court afterwards, on the 29th day of January, 1901, made an order allowing her, as the widow of deceased, the sum of $25 per month for her support and maintenance. The amount of the item in contest accrued and was paid under this order. On petition for partial distribution of the said estate in December, 1902, after hearing all the parties. the court found that the administratrix is not, and never was, the widow of deceased, but that deceased left surviving him three brothers and the children of a deceased sister, as his only heirs, and the estate was ordered distributed to the said heirs.

It seems to be conceded that said decree was correct as to said partial distribution, and that the administratrix was not the widow of deceased. The question is as to the validity of the family allowance under a valid order of court. In our opinion, the court properly allowed the item. The court had the power, and it was its duty, to make an allowance to the widow of deceased, if he left a widow. Code Civ. Proc. § 1466. The court, upon the proofs before it at the time, did make such order, and found the administratrix to be the widow. This order was appealable. Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3. It was not appealed from, and no motion made to set it aside, and hence it became final. In re Stevens, 83 Cal. 326, 23 Pac. 379, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252; In re Welch, 106 Cal. 430, 39 Pac. 805. Having become final, it was and is conclusive as to the status of the person in whose favor it was made, for all purposes connected with the order and the payment of the money thereunder. The attack here is collateral, and all presumptions are in favor of the order. Estate of Bell, 131 Cal. 4, 63 Pac. 81, 668; In re Welch, 106 Cal. 430, 39 Pac. 805. How can we say, on this collateral attack, that the order was not correct, and that the administratrix is not the widow of deceased? The decree of partial distribution, if allowed to become final, is conclusive upon her that she is not the widow for the purposes of distribution. The decree making the family allowance, on the other hand, has become conclusive upon the heirs that the administratrix is the widow, for all purposes connected with the family allowance. The heirs did not see fit to appeal from the decree making a family allowance. The administratrix does not appear to have appealed from the decree of partial distribution. In all collateral proceedings the orders or decrees must each stand upon its own record. If there were a substantial conflict in the evidence in each case as to whether or not the administratrix is the widow of deceased, this court would sustain each order or decree upon appeal, if the only ground made were the insufficiency of the evidence in each case. This may appear to the layman to be without reason or justification, but it is only an illustration of the imperfection of human institutions. A man may be acquitted of assault and battery upon a criminal trial before a jury, and yet the injured party might obtain a large verdict against him before another jury in a civil action for the same assault and battery. A man might be sued for seduction, and a heavy verdict obtained against him, yet his wife might sue him for divorce on the ground of adultery with the party who obtained the verdict, and the verdict or judgment in the divorce proceedings be in his favor. A decree of distribution to one as the only heir of deceased, made in ignorance of the existence of other heirs, which was not appealed from, and became final, was held conclusive as to the heirs not mentioned in the decree. Lynch v. Rooney, 112 Cal. 279, 44 Pac. 565; Quirk v. Rooney, 130 Cal. 505, 62 Pac. 825.

It is claimed that $300 of the allowance accrued after the court had made an order, November 29, 1901, suspending the family allowance, and that at least that amount should be charged to the administratrix. The order purporting to suspend the family allowance does not appear to have been made upon petition or notice. We know of no law, and none has been called to our attention, which authorized the probate judge to suspend the order for family allowance which had become final. If the judge possessed such powers over orders and decrees in probate, no order would become final, and no one would know as to when rights might be lost by the suspension of the orders on which such rights rested. Suppose the order for family allowance had been affirmed here on appeal after being fully presented; could the probate judge then have set it aside or suspended it? He could have done so if appellants' contention be correct. But here, in the absence of any motion to set aside the order on the ground of fraud or mistake, under section 473, Code Civ. Proc., and no action having been brought to set it aside, and no showing as to the insolvency of the estate, the probate judge made the order attempting to suspend an order that had become final. It is said in Woerner on the American Law of Administration (volume 1, p. 193): "A court of probate, which is without power to revoke or revise its own decrees and judgments, cannot set aside its own allowance and decree a smaller sum unless the original judgment was reversed or reformed on appeal, or adjudged void." In speaking of an order for family allowance, this court said in Re Stevens, 83 Cal. 326, 23 Pac. 379, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252: "The order is appealable (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3), and we are of opinion it should be regarded as final. On an appeal from the order of allowance, all these facts could have been brought to the attention of the court, the ruling reviewed, and the error, if any, corrected. The time for appeal was allowed to pass, and under such circumstances the power of the court over its order is at an end. The court below cannot sit as an appellate court to review its own orders." The subject is fully discussed in Estate of Leonis, 138 Cal. 194, 71 Pac. 171, as to an order vacating a prior order of sale in a probate proceeding, which had become final. The authorities are there collected, and it is not necessary to repeat them here. It was there said: "If the court in a case like this could set aside its order, there would be no end to the matter. It might continue time and time again to make orders and set them aside."

We advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed: HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

ELDER v. McDOUGALD, Treasurer of City and County of San Francisco. (S. F. 3,820.)*

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — POLICE COURTS — PRELIMINARY EXAMINATIONS — STENOGRAPHIC REPORTERS — APPOINTMENT AND COMPENSATION.

1. Under Const. art. 11, § 8½, authorizing municipal charters to provide for the constitution and jurisdiction of police courts, and for the appointment and compensation of the attachés of the judges, the framers of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco were authorized to provide for the appointment and compensation of stenographic reporters, though in conducting preliminary examinations the judges acquire jurisdiction under the general law, and that provision of the charter limiting the appointments to two, and prescribing that they shall attend on the court and take notes of all preliminary examinations, and shall be paid specified annual salaries, superseded Pen. Code, § 869, as far as it empowers a police judge in San Francisco to appoint a reporter for a preliminary examination of a felony charge, and to fix his compensation; section 8 of the Constitution declaring that authorized charter provisions shall supersede all laws inconsistent therewith.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Mandamus by R. H. Elder against John E. McDougald. A demurrer to the answer was sustained, and a peremptory writ was ordered to issue, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., and John P. Coghlan, Asst. City Atty., for appellant. George D. Collins, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. A mandamus proceeding was brought to compel defendant, as treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, to pay a claim of plaintiff for services rendered as stenographic reporter in reporting the testimony and proceedings before a judge of the police court of the city and county of San Francisco at the preliminary examination held therein of one R. A. Fitzgerald, charged with murder. The superior court sustained a demurrer to the answer of defendant, and ordered a peremptory writ to issue, requiring payment as prayed for by plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

There is no dispute as to the fact of the appointment of plaintiff, and the rendition of the services. It relates to the validity of the appointment itself. The plaintiff was appointed by a judge of the police court, created under the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, before whom the preliminary examination was being held; and the appointment was made under section 869 of the Penal Code, which, it is claimed, conferred power upon him to do so. It is insisted by the appellant, however, that the judge had no authority to make the appointment under this section, but that the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, which provides for the appointment of two stenographers by the judges of the police court to take notes at all preliminary examinations, and fixes their compensation (of which plaintiff was not one), furnishes the only authority in the matter of employment of stenographers in taking preliminary examinations in that court, and that his appointment under the section of the Penal Code was void. Hence the question is narrowed down to an inquiry as to whether the provision of the Penal Code, or that of the charter, controls the judges of the police court of the city and county of San Francisco in appointing stenographers to report preliminary examinations in felony cases held before them.

The Constitution (section 8½ of article 11) authorizes and empowers the creation of police courts, and places such courts under charter control by providing that "it shall be competent, in all charters framed under the authority given by section 8 of article XI of this Constitution, to provide, in addition to those provisions allowable by this Constitution and by the laws of the states, as follows: (1) For the constitution, regulation, government and jurisdiction of police courts, and for the manner in which, the times at which, and the terms for which the judges of such courts shall be elected or appointed and for the compensation of said judges and of their clerks and attachés." Under this constitutional provision a charter for said city and county was regularly adopted, wherein a police court, to be known as the police court for the city and county of San Francisco, was created and established, consisting of four judges—one each for the several departments into which the court was divided. As to jurisdiction, it was provided that "the police court of the city and county of San Francisco shall have: First, exclusive jurisdiction of all prosecutions for the violation of ordinances of the board of supervisors; second, concurrent jurisdiction with the superior court of all misdemeanors and of the examination of all felonies committed in the city and county; third, said court, or any judge thereof, shall have the same powers in all criminal actions, cases, examinations and proceedings as are now or may hereafter be conferred by law upon justices of the peace." This is followed by provisions for the appointment of officers of the court, and then we reach the section particularly under consideration here, relative to the appointment of stenographers, which is as follows: "The police judges may appoint not more than two competent stenographers, who shall attend the sessions of the court, and take notes of all preliminary examinations made at the sessions, and transcribe into typewritten longhand all evidence taken by either of them where the parties charged have been held for trial, and deliver one copy of the same to the clerk and one copy to the district attorney. Each of such stenographers shall be paid for all his services, including transcription and all stationery used by him, an annual salary of twenty-four hundred dollars." This is a sufficient statement of the charter provisions under which to examine the points involved.

It is quite clear that the adopted charter, in as far as it undertakes to confer jurisdiction to hold preliminary examinations for felonies, confers it solely upon the police court of such city and county, to be exercised as a court. No jurisdiction is conferred under that instrument upon the judges of such court to hold them, nor could such jurisdiction be conferred upon them under the constitutional provision which authorizes only the creation of police courts. Nor was it necessary to confer any such jurisdiction by the charter. The charter having created the police court, by that very creation any judge thereof, ipso facto, became vested with jurisdiction to conduct such examinations under the general law of the state, as a magistrate. People v. Crespi, 115 Cal. 54, 46

Pac. 863; People v. Cohen, 118 Cal. 78, 50 Pac. 20. That law (Pen. Code, § 808) provides that among others invested with such jurisdiction shall be included "police magistrates in towns or cities," and, as incident to their jurisdiction as such magistrates, further provides that they shall have the power to appoint a reporter to take notes of the preliminary examination, and to fix his compensation, which shall be paid out of the treasury of the city, or city and county, in which such examination was conducted. Pen. Code, § 869. The record in this case shows that the preliminary examination at which the respondent assisted was not conducted by the police court of said city and county, acting as a court, but by one of the judges thereof, acting as a committing magistrate, under the provision of the general law above cited; and it is insisted that the constitutional provision above quoted did not authorize the framers of the adopted charter to control his power to appoint or fix the compensation of a stenographer when acting as such magistrate. It must, of course, be conceded that this contention of respondent is correct, unless the constitutional provision did confer such power, even when the judge of the police court, by virtue of his office as such, was acting as a magistrate, and whether it did or not is the only point in the case. It is to be borne in mind that the power conferred upon the framers of municipal charters to legislate concerning police courts, as to the "constitution, regulation, government and jurisdiction" of such courts, and with reference to the clerks and attachés thereof, proceeds directly from the people, expressed under a constitutional provision. Prior to this it was not competent to make any provision by framers of municipal charters for such courts. That power could only be exercised by the Legislature. People v. Toal, 85 Cal. 335, 24 Pac. 603. It was expressly to confer this authority to so legislate that the amendment to the Constitution (section 8½, art. 11) was adopted by the people; to authorize their creation not only for municipal purposes—the prosecution for violation of municipal ordinances—but as agencies of the state, to assist to a certain extent, at least, in the enforcement of its general criminal laws. As these courts were to be supported and sustained by the municipalities creating them, as part of the municipal government, and from the municipal funds, it was intended, under the broad provision of the Constitution conferring power to "constitute, organize, and govern" them, that the charter might provide for the appointment and compensation of all persons who might, in a general sense, and in view of the jurisdiction with which such courts might be clothed, be deemed necessary to a full and efficient exercise of such jurisdiction. And while it is contended on this appeal that it was not competent, under this constitutional grant of power, for the charter framers to invest such police courts with jurisdiction to enforce the general laws of the state to the extent of holding preliminary examinations, we do not feel called on to determine that question. It is not at all involved in the present inquiry. If the court could not be invested with such jurisdiction, it could certainly be invested with jurisdiction for other purposes, and there is no doubt that it was competent to provide in the charter for such stenographic reporters as might be deemed necessary for the general purposes of such courts. These reporters are recognized by our laws as proper, and sometimes indispensable, adjuncts to a court, to enable it to properly and efficiently discharge its duties.

But whatever the power conferred under the constitutional provision may be, relative to the right of the charter framers to provide for reporters, as necessary to the full and efficient equipment of the police court, as a court, it is contended that there is no authority conferred by the Constitution upon the charter framers to provide for such reporters to the judge of said court acting as a committing magistrate in conducting such examination under jurisdiction conferred by the general law, and not under the charter. We are, however, of an opposite opinion, and think that a fair construction of the constitutional provision not only authorized the framers of the adopted charter to legislate as to the necessary attachés of the police court itself, but also as to those whose attendance upon the judge of the court might be necessary to the exercise of any jurisdiction with which he was invested, whether that jurisdiction was derived from the charter itself, or was conferred upon him under the general laws by virtue of his existence as a police judge under the charter. The constitutional amendment was framed and adopted with a knowledge of the then existing legislation relative to police courts and their duties, and of the jurisdiction conferred upon the latter under the general law, from their existence as such police judges. And while authorizing the chartered municipalities to provide for the compensation of the attachés of the court itself, it had in view also the fact that (especially in a merged and consolidated municipal government like that of the city and county of San Francisco) a large jurisdiction might be exercised by the judges of such courts under the general law, in conducting preliminary examinations, and that in exercising that jurisdiction there would necessarily be incurred expenses to be borne by the municipal treasury; and it was intended that as to any attaché of the judge, as well as of the court, the municipal government should have the right to provide not only for the compensation of the judges, but for "their clerks and attachés." It is insisted, however, that no such authority is given in the constitutional provision for the appointment of attachés to the judge of the police court, that it only provides for fixing their compensation, and that in any event a reporter appointed by a police judge to take notes of the preliminary examination held by him as a magistrate cannot be considered an attaché of such judge under the charter.

As to the power of appointment, we think that, from the context of the provision of the Constitution, it is apparent that such power was conferred. The right to "constitute, regulate, and govern police courts" would be sufficient warrant for the appointment of all persons necessary to its complete and efficient organization, and that the relation of the term "their clerks and attachés" to the general context of the provision authorized not only the fixing of the compensation of such attachés, but of their appointment to the judges of the court when necessary and proper.

It is to be borne in mind, however, in passing, that, as far as stenographers are concerned, there is no attempt made by the charter provision to appoint any particular person as stenographer, or to appoint at all, in the sense of the term as generally understood. It is left to the police judges to make the individual appointments—the charter provisions simply requiring that these appointments must be limited to two stenographers—and it is prescribed that these two shall attend on the court and take notes of all preliminary examinations held therein, and that their compensation shall be an annual sum for all services rendered. This provision of the charter can only be said to be an appointment of stenographers to the extent that, as the judges of the police court have power, under the general law, to appoint stenographers at will for each preliminary examination for a felony held by them, and fix their compensation for such examination, it is an attempt to place a limitation upon such power to that extent.

As to whether a stenographer can be included in the category of attachés who may be provided to the judge of the court, we do not think any general discussion of the meaning of the word "attaché" need be indulged in, because we are satisfied that, as employed in the constitutional provision, it is to be taken in the general and enlarged sense, as applying to any one recognized as a necessary adjunct to a court, tribunal, or office, and that, by virtue of the necessity existing at practically all preliminary examinations for the appointment of a stenographer, he should be treated as coming within that definition. Aside from this, however, the constitutional provision must be construed in the light of existing legislation, as to the relation of reporters to judges of police courts, when the amendment was adopted. Police courts of the city and county of San Francisco had been established by the Legislature and existed long prior to the adoption of this constitutional provision. These courts were given the same jurisdiction under the acts, and the judges thereof possessed the same power under the provisions of the Penal Code relative thereto, as to the examination of felonies committed in the city and county of San Francisco, as they are given under the charter provision now, or which they possess under the general law. Yet under these acts each judge of a department of the court was required to appoint a stenographer. St. 1889, p. 63, c. 66, § 8; St. 1893, p. 9, c. 15, § 8. It is true that it was further provided that such reporter should receive for his services the pay now allowed by law, but, whatever his compensation was, his appointment by the judge of the police court was provided for by law, and it is only the fact that his appointment was so provided, with which we are concerned. The only possible occasion when the judges of such courts, created under these acts, would be authorized to require his services, would be in taking testimony at preliminary examinations in felony cases, and yet it was deemed then proper that a regular stenographer should be appointed by the judge of each department for attendance thereon, as essential to a proper exercise of the jurisdiction of the court and of his own. That these stenographers so appointed were at least attachés to the judge, we think, cannot be successfully questioned. And for the purposes of taking the testimony in preliminary examinations, they were a necessary adjunct to the discharge by the judge of that duty.

And if anything were necessary to be considered, aside from the particular provision of section 8½ of article 11, which we have been discussing, to strengthen the conclusion which we have reached, it is found in the closing portion of the general constitutional provision of which section 8½ is a part, and which provides that, when a city and county government has been merged and consolidated into one municipal government, it shall be competent, in the charter thereof, to provide for the election or appointment and the compensation of its county officers and of their deputies. This closing provision of the constitutional section indicates the general policy of the state relative to the control which such a municipality shall have over its officers, and reflects light upon the particular provision relative to police courts, their judges, and the clerks and attachés thereof. That policy is that it shall be exclusively within the power of such chartered municipality to determine the compensation of all its officers, whether the duties to be discharged by them are imposed on such officers by the provisions of the charter, or are required to be performed by them as such municipal officers by virtue of the provisions of the general law of the state. Matter of Dodge, 135 Cal. 513, 67 Pac. 973.

We are of opinion, therefore, that, under section 8½ of article 11 of the Constitution, it was competent for the framers of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco to provide for the appointment and compensation of the attachés of the judges of the police court authorized to be created thereunder, and that stenographic reporters come within the category of attachés, and that it is of no moment that in conducting preliminary examinations the judge of said court acquires jurisdiction to do so as a magistrate under the general law. The purpose of the grant of power by the constitutional provision to the charter framers was to authorize them to provide for the appointment and compensation of all attachés to the judges of such court, no matter whether such attachés were necessary to a proper discharge of the duties of said judges under the provisions of the charter, or under the requirements of the general law. The charter provision operated upon them, as to their attachés, by virtue of their existence as judges of the police court created under the charter.

Express power being given to the framers of the charter to provide therein for the appointment and compensation of stenographic reporters as attachés to the judge of said court, in whatever capacity as such judge he might be called on to act, and this having been done by the framers thereof, the provisions of the charter in that respect superseded section 869 of the Penal Code, as far as it empowered a police magistrate of a city to appoint a reporter for a preliminary examination being held by him, and to fix his compensation, because, under section 8 of the Constitution, it is declared that the provisions of a charter authorized by that Constitution shall supersede all laws inconsistent with it.

It follows that the demurrer to the answer of defendant was improperly sustained, and the judgment is reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; McFARLAND, J.; SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur. A shorthand reporter is not essential to the examination of a felony charge. The magistrate may, and often does, take down the depositions in longhand, and have them subscribed by the witnesses at the time of the examination. The statute merely gives him the privilege, in his discretion, to appoint a reporter to take down the testimony in shorthand, and, when that course is followed, gives to the longhand transcript the same legal efficacy that it gives to a deposition regularly subscribed by the witness. Pen. Code, § 869. Conceding, then, as I think must be conceded, that the duty and the jurisdiction of the police judges of San Francisco to examine felony charges is solely dependent upon the provisions of the Penal Code, it does not by any means follow that the mere discretion of municipal officers to appoint assistants in the performance of a duty devolved upon them by the laws of the state may not be subjected to reasonable limitations by the municipal charter.

San Francisco being a consolidated city and county, the whole compensation of her police magistrates and their assistants is payable out of the municipal funds. The framers of her freeholders' charter have decided that two salaried shorthand reporters will suffice for the duty of taking down the evidence at preliminary examinations, and have said, in effect, to the police judges, "You must get along with that number." It results, of course, that, if more than two examinations were going on at the same time, one or more of the judges would be deprived of the assistance of a stenographer. But that would not prevent them from performing the duty imposed upon them by the statute. It would only require somewhat more of their time, and some additional labor. This, however, would afford no ground for complaint that the policy of the state law was defeated or its operation impeded, and, as regards the judge, he, as a municipal officer holding and enjoying the emoluments of an office created by the charter, could not with any consistency complain of a charter provision defining his duties. I can see no objection, in any point of view, to the charter provision. There is no real conflict between it and the state law—its utmost effect in any contingency being to compel an examination in San Francisco to be conducted in one of two alternative methods equally legitimate and effective, and differing only in point of convenience and expense; a consideration peculiarly affecting the local taxpayers, and in that sense a municipal affair.

As to the competency of a municipal charter to regulate the compensation of municipal officers for the performance of all duties, including those devolving upon them under the general laws of the state, the Case of Assessor Dodge, 135 Cal. 512, 67 Pac. 973, is conclusive. In that case it was not only held that the compensation of the assessor, payable out of the municipal treasury, could be fixed by the city charter; it was even held that a compensation allowed him by the general law out of the state funds, for services rendered exclusively for the benefit of the state revenue, could be taken away and covered into the local treasury for the benefit of the municipal salary fund. So long as that decision stands, the right of the freeholders to fix the compensation of all municipal officers cannot be questioned. The stenographer appointed to report the proceedings at a felony examination is an officer—he must qualify by taking the oath of office—and in a consolidated city and county he is a municipal officer, and his compensation for all duties is subject, like that of the police judge, to regulation by the charter.

PEOPLE v. CLARK. (Cr. 1,184.)

LARCENY—INSTRUCTIONS—CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—APPEAL.

1. Where there is direct evidence that accused committed the crime charged, it is not error to refuse a charge assuming that a conviction must necessarily be based on circumstantial evidence.

2. Where the court instructed the jury that, if they could reasonably account for any fact in the case on a theory which would admit of accused's innocence, it was their duty to do so, and that, if they had any reasonable doubt of his guilt, to acquit him, it was not error to refuse a charge that the jury might reject any theory on which "the evidence might point to defendant's guilt, even though such theory may be reasonable, and much more probable than the one which admits of his innocence."

3. Where accused was jointly indicted with another for the crime charged, it was not error to refuse a charge that the jury could not find him guilty unless they were satisfied that he committed the crime alone.

4. A charge that a verdict of acquittal should be rendered on a certain phase of the evidence, regardless of whatever else might be developed in the case, is properly refused.

5. On a prosecution for larceny from the person it is not error to refuse a charge distinguishing between grand larceny and robbery.

6. Any error in the failure of the court on a prosecution for grand larceny to give the jury a form of verdict permitting them to find defendant guilty of petit larceny is favorable to the defendant, and is not cause for reversal on appeal from a conviction of grand larceny.

7. Where defendant on a prosecution for grand larceny did not request an instruction that he might be convicted of petit larceny, failure to give to the jury a form of verdict permitting them to find him guilty of petit larceny was not erroneous, especially under evidence showing that defendant was guilty of larceny from the person or grand larceny if he was guilty of anything.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Charles Clark was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Emmet H. Wilson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., for respondent.

GRAY, C. Defendant was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial.

1. He complains of the refusal of the court to give one of his requested instructions commencing as follows: "In order to convict the defendant on circumstantial evidence, it is necessary," etc. This instruction assumes that a conviction, if had, must necessarily be based on circumstantial evidence. At the same time appellant concedes in his brief that there was direct evidence that defendant committed the crime charged in the testimony of the complaining witness Caler. Therefore this cannot properly be called a case of circumstantial evidence, and the court rightly refused an instruction assuming that it was such a case. People v. Lonnen, 139 Cal. 634, 73 Pac. 586; People v. Burns, 121 Cal. 529, 53 Pac. 1096.

2. That part of requested instruction No. 4 which was to the effect that the jury might reject any theory or supposition on which the evidence might point to defendant's guilt, "even though such theory may be reasonable, and much more probable than the one which admits of his innocence," was properly refused and stricken out. The instruction on that subject given to the jury reads as follows: "In considering the evidence, if you can reasonably account for any fact in this case upon a theory or hypothesis which will admit of the defendant's innocence, it is your duty under the law to do so; and if you have a reasonable doubt of his guilt you should acquit him." This was a proper instruction on the subject, and as full and favorable to defendant as he could reasonably ask.

3. The court refused the request of defendant to instruct as follows: "Unless there is evidence in this case to justify the conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, and not some one else, took and carried away the money from the person of the prosecuting witness, as alleged in the information, you cannot find the defendant guilty." This instruction was properly refused, for the reason that the information charged the defendant and one Perry jointly with the crime in question, and the evidence tended to show that the larceny was the result of their joint efforts. It would mislead the jury in such a case, and it would be improper to tell them, in effect, that they could not find the defendant guilty unless they were satisfied that he committed the crime alone. The refused instruction might be understood as above indicated, and was therefore properly refused.

4. Requested instruction No. 9 was properly refused because it stated, in effect, that a verdict of acquittal should be rendered on a certain phase of the evidence, regardless of whatever else might be developed in the case.

5. The defendant was in no way injured by the refusal of the court to give the requested instruction distinguishing between grand larceny and robbery. The defendant was charged with larceny from the person, and was not charged with robbery. He could not be acquitted of larceny if the jury were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the facts showed him guilty of robbery, because "it is settled law that robbery involves grand larceny." People v. Church, 116 Cal. 303, 48 Pac. 125. "Robbery is larceny with the element of force or intimidation added." People v. Clary, 72 Cal. 61, 13 Pac. 77. The doctrine is well settled that a defendant cannot complain because the information and the instructions of the court confine his conviction to the lesser crime included within what the evidence might otherwise warrant the jury in finding to be a greater crime. People v. Muhlner, 115 Cal. 303, 47 Pac. 128; People v. Clary, supra. It would have been a vain thing for the court to define robbery and state its various elements in a case where the information would not admit of a conviction of robbery. The court did very distinctly and plainly give to the jury the elements of grand larceny, and that was all that was necessary in a distinctly grand larceny case.

6. The defendant complains that the court failed to give the jury a form of verdict permitting them to find him guilty of petit larceny. There is no reasonable ground upon which a defendant can be heard to complain that the action of the trial court has prevented his conviction of any particular crime, either great or small. His plea of not guilty shows that he does not desire to be convicted of anything embraced in the information. It will not be presumed for a moment that the jury will do so base a thing as to convict of the higher offense because they are not permitted to convict him of the lesser; but, on the contrary, the natural presumption is that, unless they are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the higher offense, they will perform their duty, and acquit him altogether, even though they be satisfied that he is guilty of the lesser offense. "The error then, if any was committed, was favorable to defendant, and the case should not be reversed on account of it." People v. Lopez, 135 Cal. 25, 66 Pac. 965. Besides, defendant did not request an instruction that he might be convicted of petit larceny, and, further, was guilty of larceny from the person or grand larceny if he was guilty of anything. People v. Bailey, 142 Cal. 434, 76 Pac. 49; People v. Keith, 141 Cal. 690, 75 Pac. 304.

7. There is no merit in the contention that the evidence fails to support the verdict.

We concur: COOPER, C.; SMITH, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed: VAN DYKE, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.

PEOPLE v. THOMSON. (Cr. 1,147.)

HOMICIDE — SELF-DEFENSE — STATUTE — CONSTRUCTION—DYING DECLARATIONS — JURY — INSTRUCTIONS — EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL.

1. Where the appearances are such as to justify a reasonable man in believing that it is necessary to instantly kill another in order to save himself from death or great bodily injury, and he does so believe, he is not required to exercise "due care" or "circumspection" as to the manner of killing.

2. Pen. Code, § 192, providing that where a lawful act which might produce death is done without due caution and circumspection, and the death of another is caused thereby, involuntary manslaughter is committed, is not a limitation on the right of one acting on appearances to kill in self-defense.

3. One may be justified, even in a sudden quarrel, in killing another in self-defense.

4. A dying declaration stands on no higher plane than that occupied by the testimony of an ordinary witness, and where the court, on a prosecution for homicide, charged as to the right of the jury to reject the testimony of any witness whose testimony was distrusted, it was error to refuse a charge applying the same rule to the dying declarations of deceased, which had been admitted in evidence.

5. Whether declarations admitted in evidence by the court on a preliminary examination as dying declarations are such in fact is a question for the jury, and an instruction assuming that they are dying declarations is erroneous.

6. Instructions as to the object of evidence offered to show the bad reputation of deceased for peace and quiet are properly refused where they assume that defendant believed that it was necessary to kill in self-defense.

7. Where it appeared that the killing occurred in an affray concerning the hire of mules by defendant from the deceased, evidence of admissions made by deceased prior to the affray, relative to the terms of the agreement between deceased and defendant as to the mules was inadmissible; there being nothing therein to show the mental attitude of the parties toward each other at the time of the affray, or as to who was the aggressor therein.

8. Where improper matters contained in alleged dying declarations of deceased were ruled out by the court in advance of admitting the declarations, but were finally read in evidence because the defendant insisted thereon, the fact that the evidence tended to contradict such improper matters was not cause for reversal.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Alex. J. Thomson was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed.

H. C. Lillie, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., and Daniel McFadzean, Dist. Atty., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder of the second degree, and adjudged to suffer imprisonment for 18 years. He appeals from such judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The killing of the deceased by the defendant was admitted, but it was claimed by the defendant that such killing was done in necessary self-defense. The trouble between the parties grew out of a difference as to the price agreed to be paid by the deceased to defendant for the hire of two mules. On the day of the mortal affray the deceased delivered the mules at defendant's residence, and was about leaving, when an altercation commenced as to the amount of money due defendant from the deceased for the hire thereof. There was a quarrel—the evidence tending to show the use of vigorous and profane language by the parties—and the quarrel culminated in the shooting of deceased by defendant. So far as appears, the deceased was not armed. Defendant's claim was that deceased, who was some 12 or 15 feet from him at the time of the shooting, used such language and made such motions as to indicate that he was about to draw and fire a pistol, and that he believed, and was reasonably justified in believing, that he was in immediate danger of death or great bodily harm at the hands of deceased, and that it was necessary for him to shoot deceased to save himself therefrom. The defendant was a cripple, having a cork leg. There was much evidence tending to show that the reputation of deceased for peace and quiet was bad, and that this was known to defendant. In fact, the prosecution made no attempt to rebut the evidence introduced by defendant upon this point. It was further shown that the deceased generally carried a pistol, and that this was known to defendant. There was also testimony to the effect that shortly before this time the deceased, in conversation with defendant, pointed to a man with whom he had previously quarreled, and said: "I horsewhipped him once. The next man I have any words with, I am going to fix him"—and that at the time of the shooting, when he made a motion indicating that he was about to draw a weapon, he said to defendant, "You are in for it," or "We are in for it."

There being no evidence to clearly show that the deceased was actually armed at the moment of the difficulty, and consequently that there was actual danger to defendant at the hands of deceased, the defendant's claim of killing in self-defense rested largely, if not entirely, upon his right to act upon appearances. The evidence was of such a nature as to entitle defendant to clear and unequivocal instructions upon this subject. Under these circumstances, the defendant requested the following instruction, viz.: "The defendant was entitled to act upon appearances, and if the language and conduct of the deceased was such as to induce in the mind of a reasonable man, under all the circumstances then existing, and viewed from the standpoint of the defendant, that death or great bodily harm was about to be inflicted by deceased upon the defendant, it does not matter if such danger was real or was only apparent; and if defendant acted in self-defense from real and honest convictions as to the character of the danger, induced by the existence of reasonable circumstances, he should be acquitted, even though he was mistaken as to the extent of the danger." This requested instruction, except for the omission of the words "a fear" or "a belief" before the words "that death or great bodily harm," which omission is immaterial, was a correct exposition of the law upon the subject of appearances. The court refused to give it as requested, and, in its place, gave practically the same instruction with this proviso, viz.: "But the killing must have been done with due caution and circumspection, and not in a sudden quarrel or heat of passion. For if the killing, under such circumstances, was done without due caution and circumspection, or was done in a sudden quarrel or heat of passion, then the defendant is guilty of manslaughter." We cannot understand the object of this addition to the requested instruction, and it certainly does not correctly state the law relative to appearances that will justify a homicide. The effect thereof was not only that the requested instruction was rendered ineffectual, but the jury were plainly and unequivocably told that the defendant was entitled to act upon appearances, and could be acquitted upon the ground of self-defense where there was in fact no actual danger, only in the event that the killing was "done with due caution and circumspection and not in a sudden quarrel or heat of passion." Whatever may be meant by saying that a man must kill another in self-defense "with due caution and circumspection," there is no such limitation upon the right of self-defense. If the appearances are such as to justify a reasonable man in believing that it is necessary to instantly kill another in order to save himself from death or great bodily injury, and he does so believe, he is not required to exercise any "due care" or "circumspection" as to the manner of killing. The words "due caution and circumspection" were undoubtedly taken from our Code definition of involuntary manslaughter, which was not, under the evidence, an element in the case. Under section 192, Pen. Code, where a lawful act which might produce death is done without due caution and circumspection, and the death of another is caused thereby, involuntary manslaughter is committed. Used in connection with, and as a limitation upon, the right of one acting upon appearances to kill in self-defense, the phrase in question introduced an element not recognized by the law upon that subject. Nor is it true that a man may not, in a sudden quarrel, be justified in killing another in self-defense. It is obvious that, where a sudden quarrel has commenced and is in progress between the parties, one of the parties may assail the other under such circumstances as to make it absolutely necessary for the other to kill in self-defense, or, being the aggressor, may so conduct himself as to justify the other, as a reasonable man, in believing that it is necessary to so do in order to save himself from death or great bodily injury. In either event, the mere fact that the parties are engaged in a sudden quarrel, which may be a mere altercation of words, cannot deprive one of the right to defend himself against the real or apparent assailant. In the case at bar the parties were admittedly engaged in such a sudden quarrel, and the effect of this instruction was that the jury were told that the rule as to the right of one to act upon appearances was not applicable to the case, or, in other words, that the defendant here was not justified in acting upon appearances. The action of the court in the matter of this instruction constituted error, which we cannot say was without substantial prejudice to defendant's cause. The effect thereof was not obviated by the general abstract instruction given by the court upon the subject of self-defense.

2. The shooting was done on the 30th day of December, 1902, and the deceased died on February 8, 1903. On February 6, 1903, he made what was claimed to be a dying declaration, and this was admitted in evidence as a dying declaration. It is not claimed that the preliminary evidence as to the circumstances under which the statement was made was not sufficient to warrant the court in admitting the same in evidence, but it is claimed that the trial court erred in giving a certain instruction in regard thereto, and in refusing to give others. This dying declaration was most important to the prosecution. All the eyewitnesses of the affray were members of the family of defendant, and their testimony tended to corroborate his statement. It was upon the dying declaration and the location of the fatal wound that the prosecution was compelled to principally rely. The court (at the request of the prosecution, according to the record) instructed the jury that, if they believed that "any witness" whose testimony had been admitted was false in one part of his testimony, then such witness should be distrusted in the other parts of his testimony, and that, under such circumstances, they might reject and disregard his entire testimony. It further instructed as follows: "The dying declaration of the deceased, T. B. Slaughter, has been received by the court as testimony, and is to be considered by you as testimony in this case. Dying declarations are received by courts as evidence from necessity. There is no authority in law for administering an oath to the person making such declaration. The sense of impending death dispenses with the necessity for an oath." This was the only instruction given regarding the dying declaration. The court refused to instruct the jury that, if they believed that the deceased was willfully false in one part of his declaration, then he should be distrusted in other parts, and that under such circumstances they would be entitled to disregard and cast aside the entire declaration.

We are of the opinion that the instructions given are susceptible of the construction that a dying declaration stands upon a higher plane than that occupied by the testimony of the ordinary witness, and that the testimony of a mere witness may be distrusted and disregarded where a dying declaration may not be so rejected. A person who has made a dying declaration, which is admitted on a trial, is not a "witness" on the trial, either within the definition of our Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 1878), or within the common acceptation of the word "witness"; and the jury might well have understood that the instruction as to their right to reject and disregard the testimony of "any witness" referred solely to those whose testimony had been received under oath on the trial. Particularly was this so when the separate and distinct instruction was given as to the dying declaration. It is, of course, settled law, that the credibility or degree of weight which shall be given to a dying declaration is solely a question for the jury; that they may apply the same tests and principles in determining its truth that they apply in the consideration of the evidence of the witnesses; and that, if they believe from the evidence that the person making the declaration was willfully false in a material part thereof, they may reject and disregard his entire declaration. We are of the opinion that the court should have made this clear by the instructions. Having given an instruction as to the conditions upon which the jury might reject and disregard the testimony of other witnesses, it should, when requested by defendant, have done at least as much as to the dying declaration, and given the twenty-fifth requested instruction. We are of the opinion, too, that the one instruction given upon the subject of the dying declaration to some extent invaded the province of the jury. It was practically declared thereby that the declaration admitted was a dying declaration; i. e., that it was made by deceased under a sense of impending death, and that the jury must accept it as having been so made. It is, of course, for the court to determine, upon preliminary proof addressed to it, as to whether a declaration made by a deceased was so made under a sense of impending death as to be competent evidence; this duty of the court being placed, according to Mr. Greeleaf, "on the same ground with the preliminary proof of documents and of the competency of witnesses" (Greenleaf on Evidence, § 161); but the determination by the court that it was so made cannot, in the slightest degree, impair the power of the jury to determine as to its credibility. As Greenleaf says in the section already cited: "But after the evidence is admitted, its credibility is entirely within the province of the jury, who, of course, are at liberty to weigh all the circumstances under which the declarations were made, including those already proved to the judge, and to give the testimony only such credit as, upon the whole, they may think it deserves." Whether the declaration was in fact made under a sense of impending death is a question that most materially affects the question as to its credibility, and the determination of the court thereon is not conclusive upon the jury. They have the right, in considering whether they shall accept the declaration as a correct statement, to determine for themselves whether the declarant was in extremis, and fully convinced of that fact, when making the declaration, and are at liberty to disregard it if not satisfied that it was made under a sense of impending death. This appears to be settled by the great weight of authority. This court, speaking through the Chief Justice, said in People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 66 Pac. 794, that an instruction to the effect that, although it was the province of the court to determine in the first instance the admissibility of the dying declaration, the jury were not bound by the fact of its admission to conclude that it was made in view of impending death, etc., but that it was for them to determine whether it was so made, and whether it had been correctly reported, was correct. In State v. Reed, 53 Kan. 767, 37 Pac. 174, 42 Am. St. Rep. 322, it was held that an instruction to the effect that such a declaration was made under a sense of impending death excluded from the jury, in passing on the credibility of the declaration, the question as to whether it was so made, and was erroneous; it being declared that, in passing on the credibility of the statement, they were entitled to consider whether, as a matter of fact, deceased had lost all hope of recovery at the time he made the same. See, also, State v. Phillips, 118 Iowa, 660, 92 N. W. 876, and cases there cited; McClain on Criminal Law, §§ 430, 431; Starkey v. People, 17 Ill. 17; North v. People, 139 Ill. 81, 102, 28 N. E. 966; State v. Banister, 35 S. C. 290, 296, 14 S. E. 678; Walker v. State, 37 Tex. 366, 386; Com. v. Brewer, 164 Mass. 577, 42 N. E. 92; State v. Swift, 57 Conn. 496, 18 Atl. 664; 10 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 385 and 386.

Inasmuch as the declaration of the deceased is competent evidence only when made under the sense of impending death and because it was so made, it would seem to logically follow that the jury should give it no consideration whatever unless they are satisfied that it was made by the deceased under such sense of impending death. It is a rule of evidence that such a declaration can be considered only in that event, and while the court must, of necessity, preliminarily determine the question of fact essential to the admission of the declaration in evidence, the rule of evidence still remains for the guidance of the jury; and, as the jury must exercise their power of judging of the effect of evidence in subordination to the rules of evidence, it would seem to be proper to inform the jury of such rule, and of their duties in regard thereto. The doctrine in such matters is stated in Com. v. Brewer, supra, as follows: "When the admissibility of evidence depends upon a collateral fact, the regular course is for the judge to pass upon the fact in the first instance, and then, if he admits the evidence, to instruct the jury to exclude it if they should be of different opinion on the preliminary matter." See, also, Jones v. State, 71 Ind. 66. The case is analogous to that where it is sought to introduce a confession of a defendant in evidence, and the court is called upon to preliminarily pass upon the question of fact as to whether the confession was freely and voluntarily made. State v. Banister, supra. In such a case it is for the jury to ultimately determine whether it was so made, and therefore entitled to consideration. People v. Oliveria, 127 Cal. 376, 381, 59 Pac. 772.

Upon a retrial, proper instructions along the lines discussed will doubtless be given. Many of the instructions requested upon this branch of the case were objectionable—some of them being purely argumentative—and were properly refused.

3. Except upon the question as to the right of the defendant to act upon appearances, which has already been noticed, the instructions upon the law of self-defense fairly covered the case, and included substantially all such portion of defendant's requested instructions upon the subject as he was entitled to. Defendant's requested instructions as to the object of the evidence offered to show the bad reputation of the deceased for peace and quiet were objectionable, in assuming that defendant believed that it was necessary to kill in self-defense. Doubtless, if proper instructions upon this subject are asked, they will be given.

4. In all other respects defendant's requested instructions, so far as proper, were fairly covered by the charge of the court.

5. We are of the opinion that the court did not err in excluding the evidence offered to show certain admissions made by deceased prior to the affray concerning the terms of the agreement between himself and defendant as to the mules. There was nothing therein tending in the slightest degree to show the mental attitude of the parties toward each other at the time of the affray—nothing at all material to the question as to who was the aggressor therein. People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, 42 Pac. 307, 30 L. R. A. 403, is clearly inapplicable.

The argument that the evidence tended to contradict certain matters improperly contained in the alleged dying declaration of deceased is overcome by the fact that the court ruled such matters out in admitting the declaration, and that the same were finally read in evidence only because the defendant insisted thereon.

We are unable to perceive that the district attorney was guilty of any misconduct in argument that could have prejudicially affected defendant's cause.

This disposes of all the points discussed in the briefs.

For the reasons given, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: SHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

MILLER & LUX et al. v. ENTERPRISE CANAL & LAND CO. et al. (MOWRY, Intervener). (S. F. 2,856, 3,439.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 3, 1905.)

WATER COURSE—DIVERTING OF WATERS — INJUNCTION—FINDINGS—JUDGMENT—CONCLUSIVENESS—APPEAL—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where an appeal is taken on a judgment roll alone, the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings cannot be raised.

2. Where an appeal is taken on a judgment roll alone, only error appearing on the face thereof is available to effect a reversal.

3. In an action to enjoin the diverting of the waters of a river, a finding that at certain stages of the river or at certain times some of the water flowing into the river would naturally flow into a certain slough, and back up the slough, but that there was no outlet for the waters flowing into the slough from the river, except the same channel through which the water flowed from the river into the slough, and that, when the slough was filled up and the level changed, then the water which flowed from the river into the slough flowed back into and down the river, was not contradictory of a finding that the slough was no part of the river.

4. Nor was a finding that the water diverted was needed by plaintiffs affected by a further finding that at certain times in each year the river for a short time regularly overflowed its banks onto plaintiffs' lands, thus wetting and benefiting them.

5. A finding that during certain times there was an increase of the flow of the water in the river over ordinary stages, but that there was no evidence before the court whereby it could be determined at what stages of the waters of the river at such times, if at all, water could be diverted therefrom without injury or damage to plaintiffs and other riparian proprietors, is not cause for reversal on an appeal from a judgment for plaintiffs based on the judgment roll only.

6. In such case the fact that the judgment reserved to defendants the right to bring an action to have it determined at what stages of the water, if any, water might be diverted without injury to plaintiffs, in view of a finding that there was no evidence from which that fact could be determined, is not cause for reversal on appeal from a judgment for plaintiffs, based on the judgment roll only.

7. Where a motion for new trial was made on all the statutory grounds, including insufficiency of the evidence, but the order granting a new trial thereon was simply that the defendants' motion therefor was granted, conflicting evidence on a material finding of fact requires an affirmance of the order.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. R. Webb, Judge.

Action by Miller & Lux (a corporation) and others against the Enterprise Canal & Land Company and Jefferson G. James (J. C. Mowry, intervener). From a judgment for plaintiff corporation and intervener, defendants appeal, and from an order granting a new trial, said plaintiff and the intervener appeal. Affirmed on both appeals.

Houghton & Houghton (Frank H. Short, of counsel), for Miller & Lux. Octave G. De Py and Isaac Frohman, for intervener. W. C. Graves, Caldwell & Borland, Archibald Borland, and Caldwell & Caldwell, for Enterprise Land & Canal Co. and Jefferson G. James.

McFARLAND, J. These two appeals were argued and submitted together, and will both be considered and determined in this one opinion. They arise out of an action in the superior court entitled Miller & Lux and the San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Company, plaintiffs, versus the above-named defendants. The action was to enjoin the defendants from diverting water from the San Joaquin river. Judgment was rendered in favor of Miller & Lux, enjoining the defendants as prayed for; but the court refused to give judgment for the other plaintiff, who claimed as an appropriator of the water of said river, on the ground that the river was a navigable stream, and that the maintenance of said claimant's ditch and dam, by which it diverted the water, was a nuisance, and rendered judgment in favor of defendants against said plaintiff canal and irrigation company. From this part of the judgment the said last-named plaintiff appealed, and it was here reversed, and judgment ordered for said plaintiff. See Lux v. Enterprise Company, 142 Cal. 208, 75 Pac. 770, where some of the general facts of the whole case were stated. And that appeal is here referred to merely for the purpose of keeping in view the fact that the rights of said plaintiff the land and irrigation company are not involved in the two appeals now before the court. It is not a party to either of such appeals.

No. 2,856.

This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiff Miller & Lux and the intervener, Mowry. Plaintiff and the intervener occupy similar positions, and the affirmance or reversal of the judgment as to plaintiff would necessarily carry a similar affirmance or reversal as to the intervener. Therefore express reference need be made to the case only as between plaintiff and defendants. This appeal—No. 2,856—is upon the judgment roll alone. There is no bill of exceptions or statement, and consequently there is here no question of sufficiency of evidence to support the findings, and no exceptions to rulings made during the taking of evidence at the trial. The judgment could be reversed only upon some fatal error appearing on the face of the judgment roll, and we see none. The briefs are quite voluminous; but they go mainly to questions which arise, if at all, in the other appeal—No. 3,439—which is from an order granting a new trial, and will be noticed hereafter. The case was tried without a jury, and the court made very full findings. Among other things it found that plaintiff Miller & Lux was, and for 25 years before the commencement of the suit had been, the owner of large bodies of land lying on the San Joaquin river, and riparian thereto, and that such river is a natural water course, and that from time immemorial the waters of said river have naturally flowed over plaintiff's said lands; thereby irrigating the lands and making them fit for cultivation and pasturage, and supplying water for stock and agricultural purposes, and for all purposes for which the owner of land bordering on a running stream has the right to use the water thereof. It is further found that defendants, long after plaintiff's rights had accrued, and at a point on said river above plaintiff's lands, constructed a dam and ditch by which they obstructed the flow of the water in the river, and diverted such water away from said river, and prevented it from flowing down and onto plaintiff's lands as it was accustomed to flow; that such water so diverted is actually needed for the use and cultivation of plaintiff's lands; and that its diversion by defendants has caused and will cause plaintiff great and irreparable damage. It was claimed by defendants that a certain slough, called sometimes "Kings River Slough," and sometimes "Fresno Slough," which connects with the San Joaquin river at a point on plaintiff's lands, is a part of said river; and as defendant James owns lands bordering on said slough, though not on the main river, it was contended by defendants that James was a riparian proprietor on the main San Joaquin river, and had certain alleged rights as such riparian proprietor. The court, however, found that such slough was not a part of the San Joaquin river, but is a channel made by another river, called "Kings River," and is "a part of or extension of said Kings river through which the waters of said river flow on their way to the ocean." Of course, as there is no evidence in the record, the finding is conclusive on the point, so far as this appeal from the judgment is concerned, unless there is some other contradictory finding on the subject. Defendants contend that this finding is inconsistent with that part of finding 52 which is as follows: "That at certain stages of the river, or at certain times, some of the water flowing in the San Joaquin river will naturally flow into said Fresno slough, and back up said slough for a distance of some twelve miles; but there is no outlet for the waters flowing into said slough from said San Joaquin river, except through the same channel which the water flows from the said San Joaquin river into said slough, and, when Fresno slough becomes filled up and the level changes, then this water which has flowed from San Joaquin river into said Fresno slough flows back into and down the said San Joaquin river." But it is quite clear, we think, that this finding is not contradictory of the former finding that the slough is not a part of the river. It is also contended that defendants, under any view, were entitled to divert some of the water of the river because it was not needed by plaintiffs on their lands below, but this contention is answered by the finding above referred to, that it was so needed. And this finding is not affected by the further finding that at certain times in each year the river for a short time regularly overflows its banks onto plaintiffs' lands, thus wetting and benefiting the same.

*Rehearing denied February 2, 1905.

Nor is a reversal of the judgment called for on account of the finding, in finding No. 57, that during certain times there is an increase of the flow of water in the river over ordinary stages, "but there is no evidence before the court whereby it can be determined at what stages of the waters of said river at such times, if at all, water can be diverted therefrom without injury or damage to the plaintiff Miller & Lux, and others owning lands riparian to said river and having vested rights therein as to the flow of the waters thereof," nor on account of that part of the judgment which reserves to defendants the right to bring an action to have it determined at what stages of the water, if any, water may be diverted without injury to plaintiff. If this finding and this part of the judgment are of any consequence at all, they are not prejudicial to defendants, and certainly give to them no cause of complaint.

We do not deem it necessary to further discuss this appeal from the judgment. It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the judgment, upon its face, is free from error, and the findings amply support it. Therefore on this appeal the judgment must be affirmed.

No. 3,439.

This appeal is by plaintiff Miller & Lux and the intervener, Mowry, from an order of the superior court granting a motion made by defendants for a new trial. The judge before whom the case was tried, and upon whose decision the judgment was rendered, went out of office before the motion for a new trial was heard, and the motion was granted by his successor.

The motion was made on all the statutory grounds, and there are a good many specifications of the particulars in which it is claimed the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision. The language of the order granting a new trial is simply "that the motion of the defendants for a new trial of said action be, and the same is hereby, granted." There is no intimation in the record enabling us to see upon which of the various grounds of the motion the order granting it was based. This is perhaps unfortunate in a case of this kind, for it may be that the reason for granting the motion was not insufficient evidence, in which event the case might perhaps be more readily disposed of on its real legal merits. However, as the record stands, respondents are entitled to invoke the established rule that the order must be affirmed if it can be justified on any one of the grounds on which the motion was made, and that, as insufficiency of the evidence was one of the grounds, the order must be affirmed if there was fairly conflicting evidence as to any material finding of fact.

If the motion for a new trial had been denied, and defendants were appealing from the order denying it, we could readily say that the evidence was sufficient to justify the decision. But we would not be justified in holding that there was no conflict of evidence as to any material fact found. For instance, it is found "that the said Fresno slough is no part of the San Joaquin river, but is a channel made from the overflow from Kings river during flood time, and is a part of or extension of said Kings river through which the waters of said river flow on their way to the ocean." This clearly involves a finding of fact, and, considering all the evidence touching the nature and character of Fresno slough, and the sources and condition of the water flowing or being therein, and particularly the testimony of such witnesses of respondents as Anthony, Parker, Chidester, Garner, White, and others, we cannot say that there was no conflict of evidence on the point, or that the judge of the trial court, in view of such conflict, abused his discretion in granting a new trial. It is contended by appellant that this finding was immaterial, because, even conceding that the slough is part of the river, and defendant James therefore an owner of lands riparian to the river by virtue of his ownership of lands bordering on the slough, still he would have no right, for the purpose of irrigating said lands, to go upon the river at a point many miles above the mouth of the slough, and above plaintiff's lands, and from that point divert water by means of a dam and ditch, and carry it entirely around and away from plaintiff's lands lying above the slough, and thus preventing any of the water so diverted from flowing or seeping back onto plaintiff's said lands. But if we concede this proposition to be true, it would have been available only if the court had merely enjoined defendants from diverting water through the said ditch which takes water from a point entirely above plaintiff's lands. But the court found that the defendants "were not entitled to take or divert any of the waters flowing in the San Joaquin river," and in the judgment it is decreed that defendants be enjoined "from diverting any water out of or from the San Joaquin river, or obstructing the flow of water therein, at any point above the lands, or any part of the lands, of the plaintiff Miller & Lux, or of the intervener, J. C. Mowry," and further that they are not "entitled to take or divert any of the waters flowing in the San Joaquin river." This finding and decree hold and adjudicate that defendants have no riparian rights at any point of the river, and are based on the finding that Fresno slough is not a part of the river, and for this reason the finding that the slough is not a part of the river is necessarily a material finding. For this reason, the order granting a new trial must be affirmed. If, as a fact, the court did not grant the new trial on this ground, but did grant it on some grounds which would not be held tenable by this court, the necessity of affirming the order, on the record as it stands, is unfortunate. We apprehend, however, that the parties can avoid a good deal of the expense and labor of a new trial by accepting much of the evidence given at the former trial without requiring it to be repeated.

In the appeal No. 2,856, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In the appeal No. 3,439, the order granting a new trial, appealed from, is affirmed.

UNION SAV. BANK OF SAN JOSE v. LEITER. (S. F. 3,759.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 7, 1905.)

BANKS — INSOLVENCY—UNPAID STOCK—POWER OF DIRECTORS TO LEVY ASSESSMENTS—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PAYMENTS—REPEAL OF STATUTE—EFFECT ON LITIGATION.

1. A corporation having no power to adopt a by-law inconsistent with the laws of the state (Civ. Code, § 301), and corporate directors having express authority to levy and collect an assessment for such percentage of the full amount unpaid on capital stock as may be necessary to satisfy the claims of creditors (Civ. Code, § 331, and section 332, subd. 1), a corporate by-law providing that "no further calls for payments on capital stock shall be made except by a two-thirds vote of all the stock issued and outstanding" does not prevent an assessment by the directors in liquidation.

2. The statute of limitation does not commence to run against an action to enforce the liability of corporate stockholders on unpaid stock, under Civ. Code, § 332, subd. 1, until levy of an assessment.

3. The levy of an assessment on unpaid corporate stock, and notice thereof to the stockholder, which was afterward rescinded, did not commence the running of limitation against the liability of the stockholder, so as to prevent the enforcement of a subsequent assessment.

4. The payment of a judgment obtained on the personal liability of a stockholder by a corporate creditor under Civ. Code, § 322, cannot be considered as payment on unpaid corporate stock.

5. St. 1903, p. 73, c. 65, repealing the bank commission act of 1878, as amended in 1887 and 1895, without a saving clause as to pending litigation, did not affect an action to enforce an assessment on bank corporate stock pursuant to a prior final judgment under the act decreeing the corporation insolvent, and directing the enforcement of stockholders' liability, under Civ. Code, § 331, and section 332, subd. 1, in liquidation.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; A. L. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by the Union Savings Bank of San Jose, a corporation, against Jeremiah Leiter. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. G. Tompkins and S. F. Leib, for appellant. E. M. Rea and Francis J. Heney, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is, in form, an action by a banking corporation to recover from a stockholder the amount of an assessment levied for an amount unpaid upon the capital stock, for the purpose of satisfying the claims of creditors of such corporation. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals therefrom upon the judgment roll.

The findings fully present the facts essential to the determination of the questions presented by defendant's brief. The plaintiff corporation, ever since March 13, 1899, has been engaged solely in closing its affairs and liquidating its indebtedness under a judgment given on that day by the superior court of Santa Clara county in an action brought by the Attorney General, in pursuance of notification from the bank commissioners, who had determined that the plaintiff was insolvent. The proceedings and judgment were had under the provisions of the act creating a board of bank commissioners and prescribing their duties, approved March 30, 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 740, c. 481), as amended in 1887 (St. 1887, p. 90, c. 80), and 1895 (St. 1895, p. 172, c. 167). The nature and effect of this amended act have been so fully discussed in comparatively recent opinions of this court as to render further statement in that regard unnecessary. See Argues v. Union Savings Bank, 133 Cal. 139, 65 Pac. 307; Bank of National City v. Johnston, 133 Cal. 185, 65 Pac. 383; Union Savings Bank v. Dunlap, 135 Cal. 628, 67 Pac. 1084. Ever since the judgment of the superior court was given, the directors of plaintiff corporation, appointed in the manner provided by the act, have been in the possession and control of the corporation and its assets for the purpose of closing its affairs and liquidating its indebtedness in accordance with the provisions of said act. The capital stock of such corporation was $1,000,000, divided into 10,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. On this only $30 per share had been paid at the time of the adjudication in insolvency. On May 22, 1899, the directors in liquidation levied an assessment of $10 per share, which was collected so far as it could be, this defendant, among others, paying the assessment on his shares. On June 7, 1901, solely for the purpose of satisfying the claims of the creditors of the corporation, and it being necessary to so do in order to satisfy such claims, the directors in liquidation, acting strictly in accord with the provisions of the Civil Code relative to assessments (section 331 et seq.), levied the assessment in suit of $50 per share, and, the same not having been paid, elected to proceed by suit to recover the amount of the same. Civ. Code, § 349. Defendant is the owner of 52 shares, upon which only $40 per share has been paid, leaving $60 unpaid on the capital stock.

It is, of course, unnecessary to cite authorities in support of the proposition that unpaid subscriptions upon the capital stock constitute assets of the corporation available to its creditors. In a case arising under the provisions of this banking act, Mr. Justice Temple, speaking for the court, after stating this universally recognized proposition, said, "I have no doubt but that in some form the liquidators may, in case of necessity, resort to this fund." Bank of Ntl. City v. Johnston, supra. The question as to whether they could do so by the assessment proceedings provided by the Civil Code was not involved in that case, and was not decided therein. That question was, however, presented and decided in the later case of Union Savings Bank v. Dunlap, 135 Cal. 628, 67 Pac. 1084, which was an action brought against a stockholder upon the same assessment that is here involved. It was there held that the provisions of the Civil Code relative to assessments furnished a mode for the collection of unpaid subscriptions, which might be followed. This was but following the general views announced in prior decisions as to the status and powers of the directors in liquidation, viz., that they are trustees invested with all the powers theretofore possessed by the corporation, so far as the same are appropriate in effecting "an equitable and economical distribution of the assets of the insolvent bank among its creditors," and that they can exercise such powers in the name of the corporation. They are therefore expressly authorized by the provisions of the Civil Code to levy an assessment for such a percentage of the amount unpaid upon the capital stock as will raise an amount sufficient to satisfy the claims of the creditors of the corporation (sections 331, 332, Civ. Code) and, so electing to do (section 349, Civ. Code), enforce the collection thereof by suit in the name of the corporation. This much is apparently established by the Dunlap Case, and is not seriously disputed by learned counsel for defendant. The record in this case, however, presents several questions that were not presented in that case.

1. Section 1 of the by-laws of the plaintiff corporation was as follows, viz.: "The name of this corporation is and shall be, 'Union Savings Bank of San Jose.' The capital stock is and shall be $1,000,000, divided into 10,000 shares of $100 each, 30 per cent. of which shall be paid up. No further call for payments upon the capital stock shall be made except by a two-thirds vote of all stock issued and outstanding." There has never been any call for the unpaid capital by a "two-third vote" of the stockholders. It is urged that this by-law is a complete bar to a recovery in this action, the contention being that this action can be maintained only upon the theory of an unpaid subscription which defendant has expressly or impliedly agreed to pay, and that the by-law shows an express agreement to the effect that in no event shall more than $30 per share be required to be paid by a stockholder, except upon a contingency which has not happened. It is unnecessary to here discuss the question as to the effect of an agreement of the nature here claimed to have existed between a corporation and its stockholders upon the rights of creditors of the corporation, further than to state that it is universally recognized that, when properly attacked, it can generally have no force as against such creditors and certainly never against creditors without notice. See Vermont, etc., Co. v. Declez, etc., Co., 135 Cal. 579, 67 Pac. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143. The by-law in question, which, so far as material, simply provided that no further call should be made except by a two-thirds vote of all stock issued and outstanding, must be construed in connection with the provisions of the statute. A corporation has no power to adopt a by-law that is not consistent with the Constitution and laws of this state. Civ. Code, § 301; People's Bank v. Superior Court, 104 Cal. 649, 38 Pac. 452, 29 L. R. A. 844, 43 Am. St. Rep. 147. So far, therefore, as a by-law may be inconsistent with statutory provisions, it must yield. Our statutes make full and complete provision for the protection of creditors of a corporation in this behalf by expressly authorizing the directors thereof to levy and collect an assessment for such percentage of the full amount unpaid upon the capital stock as may be necessary to satisfy the claims of the creditors. Civ. Code, § 331, and subdivision 1 of section 332. This statutory provision, enacted for the protection of creditors, enters into and becomes a part of every contract between the corporation and its stockholders, whether evidenced by by-law or not; and the corporation cannot, without the consent of the creditor, yield up this power by a contract with stockholders. This power of the corporation, as we have already seen, vests in the directors in liquidation, and may be exercised by them in the name of the corporation in the manner prescribed for its exercise by the corporation. Considered in connection with these statutory provisions, the by-law relied upon as constituting a contract cannot be held to have reference to any assessment that might be thereafter levied in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Code relating to the levy and collection of assessments, but simply meant that no such call for unpaid capital as might ordinarily, in the absence of a contrary stipulation in the contract of subscription, as to the time or manner of payment, be made by the directors by a simple resolution to that effect, would be made, except by a two-thirds vote of the stockholders. An example of this character of case is to be found in California S. H. Co. v. Callender, 94 Cal. 120, 29 Pac. 859, 28 Am. St. Rep. 99, where by the contract of subscription the stockholders had expressly agreed to pay the unpaid portion upon demand. Where, however, there is no such express agreement, the promise to pay the unpaid capital upon such a call is implied from the taking of the stock, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary. Here there was such a contrary agreement, and consequently such a call could be made only by a two-thirds vote of the stockholders. But by virtue of the provisions of the Civil Code relative to assessments, which entered into and became a part of the subscriber's contract with the corporation, the corporation had the power, acting through the board of directors, after one-fourth of its capital stock had been subscribed, to levy and collect assessments for the various purposes specified in the Code, including the power to levy and collect an assessment for the full amount unpaid upon the capital stock, if such amount was necessary to satisfy the claims of creditors of the corporation, or for such percentage thereof as was necessary for that purpose; and this power, so far as amounts unpaid upon the capital stock and necessary to satisfy the claims of creditors are concerned, was vested in the directors in liquidation.

2. Certain provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure prescribing limitations as to the time within which actions may be commenced, were pleaded in bar of this action, viz., subdivisions 1 and 4 of section 338, subdivision 1 of section 339, and section 359. The trial court expressly found in terms that the action was not barred by any of these provisions, but at the same time specifically found the facts from which these general findings were deduced, and it is conceded that the question as to whether these specific findings show a case not barred by the statutory provisions invoked is properly before this court for review. This action was commenced on April 2, 1902. The assessment in suit was levied on June 7, 1901, and the election to proceed by action to recover the amount thereof was made on July 12, 1901. Whether the liability of a stockholder to pay an assessment on stock on account of unpaid capital be a liability created by statute, within the meaning of subdivision 1, § 338, Code Civ. Proc., or a liability created by law, within the meaning of section 359, Code Civ. Proc., and the limitation thereof three years, or is a liability arising from contract, within the meaning of subdivision 1 of section 339, Code Civ. Proc., and the limitation therefore two years, it will be seen that this action was brought within the statutory time after the levy of the assessment here involved. But the decree of the superior court determining plaintiff corporation to be insolvent, restraining it from further carrying on business, and requiring the bank commissioners to surrender the property of the corporation to the directors thereof for the purpose of liquidation, was made on March 13, 1899, more than three years prior to the commencement of this action. It is urged that the liability of the stockholder in this case rested upon his implied contract to pay calls made for unpaid subscriptions, and was purely a liability arising upon a contract, not in writing, and that the statute requiring actions on such contracts to be brought within two years after the cause of action accrues is applicable. It is further urged that, while such a cause of action would ordinarily accrue only upon a call made by the directors of the corporation for the unpaid capital, when the corporation was decreed to be insolvent and put into process of liquidation by the superior court, the liability of the stockholders to pay so much of the unpaid capital as was necessary to satisfy the claims of creditors at once became fixed, and the cause of action therefor accrued, and became barred upon the expiration of two years. Upon the general question as to whether, in the event of the insolvency of a corporation and its ceasing to be a going concern, a cause of action for unpaid capital payable upon call accrues immediately upon insolvency, without any call therefor having been made, there is, it must be conceded, some conflict in the opinions of the federal and state courts that have had occasion to discuss the proposition. There has, however, been no expression of opinion by this court thereon, except in the case of Glenn v. Saxton, 68 Cal. 358, 9 Pac. 420, which was an action upon what was called an assessment for unpaid capital for the purpose of paying debts, levied upon stock of an insolvent corporation by a Virginia court. The law of Virginia, the state wherein the corporation was organized, provided that a portion of the capital should be paid at the time of subscription, "and the residue thereof as required by the president and directors," and that, if the same was not paid as required, it might be recovered by action. It was held by this court, quoting from and adopting and assenting to the views of the Court of Appeals of Maryland in Glenn, Trustee, v. Williams, 60 Md. 93, 122, that the terms of the statute became a part of the contract of subscription; that the subscriber undertook to pay the residue as required by the president and directors; that the call made by the court was the same, in effect, as if it had been made by such president and directors, and that, when made, the contract of the defendant to pay became absolute, and the cause of action accrued. In the portion of the opinion of the Maryland court quoted in Glenn v. Saxton, and as to which this court said, "In this we entirely agree," is the following, viz.: "After the payment of the two dollars per share, there was nothing due from the subscriber to stock until an authorized call was made for the residue. The contract contemplated the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of the president and directors as to the times and amounts of future payments on the stock, and there was nothing due from the stockholders until such amounts were determined on and regularly called for. Until a regular call made, there was no unconditional liability on the part of the stockholder to pay. Until then he could not know when to pay, or how much he would be required to pay. The subscription, therefore, was conditional as to the times and amounts of payment; and consequently there was no fixed obligation of the stockholder to pay, and no right of action against him, until an assessment and call made either by the president and directors or by the order of a court of competent jurisdiction. It is for the amount of the assessment made that the right of action accrues, and not for the whole balance of the unpaid subscription, unless the whole amount be called for; and it is only from the time of the assessment and call made that the statute [of limitations] runs in favor of the defendant." There is nothing opposed to these views in any California case that has been brought to our attention. Kohler v. Agassiz, 99 Cal. 9, 33 Pac. 741, specially relied upon by defendant, was a case decided upon the peculiar language of the contract of subscription, whereby the defendants had agreed to pay "in such installments and at such times as said defendant might under and according to the laws of the said state of California be lawfully called upon and required by said corporation to pay the same," and it was pointed out in the opinion in that case, the question being as to whether the action had been prematurely brought, that this provision did not say anything about the manner in which the corporation should call upon the subscribers. Whether the distinction made by the court in that case was well founded or not is immaterial here, for clearly it was not intended therein to hold that a cause of action for money due only on proper call could accrue before such call was made. The rule stated in Glenn v. Saxton, supra, is concededly the rule of the United States Supreme Court and the appellate courts of several of the states. As to banking corporations in process of liquidation under the provisions of the banking act of 1887, as amended in 1895, and the provisions of our Code, we have no doubt that it is the true rule, at least so far as assessments levied under the provisions of the Civil Code, for such amount of the unpaid capital as may be necessary to satisfy the claims of creditors, are concerned. The reasoning of the Maryland court approved by this court in Glenn v. Saxton is peculiarly applicable to such a case. As was pointed out in Union Savings Bank v. Dunlap, supra, such a corporation, after a decree adjudging it insolvent, while restrained from continuing the banking business, continues to be a corporation until its affairs are closed, and is a going concern for all purposes of liquidation. Subject to certain rights in the court as to the removal and appointment of directors, the management of the affairs of the corporation in liquidation is in the hands of the directors of such corporation, under the direction of the bank commission. These directors are invested with all the powers of the corporation, so far as the same are essential to liquidation, including the power to assess the stock, so far as is necessary to satisfy the claims of creditors, to the full amount unpaid upon the par value thereof, and collect the amount from the stockholder. The obligation of the stockholder as to this unpaid capital is not to pay the whole amount thereof in any event, but only to pay such portion thereof as such directors, in the management of the affairs of the corporation, may find necessary to satisfy the claims of creditors, and call for in such mode as may be required by the law. Such an obligation involves, as was said in the Maryland case, the exercise of judgment and discretion on the part of the directors as to the times and amounts of payments on account of unpaid capital, and there can be no amount actually due until the amounts are determined on and regularly called for. The directors, in the exercise of the powers confided to them, are acting not only in the interest of the creditors, but also in the interests of the stockholders, and the act provided a summary process by which the court might remove any director found by it to have been guilty of fraud or negligence, and not a proper person "to be intrusted with the closing of the affairs and business of such corporation in the interest of the depositors, creditors, and stockholders thereof." This provision apparently afforded full remedy to any stockholder who might be aggrieved by any unnecessary delay on the part of the directors in determining upon and calling for such amount of the unpaid capital as might be necessary. The act further provided that the affairs of such a corporation must be closed within four years, unless further time was allowed by the bank commissioners. We are unable to see how it can be held, under our statutory provisions, that the power of the directors to levy the assessments mentioned in subdivision 1 of section 332, Civ. Code, can be impaired by lapse of time, so long as the corporation is a going concern for purposes of liquidation, or how any provision of our statute of limitations can commence to run as to the amount of any such assessment, until the levy thereof.

Much reliance is placed by learned counsel for defendant upon expressions of this court in the opinion in Harrigan v. Home Life Ins. Co., 128 Cal. 531, 58 Pac. 180, 61 Pac. 99, in support of their contention that it was within the power of the directors in liquidation to make the demand for the unpaid capital at any time; that it should have been made immediately upon the adjudication of insolvency; and that the statute commenced to run from the time the call might have been made, whether it was made or not. The case cited was an action upon a life insurance policy, where the covenant of the insurer was to pay "after due notice and satisfactory proof of death," etc., which covenant, this court said, practically called for a demand only; and the well-settled rule that, where a right or claim has fully accrued except for some demand or presentation of claim to be made by the party as a condition precedent to legal relief, which such party can at any time make, if he so chooses, the cause of action has accrued for the purpose of the statute of limitations, was applied. See, also, Barnes v. Glide, 117 Cal. 8, 48 Pac. 804, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153; San Luis Obispo Co. v. Gage, 139 Cal. 408, 73 Pac. 174. We are unable to see the application of this rule to an assessment levied under the provisions of the Civil Code. As we view the law of this state upon the subject, the Legislature has seen fit to invest the directors in liquidation with the power to inaugurate assessment proceedings to the extent of such amount unpaid upon the capital as they may find necessary for the payment of creditors at any time during the process of liquidation. The matter is one entirely within their discretion, and until the levy of the assessment there is no liability of any kind on the part of the stockholder in regard thereto, other than the liability, inseparably connected in this state with the holding of stock in corporations, of being assessed thereon. The levy of the assessment is essential to the creation of the liability, which is here sought to be enforced. Of course, this court did not, by merely citing in the opinion in Harrigan v. Home, etc., Co., supra, the case of Gt. Western Tel. Co. v. Purdy, 83 Iowa, 430, 50 N. W. 45, in support of the rule applied, adopt the views of the Iowa court as to the application of that rule to the facts of that case.

It perhaps should be stated that the trial court found that it was impossible for the board of directors prior to the 1st day of March, 1901, to determine with any degree of certainty the value of the assets of the bank, or readily or correctly value the same, but that they might readily have ascertained at the outset that there was a deficiency of at least $200,000.

Some reliance is placed by defendant upon the fact that on October 27, 1899, the directors in liquidation did, by resolution, order and levy an assessment of $60 per share, and give notice thereof by mail to this defendant. No further proceeding appears to have been taken thereon. On January 26, 1901, this resolution was by another resolution of the directors declared rescinded, vacated, and set aside, and the right to collect the same waived. Nothing was ever paid thereon by any stockholder. It is urged that the statute of limitations commenced to run in favor of defendant at the date of this levy, if it had not commenced before. As to that assessment, it may be conceded that this contention is well founded. But the assessment not being paid, the amount theretofore unpaid upon the capital stock still remained unpaid, and the power of the directors in liquidation to levy assessments under subdivision 1 of section 332, Civ. Code, was not exhausted. If the board of directors had the power to levy another assessment, as it clearly did under our views as to the law, the statute of limitations as to such new assessment did not commence to run prior to such levy.

On January 26, 1901, the directors again adopted a resolution levying an assessment of $60 per share, which resolution was rescinded on June 7, 1901. There was never any attempt to enforce this assessment. This resolution is entirely immaterial to the controversy as to the statute of limitations, for this action was commenced within two years thereafter; but what has been said as to the resolution of October 27, 1899, is also applicable to this. Defendant's claim as to the statute of limitations is based upon the theory that the liability of the stockholder finds no support in the statute, but comes entirely, if at all, from his implied promise to pay upon call. When it is once established that there also existed an implied promise on his part, imported into his contract by reason of the provisions of our statute, to pay such assessments as might from time to time be levied by the directors, in the manner provided by law, to meet the claims of the creditors of the corporation up to the full amount of the unpaid capital, if necessary, the force of his argument is much impaired.

There is much force in the argument that the directors should be required to move promptly in the closing up of the affairs of the bank, both on account of the interests of the creditors and those of the stockholders, but, as we have attempted to show, the remedy for any party desirous of such speedy adjustment is in his own hands. We are satisfied that the trial court was correct in the conclusions reached upon the defense of the statute of limitations.

3. We do not understand it to be contended that payments made by defendant to creditors of the plaintiff upon judgments obtained against him by such creditors upon defendant's liability to them under section 322 of the Civil Code can be considered as payments made upon the capital stock. The law would not sustain such a contention.

4. On March 2, 1903, which was nearly a year after this action was commenced, but prior to judgment, the bank commission act of 1878, as amended in 1887 and 1895, was repealed by an act of the Legislature, which act contained no saving clause as to any pending litigation. St. 1903, p. 73, c. 65. It is urged that the effect of this repeal was to destroy the cause of action sued on, and abate this action. We are satisfied that the repeal of this act could not affect the judgment theretofore given in pursuance of its provisions decreeing the plaintiff corporation insolvent, and requiring it to proceed, under the management of its directors, to close up its affairs and liquidate its indebtedness. The judgment had become final, and had fixed the rights of all parties interested. Thenceforth the directors of the corporation were trustees, charged by the judgment with the performance of such duties as were essential to a closing of the affairs of the corporation in the interests of the creditors and stockholders, and invested, by the judgment, with all the powers of the corporation necessary therefor. It is true that the bank commission act gave the bank commissioners certain supervisory authority over them, but their status as trustees having all the powers conferred by law upon directors of corporations so far as such powers were necessary to liquidation was fixed by the judgment. As such trustees they levied the assessment in suit, and are proceeding to collect the same by action, not acting under any authority conferred by the bank commission act, but as directors of the corporation, under authority conferred by certain provisions of the Civil Code relative to corporations, which provisions have not been amended or repealed since the levy. If the right to levy this assessment had been given by the act that has been repealed, or if the effect of the repeal of such act had been to remove the directors from the office of trustee, a case would be presented which might call for the application of the authorities cited by counsel for defendant. It may be suggested that, if it be conceded that the repealing act has the sweeping effect of annulling all that has been done under the act repealed relative to plaintiff, the judgment of the superior court decreeing it insolvent would fall with the rest, and we would have the plaintiff corporation a going concern for all purposes, with all the powers of a going concern, including the power to levy and collect this assessment to satisfy the claims of its creditors, notwithstanding the by-law relied on. We are then forced to the conclusion that, if the repeal did not affect the judgment of the superior court, the power of the directors to collect the assessment levied under the provisions of the Civil Code was not impaired by such repeal; and if, on the other hand, such repeal did operate to vacate said judgment and all proceedings had under the act, the corporation continued a going concern, with the power to levy and collect the assessment in suit. As already stated, however, we are satisfied that such repeal did not affect the judgment of the superior court. This disposes of all the points made by defendant on this appeal.

We concur: VAN DYKE, J.; SHAW, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment and generally in the opinion of the court. As to the effect of the call or assessment of October 27, 1899, if a cause of action had accrued to the corporation by reason of the call alone, I think the statute of limitations would have commenced running at the date of delinquency fixed by the resolution; and, if it had once commenced running, I do not think the subsequent rescission of the call would have extended the time for commencing the action. But it requires something more than a mere call to establish a right of action under the statute. The call must be followed by a resolution to proceed by action regularly adopted after the assessments have become delinquent. Until the adoption of such a resolution no stockholder can be sued. This was the point, and the only point, decided in Bank of National City v. Johnston, 133 Cal. 185, 65 Pac. 383, as will more clearly appear from the department decision reported in 60 Pac. 776, where the facts are more clearly stated. Until the resolution to proceed by action is adopted, the whole matter remains, as it was before, in the discretion of the trustees, and they may either rescind the first call and afterwards adopt another, or complete their right of action under the first call by resolving to enforce it by that method. It may be added that, if the statute had been set in motion at the date of the first call in October, 1899, the action was not barred by subdivision 1 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it is by no means clear that this is not an action upon a statutory liability within the meaning of that section. Besides what is said in the opinion of the court in regard to the effect of the repeal of the bank commissioner's act, I am of the opinion that it was beyond the power of the Legislature, by the repeal of that act, to destroy the only remedy available to the creditors of the corporation for the enforcement of their contract rights.

1. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Albert G. Burnett, Judge.

Action by Thomas McGarrigle against the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum of San Francisco. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Thompson and C. H. Pond, for appellant. D. C. Murphy and John L. Seawell (Frank J. Sullivan, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was to quiet title to 42 acres of land in the county of Sonoma. Cordelia Jones during her lifetime conveyed an estate in the land in question to the plaintiff, who was her nephew. Subsequently Cordelia Jones died, and in the probate of her estate this land was distributed to Catherine McGarrigle, the mother of this plaintiff, subject to a life estate in plaintiff. Thereafter Catherine McGarrigle conveyed her fee to plaintiff, who instituted this action. Defendant and appellant claims by the deed above referred to from Cordelia Jones to the plaintiff, and the construction of that instrument is determinative of this case. It was in language as follows:

"This indenture, made this 10th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-nine, between Cordelia Jones of Sonoma county, state of California, the party of the first part, and Thomas McGarrigle of the same place, the party of the second part.

"Witnesseth, that the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the sum of love and affection and one dollar money of the United States of America, to her in hand paid by the said party of the second part, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, has granted, bargained and sold, conveyed and confirmed, and by these presents does grant, bargain and sell, convey and confirm unto the said party of the second part, during his lifetime, all that certain lot, piece or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the township of Santa Rosa, county of Sonoma, state of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit: [Here follows description.]

"It is the purpose of the party of the first part by this deed, that after the death of the said party of the second part, the said described lands shall become and be the property of the Roman Catholic Girls' Orphan Asylum of San Francisco, state of California."

It is upon the italicized portion of this conveyance that appellant relies, but we are of opinion that the trial court correctly construed this clause as containing no operative words of grant, and as failing to convey any present interest in the property. It will be noted that the appellant is nowhere mentioned as a grantee in the deed, and that the language of the clause itself is but an expression of the grantor's purpose in the future disposition of the property. It left in her a reversion after the life estate to Thomas McGarrigle, which required some future conveyance, or some testamentary disposition, to effectuate its transfer to the orphan asylum. But not only was there a failure of operative words to convey to the asylum, but no present interest can be said to pass under the language which was employed. It is fundamental that, while possession or enjoyment of an estate may be deferred, a deed, to be operative, must pass a present interest. This was not done by the instrument in question. The express purpose was —giving to it its fullest effect—that the land should become the property of the orphan asylum after the death of McGarrigle, but should not become its property before. Such attempted dispositions have been uniformly held to be inoperative in deeds. Bigley v. Souvey, 45 Mich. 370, 8 N. W. 98; Leaver v. Gauss, 62 Iowa, 314, 17 N. W. 522; Reed v. Hazelton, 37 Kan. 321, 15 Pac. 177; Sperber v. Balster, 66 Ga. 317; Pinkham v. Pinkham, 55 Neb. 729, 76 N. W. 411; Cunningham v. Davis, 62 Miss. 366; Donald v. Nesbitt (Ga.) 15 S. E. 367.

FALSE PRETENSES — CORPUS DELICTI—CHARACTER OF EVIDENCE REQUIRED—CRIMINAL LAW —INSTRUCTIONS TO ACQUIT—APPEAL—MATTERS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW.

1. The refusal of a motion at the close of the people's evidence to instruct the jury to acquit is the subject of an exception under Pen. Code § 1170, subd. 3, authorizing an exception to the decision of any question of law not a matter of discretion, or to a charge to the jury, and may be reviewed on appeal from the judgment under section 1259, providing that on an appeal from a judgment the court may review any intermediate order or ruling involving the merits, or which may have affected the judgment, and on such appeal the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict is presented for review.

2. The elements necessary to establish the corpus delicti of the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses, as defined by Pen. Code, § 532, are false statements adapted to the fraudulent purpose, and money parted with upon the faith of such statements.

3. The corpus delicti necessary to establish the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses must be proved by evidence independent of the extrajudicial confessions or admissions of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, § 1226.]

4. Although Pen. Code, § 1118, only authorizes the court to advise the jury to acquit, and provides that they shall not be bound by his advice, yet, where there is no competent evidence of the corpus delicti, so that it becomes the duty of the court to advise an acquittal, the fact that counsel, moving orally at the close of the people's case, uses the word "instruct," instead of "advise," does not justify a denial of the motion.

Shaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Smith, Judge.

M. T. Ward was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and appeals. Reversed.

Emmet H. Wilson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant was convicted on a charge of obtaining money by false pretenses (Pen. Code, § 532), and appeals from the judgment, as well as from the order denying his motion for a new trial. In support of his appeal from the order he makes the point that the evidence in the record is not sufficient to sustain the conviction. This is practically conceded by the Attorney General, but he objects to any consideration of the point because the record does not disclose the grounds of the motion, and therefore we cannot know that it was based either wholly or in part upon the alleged insufficiency of the evidence.

The motion which was filed by the defendant is not included in the bill of exceptions, but it seems that the clerk, in entering the order denying a new trial, inserted in his minutes, and in immediate connection with the order, a full copy of the motion, and it is certified to us in that form; that is to say, as a part of the minutes of the proceedings upon the motion. The contention seems to be that, since it is not the duty of the clerk to record anything but the order, his statement of the grounds of the motion must be disregarded, and that, under rule 29 of this court (64 Pac. xii), they can never be considered except when set out in a bill of exceptions. It is doubtful whether this rule applies. It has been held not to apply to the order appealed from, or to anything appearing on the face of the record of the order. Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 612, 35 Pac. 345, 639. But probably the statute does. At least, we are not prepared to say that a defendant in a criminal cause, seeking a review of an order denying him a new trial on the ground that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence, can be excused from showing by his bill of exceptions that he moved on that ground. For, unless that is one of the grounds of his motion, and shown to be so by his bill of exceptions, the attention of the court and of the district attorney is not called to the necessity of setting out the evidence by amendment where material evidence has been omitted from the bill as proposed; and this court, under such circumstances, might feel constrained to presume that there was other evidence introduced at the trial sufficient to cover any deficiencies apparent in the record. These questions, however, do not require to be decided in the present case, for, conceding that the evidence cannot be reviewed on the appeal from the order, the question of its sufficiency to sustain the verdict is presented by the appeal from the judgment.

When the prosecution rested, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury to acquit. The motion was denied, and the defendant excepted. This ruling clearly involved the whole merits of the case, and necessarily affected the judgment. It is therefore reviewable on appeal from the judgment (Pen. Code, § 1259), and was the subject of an exception under subdivision 3 of section 1170. It was also an exception which, equally with a motion for a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, gave notice to the judge and the district attorney that, if there was competent evidence to sustain the charge, they must see to it that the bill of exceptions, as settled, must show the fact. We are therefore justified in assuming in this case that, if the evidence in the record fails to support the verdict, then the evidence adduced at the trial was equally deficient.

The charge was obtaining money by false pretenses. The elements of this crime necessary to the establishment of the corpus delicti are false statements adapted to the fraudulent purpose, and money parted with upon the faith of such statements. As in other cases, the corpus delicti must be proved by evidence independent of the extrajudicial confessions or admissions of the defendant. People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 Pac. 440. this case there was no substantial evidence of the falsity of the statements alleged to have been made by the defendant, aside from the testimony of witnesses as to his admissions. And this made it the duty of the court, upon request of the defendant, to advise the jury to acquit. It is true that in making his motion he used the word "instruct," instead of "advise," and it was held by this court in the case of People v. Daniels, 105 Cal. 266, 38 Pac. 720, not to have been an error to refuse an instruction in writing, similarly worded, because section 1118 of the Penal Code only authorizes the judge to advise the jury to acquit when he deems the evidence insufficient to warrant a conviction. The distinction between the right of the judge to advise a verdict of acquittal and the power to compel a verdict is, of course, an important one, in some aspects of the question, and was important in the case of People v. Horn, 70 Cal. 18, 11 Pac. 470, which was cited as authority in the case of People v. Daniels. But if the case is such that it is the duty of the court to advise an acquittal upon the ground that there is no evidence of the corpus delicti of a character absolutely required by the law to sustain a conviction, the fact that counsel, moving orally at the close of the people's case, uses the word "instruct," instead of "advise," does not justify a denial of the motion. To say that it does is to sacrifice substantial justice to a mere form. In People v. Jones, 31 Cal. 571—a well-considered decision frequently cited in later cases, and never disapproved—it was held that in such a case the court should instruct the jury that the corpus delicti was not proved. This case was not cited or referred to in People v. Daniels, though much more directly in point than People v. Horn, where the question under consideration was the effect of a former acquittal by a jury that had been instructed to acquit.

In People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 553, 57 Pac. 470, 45 L. R. A. 783, Justice Temple, in a case of conflicting evidence, and where the evidence was amply sufficient to sustain the conviction, expressed the opinion that the refusal of the judge to advise an acquittal was not the subject of an exception, but that statement was not necessary to his conclusion, and was not the ground of decision. We approve the doctrine of People v. Jones, that, when there is a clear failure of proof upon a material allegation of the charge, the defendant has a right to demand an instruction to the jury that there has been such failure of proof, and the fact that he moves for an instruction to acquit does not relieve the court of the duty of doing what the court in such case may do, i. e., advise an acquittal.

The judgment is reversed, and cause remanded.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

We concur in the judgment: ANGELLOTTI, J.; McFARLAND, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent. I think the judgment should be affirmed, for the reason that under the decisions in People v. Daniels, 105 Cal. 266, 38 Pac. 720, and People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 553, 57 Pac. 470, 45 L. R. A. 783, the record presents no question for review by this court.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Felix W. Ewing, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Soledad Gutierrez and others against Henry Wege. From a decree rendered, both parties appeal. Reversed.

G. H. Gould and W. R. Edwards, for plaintiffs. H. L. Poplin, for defendant.

GRAY, C. This action is brought to quiet title to the waters of Casitas creek, a small stream having its rise in a spring on the land of defendant, and flowing for some distance into the adjoining land of plaintiffs. The judgment in the case is as follows: "(1) That the defendant owns and is entitled to the sole and exclusive use of all the waters flowing from that certain spring situate upon the N. W. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 29 described in defendant's amended answer, and to all waters flowing in said Casitas creek above the reservoir situated near the south line of said land, and in the bed of said creek; (2) that, of the waters arising and flowing in said creek below said reservoir, the plaintiffs, as riparian owners, are entitled to $^{40}/_{41}$ thereof, and the defendant. as riparian owner, is entitled to the remainder; (3) that the defendant and his agents and employés are perpetually restrained and enjoined from hereafter obstructing or polluting in any wise the said Casitas creek below said reservoir; and (4) that neither party recover his costs or disbursements in this action." There are two appeals before us from this judgment. The plaintiffs appeal from the first paragraph thereof, and defendant appeals from the second, third, and fourth paragraphs. We are of opinion that the first paragraph of the judgment, wherein it is decreed that the defendant "owns and is entitled to the sole and exclusive use of all the waters," etc., is not warranted by the evidence taken at the trial.

Something upwards of five years before the commencement of the action, defendant had constructed a reservoir on his land in the channel of the creek in question, through which ran the waters from the spring. From this reservoir he had constructed small ditches on each side of the creek, through which he conveyed water for the purpose of irrigating a few acres of his land—not more than four or five acres at the outside. Defendant had also dug out the spring, and developed more water than naturally flowed from it. He had also laid pipes from the spring to his house, and by that means conducted water thereto for domestic use. He had also been accustomed to water horses and cattle at the creek below the reservoir, and perhaps above it. The evidence, however, failed to show that he had used all the water flowing in the spring and stream above the reservoir at all times for a period of five years prior to the commencement of the action. The defendant himself testified that "there was water sometimes that I did not use at all during the months of August and September." The defendant's wife testified, in speaking of her husband's use of the water: "He only used the water two different periods of the year. When he is not using it for irrigation, it runs in the creek." The foregoing evidence is undisputed, and is inconsistent with the finding of the court to the effect that for more than six years the defendant had adversely diverted and used all the waters of the spring and creek above the reservoir. Indeed, the evidence goes no farther than to show that the defendant had been making such reasonable use of the water for domestic purposes and for irrigation as he was entitled to do by reason of his being a riparian proprietor. The riparian owner, so long as his use of the water is within his rights as such riparian owner, gets no right or interest in the water additional to his riparian interest, even though such use extend for a period beyond five years. A use of the water strictly within his legal rights, and with which no other person has a right to interfere, cannot be called an adverse use for the purpose of conferring a property right or ownership in the water, under the statute of limitations. It is clear, then, that the defendant was not the owner of the water by adverse use. It is also plain that he was not the "owner" or entitled to the "exclusive use" of the water by virtue of being a riparian proprietor. As such riparian owner, the water was parcel of the land, and he, as against other riparian owners, was entitled only to a reasonable use of the water upon the riparian lands, with no power to convey it elsewhere to the detriment of the riparian owner below him on the stream. Even if we were to admit that the defendant had acquired a right as against the lower riparian proprietor by adverse use, still that right would be measured by the use that the water had been put to, and the defendant here would still not be the absolute owner of the water, to do with it as he pleased, nor would he be entitled to the use of it to any greater extent than he had already used it. This is illustrated in the recent case of Southern California Investment Company v. Wilshire (Cal.) 77 Pac. 767. Nor can it be said that the defendant owns "all the waters" flowing above the reservoir by reason of the fact that the waters of the spring percolated in the soil, and the flow therefrom had been increased by digging out the spring.

It must be admitted, from the record, that before the defendant worked upon this spring at all the waters found their way in some measure, at least, from the spring to the channel of the creek, and flowed down the latter to plaintiffs' land. It may be that the fact that the defendant, as a riparian proprietor, had worked upon the spring and increased its flow, would entitle him to a greater portion of the water, on a fair division of the same, than would otherwise fall to his lot. But he certainly did not, by increasing the flow, become the owner of all the flow. Nor was he the owner in any sense except as a riparian proprietor of any water which naturally found its way from the spring to the creek. And this is so whether the water percolated directly into the creek through the soil, or reached the creek in one or more running streams. The spring supplying the stream was itself a part of the stream, and the defendant had the same right in the spring as, and no greater right therein than, he had in the stream below. He had no different or better right to cut off the water in the spring or above the spring than he had to cut it off or divert it from the stream. Any interference with the supply of the stream was an interference with the lower riparian owner's right to have the water continue to run in the stream to his land. The defendant was entitled only to a reasonable use of the waters of all parts of the stream, including the spring. The part of the judgment complained of gives him more than this, and is wrong.

The appeal of the defendants is also well founded, at least in part. It is not consistent with the law of riparian rights in this state to enjoin a riparian owner from "obstructing in any wise" the riparian stream. It is necessary that he should "obstruct" it in some measure, at least, in order to make any use of the water, either for irrigation or for domestic or house use. At certain stages of so small a stream as this, even the watering of a few cattle might consume the entire stream, and thus obstruct and prevent the flow thereof down to plaintiffs' land. It has been said by this court that an upper riparian owner cannot consume the entire stream to the detriment of a lower landowner on such stream. And this, as a general rule, is undoubtedly correct, but it has its limitations. When the flowing stream, if all allowed to remain in the channel, will not reach the lands of the lower proprietor, the lower proprietor cannot be justly called a riparian proprietor at all. There is no stream of water flowing or that would flow through his land if left unobstructed. Hence he cannot be injured, and cannot be heard to complain, if the proprietor above him diverts or consumes all the water that he finds running on his own land. Again, a stream running through two pieces of land might be of such a character that, if the upper riparian owner made any use of it at all, it would be rendered useless to the owner lower down on the stream. Under such circumstances, we do not think that the upper owner should be deprived of all use, that the lower owner or owners may have some use of it. We think it should be conceded that there are some circumstances under which the upper riparian proprietor may divert and consume the entire stream for a time, at least, without committing any actionable wrong against the lower proprietors. In this class of cases the decree of the court should be made to fit the stream that it applies to, and, as a general rule, when the stream is small the parties can best be served by giving them the alternate use of the entire stream. The stream in this case was less than two miner's inches on the land of plaintiff, by actual measurement, when all the water from every source was flowing into it. The evidence shows that during the irrigation seasons or periods the defendant had been accustomed to take and use all the water flowing down to his reservoir in the stream, and that he had been doing this for a period of upwards of five years. Of course, he is entitled to continue this use. It is impossible, however, to frame a decree on the evidence before us, as it does not show the extent or duration of these periods of irrigation, when they begin, and when they end. The stream in this case, together with the various springs supplying it, should have been treated as a unit, instead of being divided into the waters above and the waters below defendant's reservoir. An equitable division of the entire water between the parties is the only practical solution of the case. The evidence in the case, however, is so uncertain and incomplete that no decree of practical benefit to the parties can be based upon it.

The part of the decree that neither party recover costs was a matter within the equitable discretion of the trial court. Section 1025, Code Civ. Proc.; Abram v. Stuart, 96 Cal. 235, 31 Pac. 44. But inasmuch as the case must go back for another trial, it is unnecessary for us to determine here whether the discretion was properly exercised.

We advise that the entire judgment be reversed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; SMITH, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the entire judgment is reversed: VAN DYKE, J.; SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

SIMMONS v. ZIMMERMAN et al. (L. A. 1,424.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—CONTRACTS—ASSIGNABILITY—VALIDITY OF TITLE—DETERMINATION—ESTOPPEL.

1. Where an option contract for the sale of real estate ran to the grantee, and to his heirs and assigns, it was subject to assignment, notwithstanding it contained a provision that the grantee should be the exclusive judge as to whether the title of the property in question was free from defects, incumbrances, etc., and as to whether or not he was willing to accept the same.

2. Where the grantors under an option contract for the sale of real estate, providing that the grantee should be the exclusive judge as to the validity of the title, furnished an abstract of title to the grantee's assignee, with notice of the assignment, in order to enable such assignee to pass on the validity of the title, the grantors were estopped to deny the assignability of the stipulation relating to the examination of the title, as well as all other portions of the contract.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by Sidney A. Simmons against Mrs. H. P. Zimmerman and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion in department, referred to in the dissenting opinion:

"COOPER, C. Action to recover $500 deposit made by plaintiff's assignor on agreement for sale of land by defendants. Plaintiff recovered judgment, from which defendants appeal on the judgment roll.

"The facts are found as alleged in the amended complaint. The court overruled defendants' demurrer to the said complaint, and, as the findings are no broader than the allegations of said complaint, the ruling upon the demurrer becomes the material question on this appeal. The said complaint states, in substance: That on the 25th day of January, 1902, one Lyttle and defendants entered into a written contract for the sale by defendants to said Lyttle of the lot described in said contract for the sum of $6,500, of which sum the $500 in controversy was paid to defendants as a deposit, the time of Lyttle's option to purchase under the contract being three months from February 1, 1902; that upon Lyttle giving notice to defendants that he was willing to purchase, the defendants should furnish for his examination a certificate of title of said lands, made by some reputable abstract company. Lyttle assigned his interest in the contract to one West, and West gave notice that he was willing to purchase said lands according to the terms of the contract. Thereupon defendants had made and delivered to West the proper certificates or abstract of title. The contract provided: 'The first party shall have twenty days after the delivery of said certificate of title to him, as aforesaid, within which to examine and approve or disapprove the title to said property as shown by said certificate, and the first party shall be the exclusive judge as to whether or not the title to said lands and premises is free and clear of and from all defects, liens, incumbrances, taxes, and assessments whatsoever, and as to whether or not he is willing to accept the same. In the event said first party does not give notice that he will purchase said lands and premises as aforesaid, then the said sum of ($500) five hundred dollars, the consideration for this agreement, shall be forfeited to said second party as liquidated damages; but if the said first party shall give such notice and shall accept said certificate of title, then said sum shall be credited on account of the purchase price of said land and premises, and if the title to said land and premises shall be rejected by first party, then the said sum shall be returned to said party of the first part.' It is alleged and found that Lyttle made the assignment to West on the 10th day of April, 1902, for a valuable consideration; that West assigned to plaintiff on the 12th day of May, 1902, and that plaintiff is the owner of the said contract, and all rights thereunder, by reason of said assignment; that on the 1st day of May, 1902, the defendants furnished to West the certificate of title made by the abstract company, and thereafter, 'on the 20th day of May, 1902, this plaintiff duly notified said defendants that he rejected and disapproved of the title to said land and premises as shown by said certificate, and that he refused to accept said certificate of title or said title, and disapproved of the same,' and demanded a return of the said $500.

"There is no allegation that the title was in any manner defective, nor that there were any liens or incumbrances of any kind existing upon the premises. The plaintiff places himself and his rights squarely upon the proposition that the contract made the party of the first part (Lyttle) the exclusive judge as to whether or not the title was defective, and as to whether or not 'he was willing to accept the same.' It is 'so nominated in the bond' that Lyttle, the party of the first part, is to be such exclusive judge. The courts generally hold that parties have the right to make any contract which is not unlawful nor against public policy. They have the right to provide for an arbitrator, whose decision, in the absence of fraud, shall be final. They have the right, in making a contract for the sale of lands, to make an attorney or any one else the exclusive and final judge as to whether or not the title is defective. In such case the courts are inclined to leave the parties to abide by the contract as they have made it, and not to make a different one for them. Church v. Shanklin, 95 Cal. 626, 30 Pac. 789, 17 L. R. A. 207; Allen v. Pockwitz, 103 Cal. 85, 36 Pac. 1039, 42 Am. St. Rep. 99; Flanagan v. Fox (Com. Pl.) 23 N. Y. Supp. 48; Averett, Trustee, et al. v. Lipscombe, 76 Va. 404; Hudson v. Buck, 7 Chan. Div. 683, 23 Eng. Reps. (Moak's Notes) 808; cases cited in notes to Church v. Shanklin (Cal.) 17 L. R. A. 207. But in this case the $500 was to be returned only when the title had been rejected by Lyttle. He was the party specially selected to pass upon the title, and to be the exclusive judge as to whether or not he was willing to accept the same. As plaintiff has invoked the aid of the contract, he must be held to it himself. He does not allege that Lyttle ever examined the certificate of title or rejected it. The conditions upon which the $500 was to be returned have never occurred.

"Plaintiff alleges that he refused to accept and rejected the title. But he had no authority, under the contract, to pass upon the title, nor to reject it. Defendants never agreed that he should do so. They may have been perfectly willing that Lyttle should pass upon the title. They may have had special confidence in his legal ability, his honesty and moral character, and in such degree that they felt assured that he would do nothing except what was right, and that he would not reject the title unless there was a valid reason for so doing. They might have had no such confidence in any other person. Lyttle may have concluded that the title was all right, but that he had made a bad bargain, and would forfeit the $500. Plaintiff may have purchased the contract on speculation. He avers in his complaint that the right to the moneys deposited, and to demand, sue for, and receive the same, was assigned to him before commencing the action. If he means by this that he procured the assignment for the purpose of bringing the suit upon a doubtful claim, in such case the court would not aid him. Sanborn v. Doe, 92 Cal. 153, 28 Pac. 105, 27 Am. St. Rep. 101. The agreement to purchase the land of defendants could be assigned. Such assignment of the contract, with all the rights thereunder, would have carried the right to recover the $500 in case the title should in fact prove to be defective. It did not carry the right of making plaintiff the exclusive judge of the title instead of Lyttle. Defendants never agreed that Lyttle or his assignee should be the exclusive judge of the title. The assignment of the contract did not carry with it, as an incident, a contract that was never made. Defendants never consented to make plaintiff a judge of the title. The essence of the stipulation in the original contract that Lyttle should be the exclusive judge of the title was the personal confidence placed in him, and that he should personally pass upon the title. Where a contract provides for services of a personal nature, involving the peculiar fitness or ability of the party to perform the services, such contract as to such services cannot be assigned to one party without the consent of the other. The contract in such case is made by reason of the trust and confidence placed in the person selected. Personal performance is of the essence of the contract, and such contract cannot be assigned by one party, so as to bind the other to a different contract from that which he made. British Wagon Co. v. Lee & Co., 5 Queen's Bench Div. 149; Sloan v. Williams et al., 138 Ill. 46, 27 N. E. 531, 12 L. R. A. 496; Devlin v. Mayor et al., 63 N. Y. 17; Burrill on Assignments (6th Ed.) note 5, p. 105; La Rue v. Groezinger, 84 Cal. 285, 24 Pac. 43, 18 Am. St. Rep. 179. In the latter case this court said: 'Although the language may not show an intention that the contract should not be assigned, yet the nature of the case may be such that performance by another would be an essentially different thing from that contracted for.'

"We advise that the judgment be reversed, with directions to the lower court to sustain the defendants' demurrer to the amended complaint, and to allow the plaintiff a reasonable time to amend.

"We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; GRAY, C.

"For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to sustain defendants' demurrer to the amended complaint, and to allow the plaintiff a reasonable time to amend: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; McFARLAND, J."

Purrington & Adair, for appellants. Frank James, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The appeal is from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon the judgment roll alone. The action is to recover $500 deposit paid by the assignor of the plaintiff on an agreement for the sale of land by the defendants. The amended complaint sets out the agreement in full. It was entered into the 25th day of January, 1902, between B. F. Lyttle, of Los Angeles, as the party of the first part, and Mrs. H. P. Zimmerman and H. P. Zimmerman, her husband, of the county of Riverside, the party of the second part. The party of the second part to the agreement, in consideration of $50 paid to said party, "does hereby grant and give to said first party, and to his heirs and assigns, for the period of (7) seven days, the sole and exclusive right of purchasing the following lands and premises, represented to be owned in fee simple by said second party, and to be free and clear of all incumbrances, liens, taxes, assessments, and defects whatsoever, and situated in said county of Riverside, and more particularly described as follows, to wit." Then follows a description of the premises. "It is further agreed that upon the payment by the first party of the further sum of four hundred and fifty dollars ($450) this agreement shall be extended (3) three months from February 1st, 1902. * * * Upon the first party giving notice to the second party that he is willing to purchase said lands and premises, the second party shall, within thirty (30) days thereafter, furnish to first party, for his examination and approval or disapproval, a certificate of title of said lands and premises, made by some reputable abstract company of said county of Riverside, to be selected by said first party, and to be paid for by said second party. The first party shall have twenty days after the delivery of said certificate of title to him, as aforesaid, within which to examine and approve or disapprove the title to said property as shown by said certificate, and the first party shall be the exclusive judge as to whether or not the title to said lands and premises is free and clear of and from all defects, liens, incumbrances, taxes, and assessments whatsoever, and as to whether or not he is willing to accept the same. In the event said first party does not give notice that he will purchase said lands and premises as aforesaid, then the said sum of ($500) five hundred dollars, the consideration for this agreement, shall be forfeited to said second party, as liquidated damages; but if the said first party shall give such notice and shall accept said certificate of title, then said sum shall be credited on account of the purchase price of said lands and premises, and if the title to said lands and premises shall be rejected by first party, then the said sum shall be returned to the said party of the first part." It is alleged in the complaint that upon the execution of the agreement said Lyttle paid to the defendants the sum of $50, as in said agreement recited, and thereafter, on the 30th day of January, 1902, paid the further sum of $450, and thereupon said agreement became and was extended for the period of three months from and after February 1, 1902. That on the 10th day of April, 1902, the said Lyttle, for a valuable consideration, granted, assigned, and transferred to one William F. West all his right, title, interest, and estate in and to the said agreement, and on the 25th day of April, 1902, the said West, who was then and there the owner of the interest and the estate of said B. F. Lyttle, as aforesaid, duly notified the said defendants that he was willing to purchase the lands and premises described in said agreement, and for them to furnish to him, for his examination and approval or disapproval, a certificate of title to said lands and premises, to be made by the Riverside Abstract Company. Thereafter, on the 6th day of May, 1902, the said defendants furnished to said William F. West the said certificate of title made by said abstract company, and that on the 12th day of May, 1902, the said William F. West, for a valuable consideration, granted, assigned, and transferred to the plaintiff all his right, title, interest, and estate in and to the said agreement, and that the plaintiff is the owner and holder of all the said interest and estate. That thereafter, on May 26, 1902, the plaintiff duly notified said defendants that he rejected and disapproved of the title to said lands and premises as shown by said certificate, and that he refused to accept said certificate of title, or said title, and disapproved the same, and thereupon on said day demanded of said defendants, and each of them, that they pay and return to him the said sum of $500 so deposited, as aforesaid, but that the said defendants then and there refused, and still refuse, to pay the said sum, or any part thereof, and that the same is due and owing from said defendants to this plaintiff, together with interest thereon from the 20th day of May, 1902.

Defendants demurred to the amended complaint upon the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This demurrer being overruled, they answered the same. The findings of the court are substantially as the facts are alleged in the amended complaint. It is further found that defendants, upon the completion of the certificate of title requested by West, "knowing that said West had succeeded by assignment to the interest and estate of said Lyttle in the said agreement, as aforesaid, forwarded the said certificate of title by mail to said West, addressed to him at the said city of Los Angeles, state of California," but that the said West did not receive the same until the 6th day of May, 1902, and that within 20 days after the receipt and delivery of said certificate, as aforesaid, the plaintiff rejected the title to said lands and premises, and disapproved of the same, and personally notified the defendants thereof.

The main contention on the part of the appellants is that the rejection of the title and the demand for the return of the $500 could be made by one person only, to wit, B. F. Lyttle. Counsel in his brief says: "By the specific terms of the contract, Lyttle was made the 'exclusive judge' as to whether or not the title was clear, and as to whether or not he was willing to accept the same, and this exclusive right was not, and in the nature of things could not be, assignable without the consent of the appellants." This view was adopted by the department in its opinion, and upon that ground the judgment of the court below reversed. A rehearing, however, was granted for the reason that this view of the nature of the contract in question by the department was deemed to be erroneous. The contract in question by its terms was made assignable, but without this provision it is an obligation of such a character that it may be transferred by the owner, or upon his death would pass to his representatives. Civ. Code, § 954. "A right arising out of an obligation is the property of the person to whom it is due, and it may be transferred as such." Civ. Code, § 1458. The agreement, it will be seen, runs to the first party, his heirs and assigns, but it is contended by the appellants that the portion conferring the right to pass upon the title is personal in its nature, and is limited to Mr. Lyttle himself. There is nothing in the nature of the contract to justify this assumption. Suppose Mr. Lyttle had died. It would hardly be contended that the contract, and every portion of it, with all the benefits conferred therein, would not have succeeded to and been vested in his legal representative. There is nothing in the nature of the transaction or in the terms of the contract to justify the assumption that any peculiar trust or confidence was reposed in Mr. Lyttle alone, or that his successor in interest would not be as capable of passing on the title and governed by like fairness and good faith in the matter as he would. In La Rue v. Groezinger, 84 Cal. 287, 24 Pac. 44, 18 Am. St. Rep. 179, it is said: "And while it is to be conceded that men have perfect liberty to contract with whom they choose, and to exclude the idea of performance by another, yet, in the absence of anything indicating such an intention, we do not think that the court should indulge in speculation as to possible prejudice or fancied preference. It should not be assumed that the parties were influenced by unusual or conjectural motives merely because some men might be so affected under sumilar circumstances." And again, "If the language [of the contract] does not exclude the idea of performance by another, and the nature of the thing contracted for or the circumstances of the case do not show that the skill, credit, or other personal quality or circumstance of the party was a distinctive characteristic of the thing stipulated for, or a material inducement to the contract, then the contract is assignable." In Rued v. Cooper, 109 Cal. 682, 34 Pac. 98, it is said: "Assignability of things in action is now the rule, nonassignability the exception; and this exception is confined to wrongs done to the person, the reputation, or the feelings of the injured party, and to contracts of a purely personal nature, like promises of marriage." The complaint alleges that the court finds that the agreement to purchase was for a valuable consideration assigned by Lyttle. This means not assigned in part only, but as a whole, and it is an important portion of the agreement that the purchaser had the right to pass upon the title. If by the agreement, as contemplated, the purchaser had the right, for value, to assign the contract, as he clearly had in this case, it would be a strange condition of things that his assignee, after paying full value, should still be at the mercy of the assignor in reference to this portion of the contract, to wit, the title of the premises in question. But the defendants themselves evidently did not understand the contract to mean what is contended for by their counsel on the appeal. They understood that the assignment by Lyttle to West, of which they had notice, carried with it all the right, title, and interest of every nature formerly held by Lyttle, and it is said in the finding of the court that "said defendants, knowing that said West had succeeded by assignment to the interest and estate of said Lyttle in the said agreement, as aforesaid, forwarded the said certificate of title by mail to said West, addressed to him at the said city of Los Angeles." Said West, about the time of its reception, had assigned the said contract, with all the right and title pertaining thereto, to the plaintiff. The defendants are therefore estopped to deny the assignability of the particular stipulation in reference to passing upon the title, as well as the other portions of the contract in question. Hanna v. Wahlberg, 128 Cal. 407, 60 Pac. 1035.

It is quite true, as claimed by appellants, that the right conferred upon the purchaser to pass upon the title does not imply that he thereby possessed the arbitrary right to unreasonably and in bad faith reject the title, but it will not be presumed that the plaintiff in this case acted in bad faith in rejecting the title, but that he did so because it was defective and not marketable. The answer of defendants does not allege that the title was perfect, or good, or marketable, nor is it anywhere intimated that the plaintiff, in rejecting the same, was not justified in doing so, or that he acted in bad faith; and it is alleged, and the court finds, that within 20 days after the receipt and delivery of the said certificate of title, the plaintiff rejected the title to said lands and premises, and disapproved of the same, and on said day personally notified defendants thereof. This was in strict compliance with the terms of the contract, and it results that the plaintiff was thereupon, as the successor of Lyttle, entitled to recover the sum deposited.

NEUMANN et al. v. MORETTI. (S. F. 3,948, 3,960.)*

LANDLORD AND TENANT — LEASES—SECURITY—CANCELLATION—PLEADING—JOINT DEMURRER—EVIDENCE—FINDINGS—JUDGMENT—APPEAL.

1. Where a demurrer was filed to an answer and counterclaim by both plaintiffs jointly, the demurrer would be overruled if the answer stated a defense or counterclaim against either of the plaintiffs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 463.]

2. Where, in a suit for wrongful eviction from leased premises and to cancel a note and mortgage given by a third person to secure performance of the lease, defendant denied most of the allegations of the complaint, and affirmatively alleged that at the time of making the lease, note, and mortgage the lessee agreed with defendant, as a part of the agreement of lease, that he would purchase all dairy products for the leased creamery from defendant, and that the mortgagor executed the note and mortgage as security for the performance of such agreement, and that the lessee owed defendant $1,700 for property so purchased, etc., for which judgment was demanded, such answer and counterclaim were not demurrable for want of facts.

3. In an action for wrongful eviction of a tenant and to cancel a note and mortgage given to secure performance of the lease, evidence held insufficient to support a finding that the mortgage was also given to secure performance of a collateral agreement by the lessee to purchase creamery supplies from the lessor.

the lessee's performance, judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, and the lessee appealed from the judgment only, without a bill of exceptions, it would be presumed as against him that sufficient evidence was admitted without objection to sustain the findings.

5. In a suit for wrongful eviction the lessee set out a written lease of the creamery, performance of which was secured by a note and mortgage of another, etc., and prayed a cancellation of the note and mortgage and for damages. Defendant denied most of the allegations of the complaint, and alleged that at the time of making the lease, note, and mortgage the lessee agreed to purchase supplies from defendant, and that the mortgagor executed the mortgage as security for such agreement, on which there was then due and unpaid $1,700, besides interest, for which judgment was demanded, etc. Held, that as against the lessee the pleadings were sufficient to support a judgment in favor of defendant.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeals from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Paul Neumann and another against Louis Moretti. From a judgment in favor of defendant, both Paul and Fred Neumann appeal, and from an order denying a new trial Paul Neumann alone appeals. Affirmed as to Fred Neumann and reversed as to Paul Neumann.

Hugh R. Osborn and Benj. K. Knight, for appellants. Charles B. Younger, Jr., for respondent.

COOPER, C. These appeals are from the proceedings in the same case, and may be considered together. Defendant recovered judgment, and plaintiffs made a motion for a new trial, which was denied. Both plaintiffs appeal from the judgment, but Paul Neumann alone appeals from the order denying a new trial.

The complaint alleges that on the 12th day of November, 1902, the defendant executed to plaintiff Fred Neumann a lease of certain premises known as the "Seaside Creamery," in the city of Santa Cruz, for the term of one year from the 15th day of November, 1902, for the rent of $80 per month, from April 15, 1903, to October 15, 1903, and $55 per month for the remaining months of the term; that at the time of the execution of the lease Paul Neumann made and delivered to defendant his promissory note of even date for $300, payable one year after date, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, secured by mortgage on certain real estate in the city of Santa Cruz, which mortgage was duly recorded; that said note and mortgage were given as security for the performance of the covenants of the lease on the part of Fred Neumann, and a written defeasance executed and delivered by defendant to Paul Neumann, which contained the following clause: "Now, this witnesseth that if Fred Neumann shall faithfully perform the conditions of that certain lease this day made by me to him I will surrender this note to said Paul Neumann and will cancel said mortgage;" that in May, 1903, the defendant unlawfully, and contrary to the provisions of the lease, ejected the said lessee, Fred Neumann, from the possession of the leased premises, and ever since has held possession thereof, to the damage of Fred Neumann in the sum of $500. Judgment is prayed that the lease, note, and mortgage be delivered up and canceled, that defendant be enjoined from disposing of the note, and for $500 damages in favor of Fred Neumann for being dispossessed of the leased premises.

To the complaint the defendant interposed a demurrer upon the ground, among others, that there was a misjoinder of plaintiffs and a misjoinder of causes of action. The demurrer was overruled, but, as judgment was finally entered in favor of defendant, it is not necessary to pass upon the demurrer here. It is not apparent that Fred Neumann has any interest in the cancellation of the note and mortgage, nor that Paul Neumann has any interest in the damages which Fred Neumann alleges that he suffered by reason of being dispossessed of the premises. Defendant denies most of the allegations of the complaint, and alleges affirmatively that at the time of making the said lease, note, and mortgage Fred Neumann agreed with defendant, as a part of the agreement of lease, that he would purchase all dairy products, milk, and supplies for the use of the business of the said Seaside Creamery from defendant; that the plaintiff Paul Neumann executed the note and mortgage as security for the performance of said agreement so made by Fred Neumann to purchase from defendant; that afterwards the defendant, at the request of plaintiffs, and each of them, and upon their express promise to pay therefor, did furnish and deliver to Fred Neumann milk, dairy products, and merchandise, for his use in said Seaside Creamery of the value of $1,700, and that plaintiffs have not paid the same, nor any part thereof. Judgment is prayed against plaintiffs, and each of them, for the sum of $1,700, besides interest. Plaintiffs demurred to the answer, and now urge that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense or counterclaim. As the demurrer is general, and put in jointly by both plaintiffs, it must be held that the answer is sufficient if it states a defense or counterclaim against either of the plaintiffs. O'Callaghan v. Bode, 84 Cal. 495, 24 Pac. 269; Rogers v. Schulenburg, 111 Cal. 284, 43 Pac. 899. We cannot say that the answer did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense or counterclaim as to either plaintiff. It states that the agreement as to purchasing supplies from defendant was made at the time of making the lease, and that the note and mortgage were made and given as security therefor. The court found in favor of defendant and against Fred Neumann as to the eviction, the damages alleged to have been caused by such eviction, and against both plaintiffs on the counterclaim of defendant to the extent of $1,625 for goods, supplies, and dairy products sold and delivered to Fred Neumann. The court further found, as against appellant Paul Neumann, that the note and mortgage were given as security for the sums that might become due for supplies to be furnished Fred Neumann by defendant; that the agreement made as to supplies and goods to be furnished to Fred Neumann was a part and parcel of the agreement to lease, and that the lease and agreement in fact constituted one contract, for which the note and mortgage were given as security. Judgment was ordered and entered that plaintiffs are not entitled to any relief, and that defendant recover judgment against plaintiffs, and each of them, for $1,625 and interest and costs of suit.

Paul Neumann claims that the findings herein specified are not supported by the evidence, and we are of the opinion that his claim is correct. The lease contains no mention of any contract or agreement respecting the furnishing of goods and products to Fred Neumann. The mortgage is an ordinary mortgage to secure the promissory note therein described, and contains not a word as to it being given as security for anything else. The defeasance made and signed by defendant provided that he would surrender the note and mortgage provided Fred Neumann "faithfully performed the conditions of that certain lease, etc." Defendant offered in evidence a written agreement made between himself and Fred Neumann as to the purchase and price of milk, butter, and dairy products from him by Fred Neumann. This contract contained the clause, "Said Neumann agrees to pay to said Moretti for all dairy products delivered to him as above in United States gold coin." While the contract is quite lengthy, and contains 10 independent paragraphs, not a word is said therein as to appellant Paul Neumann being liable for the products to be furnished Fred Neumann thereunder, nor as to the mortgage being security therefor. There is not a syllable of evidence that appellant ever requested or agreed to pay for any of the goods and dairy products supplied to Fred Neumann. The books were kept by Fred Neumann. Defendant's counsel in their brief do not point out any evidence tending to support the findings. They claim that the agreement as to the purchase of goods and dairy products should be read into the lease as a part thereof, and cite many authorities which have no application. It would be difficult for them to find any authority to sustain the proposition that the independent contract as to purchasing supplies for the creamery was a part of the lease. The lease was in writing, and was one contract; the mortgage was in writing, and was a contract to secure the performance of the covenants of the lease to the extent of $300; and the contract as to purchasing goods from defendant was in writing, and it is not shown by the evidence that it had anything to do with the lease. As between Paul Neumann and defendant, Paul Neumann is entitled to a finding as to whether or not anything is due by Fred Neumann to defendant under the covenants of the lease as therein expressed, and, if anything is due, the amount thereof. If nothing is due, then appellant is entitled to have the note and mortgage canceled. Plaintiff Fred Neumann did not appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial. His appeal is on the judgment roll alone, without a bill of exceptions. We must therefore presume, as against him, that there is evidence sufficient to sustain the findings, and that such evidence was admitted without objection. He can only question the judgment with reference to the pleadings, and whether or not it is the legal conclusion from the facts found. No claim is made that the judgment is not the legal conclusion from the findings, and this leaves only the question as to whether or not the pleadings are sufficient to support the findings and judgment. In view of the liberal construction to be placed upon the pleadings where the evidence does not appear to have been objected to, and the findings are conclusive, we think the pleadings are sufficient as to Fred Neumann.

The court found that the agreement under which the counterclaim arose was made at the same time as the lease, and was a part of the same transaction. The answer alleges "that at the time of making and executing said lease said parties thereto, in order to more specifically arrange as to the manner of conducting the business of said Seaside Creamery, said Louis Moretti and Fred Neumann made, entered into, and executed a further agreement," etc.

We advise that the judgment as to Fred Neumann be affirmed, and as to Paul Neumann that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment as to Fred Neumann is affirmed, and as to Paul Neumann the judgment and order are reversed: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

NEUMANN et al. v. MORETTI. (S. F. 3,763.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 20, 1905.)

TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—BONDS—FAILURE TO GIVE—APPLICATION TO DISSOLVE—DEFENSES—APPEAL.

1. Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2, an appeal lies from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 528, provides that an injunction cannot be allowed after the defendant has answered except on notice or on an order to show cause, but in such case the defendant may be restrained until the decision of the court or judge granting or refusing the injunction; and section 530 declares that if the court or judge deem it proper that the defendant should be heard before granting the injunction, an order may be made requiring cause to be shown at a specified time why the injunction should not be granted, and the defendant may in the meantime be restrained. Held, that where an ex parte order was granted before answer, restraining defendant from doing a particular act, it was an injunction as defined by section 525, and not a temporary restraining order, and was therefore subject to dissolution for plaintiff's failure to give the undertaking required by section 529.

3. On an application to dissolve a temporary injunction for failure of the person obtaining the same to give the required undertaking, it was no defense that the injunction would be ineffectual unless the undertaking was given, or that it did not appear to have been served on defendant.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Paul Neumann and another against Louis Moretti. From an order refusing to dissolve a restraining order, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Charles B. Younger, Jr., for appellant. Hugh R. Osborn and Benj. K. Knight, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to secure the cancellation of a certain note and mortgage executed by plaintiff Paul Neumann to defendant. The facts are fully stated in the appeal from an order denying a new trial this day decided. S. F. 3,960, 79 Pac. 510. After the complaint was filed and summons issued, before answer or appearance by defendant, the court, on the ex parte application of plaintiffs, granted a restraining order commanding the defendant, his agents and servants, until the further order of the court, to absolutely refrain from assigning or transferring or disposing of the promissory note and mortgage. The defendant afterward made a motion to dissolve and set aside the said order upon the ground, among others, that the court did not require a written undertaking on the part of plaintiffs as required by the statute, and that no undertaking was given or required at the time of making said order or at any other time. On the 8th day of August, 1903, the court made an order refusing to dissolve the restraining order. This appeal is from the said last-named order.

The restraining order was an injunction. It required the defendant to refrain from a particular act. Code Civ. Proc. § 525. An appeal lies from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction. Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 2; Schmidt v. Bitzer (Cal.) 71 Pac. 563. It was admitted that no undertaking was given or required by the judge. It was the duty of the court or judge to require a written undertaking to the effect that plaintiff would pay to the party enjoined such damages as such party might sustain by reason of the injunction (Code Civ. Proc. § 529), and the injunction will be dissolved in case of such failure to give the undertaking (McCracken v. Harris, 54 Cal. 81; Alaska Improvement Company v. Hirsch, 119 Cal. 250, 47 Pac. 124, 51 Pac. 340). It is claimed by respondent that the restraining order was not in fact an injunction but a temporary restraining order, in which no undertaking is required. In the case of San Diego Water Co. v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 101 Cal. 218, 35 Pac. 651, this court draws a distinction between a temporary restraining order and an injunction. If it be conceded that there is such distinction as to requiring a bond, we are clearly of the opinion that in this case the order was not a temporary order within the meaning of the statute. The statute provides: "An injunction cannot be allowed after the defendant has answered, unless upon notice, or upon an order to show cause; but in such case the defendant may be restrained until the decision of the court or judge granting or refusing the injunction." Code Civ. Proc. § 528. And again: "If the court or judge deem it proper that the defendant, or any of several defendants, should be heard before granting the injunction, an order may be made requiring cause to be shown at a specified time and place, why the injunction should not be granted; and the defendant may, in the meantime, be restrained." Code Civ. Proc. § 530. It is therefore plain that the temporary restraining order referred to in the statute is an order which applies to the time intervening between an application for an injunction and the day fixed in the order to show cause. Under section 528, after the defendant has answered, an injunction cannot be allowed except upon an order to show cause. Under section 530, if the court or judge deems it proper that the defendant should be heard, an order may be made requiring cause to be shown at a specified time and place. Under either section, pending the application, and before hearing the parties on the order to show cause, the defendant may be restrained. It would be the better practice, and certainly is the general practice, to require an undertaking during such temporary restraining order. But in all cases where a preliminary injunction is granted in the first instance, or after an order to show cause, the undertaking must be required and given. As said in Lambert v. Haskell, 80 Cal. 620, 22 Pac. 330: "It seems plain that the undertaking provided for by the Code of Civil Procedure is upon the preliminary injunction. No other injunction is provided for therein. And ordinarily no undertaking could be required on the final decree." We do not think it any answer that the injunction would be inefficient unless an undertaking was given or that it does not appear to have been served upon defendant. These reasons might be urged by defendant in case of contempt proceedings for violating the injunction, but, if the injunction was improperly issued without complying with the statute, the defendant has the right to have it dissolved. If it is ineffectual, and plaintiff does not intend to serve it upon defendant, it can do him no harm to dissolve it.

The order should be reversed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HARRISON, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is reversed: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

KIDWELL v. KETLER et al. (KETLER, Intervener). (S. F. 2,950.)*

WILLS—TRUSTS—PRACTICAL CONSTRUCTION—TERMINATION—REMAINDERS—"PER STIRPES OR PER CAPITA"—PLEADING—CONCLUSIONS OF LAW—ADMISSIONS.

1. Where, in a suit to terminate a trust and for an accounting, both complainant in his complaint and respondents in their cross-complaint set up the will creating the trust in full, and alleged ownership thereunder, such allegation was a mere conclusion of law, not calling for a denial, and was therefore not binding as an admission on either party.

2. Where in a suit to terminate a trust created by will the defendants were minors and appeared by guardian, the minors were not bound by admissions of their guardian to their prejudice.

3. Testator devised certain property to a trustee to maintain and educate his niece and nephew until the nephew should attain majority, when the proceeds of the property remaining unexpended were to be equally divided between them, they thereafter to share equally therein during their natural lives, but, if either died without issue, the whole net proceeds should be paid to the survivor during his or her life, and, if either died with issue, then one-half of the net proceeds should be expended to maintain and educate such issue until both niece and nephew had died, when the investment and the proceeds should become the absolute property of the issue of the niece and nephew then surviving, and in default of issue should be distributed among their heirs at law. Held, that the issue of the nephew and niece, after their decease, took per stirpes, and not per capita.

4. Where all the beneficiaries of a trust acquiesced in a particular construction thereof for 35 years, which construction was impliedly sanctioned by the court in the settlement of the trustee's account, a ruling by the trial court in conformity with such construction, though not binding on appeal, would not be reversed where it appeared that there had been no abuse of the trust or misdirection of the funds, and some of the language was susceptible of different meanings.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by J. Leonard Kidwell against William B. Ketler and others and Michael Flood, as trustee, etc., in which Mary E. P. Ketler, as administratrix, etc., intervenes. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant William B. Ketler and others appeal. Affirmed.

HENSHAW, J. Jacob C. Beideman died in 1865, leaving a will bearing date January 26, 1863. By the first paragraph of his will he directed that all his real estate excepting three parcels be sold, and that out of the proceeds of the sale his debts be paid. The second paragraph of the will is as follows:

"Second. I give, bequeath and devise to Henry F. Williams, of the said City and County of San Francisco, twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) in money, proceeds of the sale above provided for, remaining after the said expenses and my just debts are paid; and also a certain water lot (so called) belonging to me, with the improvements thereon, situate, lying and being at the northeast corner of Clay and Davis streets in said city and county; also fifty vara lot number five (5) in block number seventy-three (73), Western Addition so called, and the improvements thereon, situate, lying and being on Hayes street, between Van Ness Avenue and Franklin Street, in said city and county, and also block number two hundred and seventy-nine (279), in said Western Addition, and bounded by Ellis, Webster, Eddy and Buchanan streets, in said city and county and the one-half of the rest, residue and remainder of my property mentioned in the tenth subdivision of this instrument, if any, that shall remain after the gifts, devises and bequests, theretofore provided for, shall be answered and fulfilled; in trust, however, for the following uses and purposes, and none other or different, that is to say, that the said sum of twenty thousand dollars, and the net proceeds of said lands, hereinabove given, devised and bequeathed be, by the said Henry F. Williams, and his successor and successors, who shall have the trust hereby created invested in mortgage securities, on improved real estate, situated in the said city and county, and that the net proceeds of such investments or so much of the same as shall be necessary therefor, be expended by the said Henry F. Williams or the person having charge of said trust, for the proper maintenance, and education of my niece Katie Ketler and my nephew Willie Ketler, both of Wilmington, State of Delaware, and children of my deceased sister, Sarah Ann Ketler, until the said Willie Ketler shall attain his majority, at which time any of such proceeds then remaining unexpended, to be divided between the said Katie and Willie, share and share alike; and thereafter all net proceeds from said investments to be equally divided between the said Katie and Willie, during their natural lives; but if either of them die without issue, then in that case the whole of such net proceeds shall be paid to and become the absolute property of the survivor of them during his or her natural life; and in case either of them die with issue surviving, then and in that case, one-half of the net proceeds of such investment shall be expended for the maintenance and education of such issue, until both the said Katie and Willie shall have deceased, when the said investment, property, and the net proceeds thereof, then remaining, shall become the absolute property of the issue of the said Katie and Willie then surviving; and in default of issue of either the said Katie or Willie them both surviving, then and in that case the said investment and property, and the net proceeds thereof then remaining shall be distributed among their then heirs at law, according to the statutes of descents and distribution, now existing in the State of California."

The property so distributed by the court in probate to the trustee under the terms of this trust has been managed by trustees ever since. Katie Ketler married Kidwell, and died in 1871. Her sole surviving child is the plaintiff herein. Willie Ketler died in 1901, leaving as surviving children the five minor defendants. By the terms of the trust it ceased and determined upon the death of Willie Ketler, and this action was brought to terminate it, for an accounting by the trustee, and for a distribution of the trust properties in accordance with the terms of the trust. The plaintiff set forth the will of Beideman in full, with the other facts hereinabove stated, and alleged that one-half of the trust property had vested in him under the terms of the trust, and one-half in the minor defendants; and this allegation was not denied by the minor defendants. The minor defendants, beside answering, filed a cross-complaint, in which they alleged that the rents of the real estate devised in trust had not been invested, but had been paid out to Willie Ketler and to the plaintiff, Kidwell, and his two brothers, who had subsequently died. This allegation was not denied. They also alleged that one of the trustees had paid to the plaintiff, Kidwell, and one of his brothers a large part of the capital fund of the trust estate. This was denied, but the trustee, Flood, admitted that he had paid $3,054 to the plaintiff and his two brothers, by order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Upon this issue the court found that the plaintiff had received $425, while his deceased brothers had received $2,629. The minor defendants also, in their cross-complaint, set forth in full the will of Jacob Beideman, and then alleged "that by the terms of the said trust created by and in the said will for the benefit of the said Katie and Willie Ketler and their issue the property and money therein devised and bequeathed, with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, were given and devised in fee, one-half to the issue of Willie Ketler and one-half to the issue of Katie Ketler, to take effect and vest at the time of the death of the survivor of the said Willie and Katie Ketler."

The court made its findings and conclusions of law, and in the latter declared that upon the death of William J. Ketler upon the 8th day of April, 1901, all of the trust property became the absolute property in fee of the beneficiaries in the following proportions: "To the plaintiff an undivided one-half interest; to the minor defendants each an undivided one-fifth interest of an undivided one-half interest." Upon the motion for a new trial these conclusions of law were complained of, and upon this appeal they form the principal matter in controversy between the parties. It is not surprising that the court should have given the construction to the trust which it did, even if it were erroneous, since both parties, by their pleadings, set up the same interest, and the court adopted a construction of the trust which, at that time, met the views of all the beneficiaries under it.

Thus at the threshold of the inquiry as to the true construction of the trust appellants are met with the objection of the respondent that they are bound, first, by their admissions of the allegations of his complaint, and, second, by the identical affirmative allegation which they have made in their cross-complaint. But, answering the respondent's objection, it is to be noted that both in the complaint and in the cross-complaint the will of Jacob Beideman is set forth in full, and the deraignment of title is shown in both cases to be from the trust clause of that will. The case presented, therefore, is one where the pleader sets forth his chain of title, and upon that chain pleads ownership. It is uniformly held that an allegation made under such circumstances is an allegation of a conclusion of law not calling for a denial, and not binding upon either party. Thus, as is said in Gruwell v. Seybolt, 82 Cal. 7, 22 Pac. 938: "Where * * * the pleader sets forth specifically the links in his chain of title, a general allegation of ownership will be treated as a mere conclusion from the facts stated." The rule is succinctly laid down in the Encyclopædia of Pleading and Practice (page 725) as follows: "Where the title is specifically as well as generally alleged, the specific allegations control and qualify those that are general;" and this principle has frequently been recognized and applied in this state. Levins v. Rovegno, 71 Cal. 273, 12 Pac. 161; Savings and Loan Society v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 922. The allegation of ownership in the complaint is identical with that in the cross-complaint above quoted. It is alleged "that by the terms of said trust the parties took title," and it is plain that this is but a conclusion of law, deriving its whole and sole force from the trust in the will. This being so, it is not only a mere conclusion of law, but it amounts (if it be an erroneous conclusion) to a mere admission of the parties, which cannot change the law. Tiddy v. Graves, 126 N. C. 620, 36 S. E. 127. It is, of course, well settled that a denial of a conclusion of law is immaterial and raises no issue. Nelson v. Murray, 23 Cal. 338; Turner v. White, 73 Cal. 299, 14 Pac. 794; Wormouth v. Hatch, 33 Cal. 121. And, as is said in Brown v. Newall, 2 Mylne & Craig, 558: "Now, it is a rule of pleading that, although a party is bound by the facts which he states, he is not bound by his statement of the legal consequences of those. It is for the court to judge what are those legal consequences." Moreover, the defendants in this action were one and all minors, and appeared, of necessity, by their guardian. The admissions of a guardian which mean the sacrifice and giving away of the ward's property are never held to be binding. Cochran v. McDowell, 15 Ill. 11; Chaffin v. The Heirs of Kimball, 23 Ill. 36; Cooper v. Mayhew, 40 Mich. 528; Collins v. Trotter, 81 Mo. 275, 280; Crain v. Parker, 1 Ind. 374; Lathers v. Fish, 4 Lans. (N. Y.) 213. It must be held, therefore, upon this proposition, that it is a proper subject of inquiry before this court upon this appeal.

The question thus presented for determination is whether under the trust the children of Mary and the children of Willie took per stirpes, or whether their issue took per capita. Jarman states the rule as follows: "Where a gift is to the children of several persons, whether it be to the children of A. and B. or to the children of A. and the children of B., they take per capita, not per stirpes. But this mode of construction will yield to a very faint glimpse of a different intention from the testator. Thus the mere fact that the only income until the distribution of the capital is applicable per stirpes has been held to constitute sufficient grounds for assuming that a like principle was to govern the gift of the capital." Says the Court of Appeals of New York (Ferrer v. Pyne, 81 N. Y. 284), discussing this subject: "The rule referred to [per capita distribution] has in modern times been applied with reluctance by some courts, because it had become a rule of property, and by others out of deference to its supposed authority, but in many, if not in all, cases with open protest, while by others it has been wholly rejected. * * * If, therefore, from any portion of the will an intention can be discovered that the children of the deceased daughter are to take as a class, and not as individuals, that intention must prevail, notwithstanding the rule of construction to which we have adverted." In Burgin v. Patton, 58 N. C. 426, it is said: "It is well settled, as a general rule, that if a testator gives an estate to be equally divided between A. and B. and the heirs of C., and the latter has several children, the division will be per capita, but, if there be anything in the will indicative of an intention that the devisees or legatees shall take as families, the general rule will not apply, and the property will be divided per stirpes, and not per capita." And in Henry v. Thomas, 118 Ind. 23, 20 N. E. 519, the proposition is much more strongly stated in the following language: "The rule [as stated by Jarman] has been so far abrogated by the courts of the different states that it no longer has any practical force in the construction of wills, and the weight of the authority is to the effect that the beneficiaries take per stirpes, unless the language used in the devise or bequest is such as to exclude that intention." Without further multiplying quotations from authorities, reference may be made to Minter's Appeal, 40 Pa. St. 114; Vincent v. Newhouse, 83 N. Y. 505; Bool v. Mix, 17 Wend. 119, 31 Am. Dec. 285; Adler v. Beall, 11 Gill & J. 123; Ihrie's Estate, 162 Pa. St. 372, 29 Atl. 750; Lachland's Heirs v. Downing's Ex'rs, 11 B. Mon. (Ky.) 32; Bond's Appeal from Probate, 31 Conn. 183; Holbrook v. Harrington, 16 Gray (Mass.) 102; McLean v. Williams, 116 Ga. 257, 42 S. E. 485, 59 L. R. A. 125.

Construing this trust with a view thus to arrive at the intent of the testator, it is at least apparent that in the disposition of the income to arise from the trust property he contemplated a distribution per stirpes. When the youngest of the two attained majority, any surplus proceeds of the investments was to be divided between them equally, and thereafter all the net proceeds were to be divided between them equally. In the event of one dying with issue, it was the share of the proceeds which had been paid to the parent, and that share only, which was to be given to the children; and we thus come to the final clause requiring construction—the disposition to be made in the event that actually arose, when both have died, both leaving children. It would seem to be reasonably certain that, as he contemplated a disposition of the proceeds of the trust between the two as separate families, so he contemplated the division of the corpus of the trust in like manner, per stirpes, and it follows that the court correctly construed the trust in this regard. There came into the hands of the trustees under this trust the three pieces of real property specifically devised. Such real estate as was embraced in the "one-half of the rest, residue, and remainder of my property" was actually converted by sale into money, and upon distribution this money with the three pieces of realty was turned over to the trustees. It appears that the trustees invested the money as called for by the trust, and paid to the beneficiaries the net income of this investment and the net rents of the property. This method of disposition was acquiesced in by Willie and Katie during their lifetimes, and upon the death of Katie the same method of disposition was adopted during the continued lifetime of Willie; that is to say, one-half of the "proceeds," including one-half of the rents of the real estate, was paid to Katie's issue, while Willie took the other moiety. This was continued until the death of Willie, when his issue here asserts that this division was violative of the terms of the trust, their contention being that under the trust the rents of these three pieces of real estate were not to be paid over as "proceeds," but were to be invested, and the "proceeds" of this investment only were to be divided. Therefore, as plaintiff had shared in the distribution of these rents with their father, he should be called upon to account and make over to them the proportion of that which is their due. As has been said, this division of the rents has continued for many years—indeed, for the long period of 35 years. It was acquiesced in by all of the beneficiaries to the trust, and it received the sanction of the court, which, at least tacitly, put this construction upon the trust in the settlement of the trustee's account. The true construction of the trust in this regard does not come before us, therefore, as a case of first impression. It has received contemporaneous construction and acquiescence for 35 years, and, while this would not be of controlling weight with a clear abuse of the trust shown, or a clear misappropriation or misdirection of its funds, yet in a case such as this, where the trust in some respects is inartificially drawn, where the word "proceeds"—itself a word of loose and varying significance — is employed with different meanings, we are far from saying that it was not the actual intent of the testator that the rents were to be paid over, as in fact was done. And, such being the case, we are not inclined to disturb the ruling of the trial court based upon such long acquiescence.

For which reasons the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BENJAMIN v. MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASS'N. (S. F. 3,107.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 20, 1905.)

INSURANCE—ASSESSMENT CONTRACTS — APPORTIONMENT OF ASSESSMENTS — MODIFICATION OF CONTRACT—ILLEGAL ASSESSMENTS—NONPAYMENT—TENDER OF LEGAL ASSESSMENT—ESTOPPEL.

1. Where an assessment insurance certificate and the constitution of the association at the time the certificate was issued provided that whenever the death fund should be insufficient to meet existing claims an assessment should be made upon the "entire membership in force at the date of the last death, the same to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each member," subsequent resolutions of the association, classifying the members, and placing all the members who entered prior to a date subsequent to that at which the certificate was issued in a class by themselves, and providing that as to such members the assessments should be apportioned according to the age of the member, but as to members joining the association since that date the assessments should be apportioned as of the age of their entry into the association, were inoperative and void as against the holder of such certificate.

2. A certificate holder in an assessment insurance association, of whom an illegal assessment is demanded, need not pay such assessment, nor tender a sum equivalent to a legal assessment in order to preserve his rights under his contract, nor need he, on demand of the association, furnish it with his reasons for not paying the assessment.

3. The fact that a holder of an assessment insurance certificate paid a number of illegal assessments without protest does not estop the beneficiary, in an action on the policy, from asserting the invalidity of a later assessment, which the holder of the certificate did not pay.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Wm. R. Daingerfield, Judge.

Action by Rebecca D. Benjamin against the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

I. B. L. Brandt, for appellant. Edgar D. Peixotto and J. T. Houx, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought by the beneficiary to recover upon a life insurance policy for $5,000. The defense was that the policy was forfeited for nonpayment of assessments. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals therefrom, and also from an order denying it a new trial.

The plaintiff transacts the business of life insurance on the co-operative or assessment plan. The husband of plaintiff, A. F. Benjamin, in October, 1883, applied for and received a certificate of membership in defendant, together with a policy of insurance upon his life for $5,000, payable to his said wife. In said certificate and policy the defendant agreed as follows: "Whenever the death fund of the association is insufficient to meet the existing claims by death an assessment shall be made upon the entire membership in force at the date of the last death, the same to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each member, for such a sum as the executive committee may deem sufficient to cover said claims, and the net amount received from such assessment (less twenty-five per cent. to be set apart for the reserve fund) shall go into the death fund." It was also agreed on the part of the insured that "this certificate shall be subject to all the provisions and stipulations contained in the constitution and bylaws of the association, with the amendments thereto." The insured also agreed to pay all dues and assessments when due; and it was also provided and agreed further that, in case of failure to so pay the said sum, the said certificate should become null and void, and all moneys paid thereunder should be forfeited to said association. At the time of the issuance of the said certificate of membership there was in existence, in full force and effect, a "constitution and by-laws" of said association, in which it was provided that: "On the first days of February, May, August, and November (or at such other periods as the board of directors may determine), an assessment shall be made upon the entire membership in force at the date of the last audited death claim prior thereto, for such a sum as the executive committee may deem sufficient to meet the existing claims by death, the same to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each member, as per the rates named in the certificate of membership, and the net amount received from such assessments (less twenty-five per cent. to be set apart for the reserve fund) shall go into the death fund. * * * A failure to pay the assessment within thirty days from the first days of February, May, August, and November (or at such other periods as may be named by the directors) shall work a forfeiture of membership in this association of all rights thereunder." It was further provided in said "constitution and by-laws" that: "The board of directors shall have authority to adopt such other rules and regulations as they may deem for the interest of the association." It was also provided: "This constitution may be revised or amended at any annual meeting, or at a special meeting of the members called for that purpose."

*Rehearing denied February 18, 1905.

The findings show that the insured paid all dues and assessments up to the date of mortuary call No. 98, June 1, 1898. This call required payment on or before July 1, 1898, but was not paid, and in July the assured was notified that his policy had lapsed. On October 11th of the same year the insured died. It is contended that it was unnecessary to pay this mortuary call, for the reason that it was excessive, and contrary to the express terms of the policy or certificate of membership. By a series of resolutions the association had placed all members who entered prior to 1890—including said Benjamin—in a class by themselves, called the "fifteen-year class," and required them to pay according to the attained age of each individual at the date of the assessment. It established also other classes, known as ten and five year classes, and provided that the members of those classes should be assessed as of the age of their entry into the association. The effect of this was to compel the members of the 15-year class, to which plaintiff's husband belonged, to bear the expense of the insurance of that class, without the aid of those joining after 1890; the result being that Benjamin was compelled to pay $2.67 per thousand, while a member of the 10-year class of the same age as Benjamin was assessed only $2.40 per thousand. It is contended that this is in violation of the original contract that the assessments would be apportioned among all the members according to the age of each member. The lower court found the above facts to be true, and decided that the mortuary assessment, No. 98, against Benjamin, being at a greater rate on each $1,000 of insurance held by him under his policy than was assessed upon each $1,000 held by other members of said association of the same age as Benjamin, upon policies issued to them under what is termed the "10-year policy plan," was unauthorized by the contract between Benjamin and the defendant association, and was disproportionate and discriminating against him, and was invalid and void.

This conclusion of the lower court is undoubtedly correct, unless, as is insisted by appellant, the finding that the mortuary call was disproportionate and discriminating, and was unauthorized, and in violation of the contract of insurance, is not justified by the evidence. This contention of appellant is based upon the reports of the Superintendent of Insurance of the state of New York, where the defendant association is incorporated, and that of the actuary of the association, introduced in evidence, supplemented by the testimony of the latter. But, as far as the matters contained in such reports are concerned, we do not see that they in any manner disturb the sufficiency of the finding. These reports—particularly that of the actuary—are relative to the status of the class of membership holding policies in the fifteen-year class, as regards their relation to past and future assessments for death claims, which it was insisted were properly chargeable to that class on the basis of the mortality experience of the entire membership; and also with regard to the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the proceeds of future calls or assessments based upon rates at the then assessed age, to meet probable death losses in that class. In these reports the secretary and actuary assumed that under the law of New York and under the constitution and by-laws of the association the association had the right to place its members who had joined prior to 1890 in a class by themselves (the fifteen-year class), and to assess them on a basis different from that applied to members coming into the association in subsequent years, and who were also divided into classes (ten and five years); and, having assumed this right, the reports proceeded to assign reasons why it would be entirely equitable and proper to assess the members of such fifteen-year class at their attained ages, and to assess members of the other classes at their age of entry, independent of the contract of insurance held by persons of the fifteen-year class, such as Benjamin. The testimony of the actuary of the association is in the same general line. When, however, we eliminate from the reports and the testimony of the actuary all discussion as to methods of insurance and the legitimate system which should prevail in co-operative insurance companies, such as the defendant association, concerning the assessment of its members, and the theories indulged therein as to the right of the association to divide these members into distinct classes for the purpose of assessments, and examine the facts, it is not difficult to discover the object sought to be attained by the segregation of its members into classes, and the effect upon the fifteen-year class of the resolutions requiring members of that class to pay assessments on their attained ages, and not upon the basis of an apportionment of payment of assessments among all the members of the association according to the ages of the members, as provided at least in the insurance contract between Benjamin and the association. This fifteen-year class was made up of members of the association who held policies in the association prior to January 1, 1890. Their contract of insurance nowhere authorized the association to segregate them into a class; and this was done arbitrarily, and solely with a view of placing this class by themselves for assessment purposes. From an investigation made on behalf of the association by its actuary as to the payments by and the payments to this fifteen-year class from the beginning of the association up to 1898, it appeared that the payments to this class for death losses exceeded the payment by it of premiums in the sum of $852.876; that the remaining membership of the association (the ten and five-year classes) had an accumulated emergency fund over and above its losses paid and outstanding nine times the amount of a single call or assessment; that in the judgment of the actuary this condition of affairs created an inequality between the fifteen-year class and the ten and five year classes, and that, "in order to provide the revenue necessary for meeting the mortuary costs of this class [fifteen year], the basis of assessment upon all members of said fifteen-year class should be "at their attained age"; and the association acted accordingly in making its assessments upon that class. It appears, too, from the superintendent's reports, that the rates of assessment to attained age levied against the policy holders of this class were raised by the association "in the endeavor to make this portion of its membership self-sustaining as between premiums and death losses." And as further evidence that the object of the association in arbitrarily creating a fifteen-year class and raising the rate of assessment upon its members to attained age was to make the class self-sustaining appears from the testimony of the actuary, who stated, in giving his views upon the matter of rates as between the different classes, that: "The burden of one class cannot be put upon another class of members, because the system of this association defendant, in common with that of all other assessment associations, contemplates the payment by each class of its membership of the cost of the insurance of that class, and that any overpayments, by way of accumulations for a so-called reserve or emergency fund, made for the purpose of providing additional security for the performance of the association's contracts with its members, should be held for only a limited period, and at the expiration of that period applied to the benefit of the class by which such overpayments have been made, in the form of the reduction of future assessments, or to apply on account of future assessments. To use, therefore, any part of the contributions made by one class of the membership in payment of a portion of the cost of insurance of another class would be to deprive the class making the contributions so used of a portion of the benefits secured by their contracts, and to which they are fairly entitled. The effect of casting the burden of the fifteen-year class upon new members entering other classes would be disastrous to the members of the fifteen-year class, because such a course of action on the part of the association would so discourage the entering of new members that the entire burden of the fifteen-year class would be sustained by that class alone, and, if the amounts of their assessments could not be increased to meet the losses of increasing mortality, there would be no fund with which to pay death losses, and the result would be the winding up of the business of the association."

We think it is quite apparent, from a consideration of all these matters developed by the reports and the testimony of the actuary that the object sought to be accomplished by creating the fifteen-year class and raising the mortuary calls therein to attained ages was to meet this deficiency to which we have referred by requiring its payment from the class which it is claimed was responsible for it; and as to future assessments to make this class meet the mortuary calls thereof, and, in effect, to relieve the other classes, if not entirely, at least to a very appreciable extent, from doing either. And to a large extent this action was influenced by the fact that the members of the association of this class had, after joining the association and prior to 1890, been paying assessments as of the age of their entry, or at rates indorsed on their policies, which were lower than the current or attained age rates should have been, and so the association concluded it was only fair and equitable to advance these old members to the current or attained age rates, in order to equalize the burden to be borne by them and the members joining after 1890. But according to the terms of Benjamin's contract, and by virtue of his relation to the association as a member thereof, it was beyond the power of the association to do any of these things. His contract did not provide that he might be segregated into a class of the association for any purpose; or that there might be any deficiency created by the class into which the association saw pleased to place him, for the payment of which a different rule of assessment than his contract of insurance called for might be adopted. In fact, as to him, there could not be any deficiency of a class. Any deficiency existing was that of the association, for which he was no more responsible than all the other members of the association of his age. Nor could the association, by arbitrarily putting him in the fifteen-year class, and in creating other classes among the members of the association joining subsequently, deprive him of the benefit which should accrue to him under his contract by the constant addition to the association of new selected lives, and of having the amount necessary to be collected to pay mortuary assessments apportioned among the entire membership according to their actual ages when liability for the assessment accrued.

The essential principle upon which co-operative associations like that of the defendant is based is that there will be a constant invigoration of the association by the accession of new members; that it shall be in fact a going concern for the advantage of all, and that every member of the association will be given the benefit of the average mortality of the entire membership in force at the last death prior to an assessment, resulting from this constant addition of new members. And it was necessarily upon this theory that the earlier members of the association joined it. They anticipated the benefit which would result from a lower average mortality through the constant accession of these new members, and it was this benefit which was secured to Benjamin as one of the earliest members, by the provision in his contract, which called for an assessment "upon the entire membership in force at the date of the last death claim, the same to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each member." He was entitled to this benefit which would accrue from the constant accession of such members. This accession would naturally create a lower average mortality among the entire membership, and consequently a smaller cost would have to be sustained by each member, where the assessment to meet death claims was distributed over the entire membership, equally apportioned as to amount according to the respective ages of the members. The right to so segregate its members into a fifteen-year class, as was done here, was determined by the Supreme Courts of Minnesota and North Carolina adversely to the contention of this appellant. In these cases the suits were brought against this same appellant by member of its association who had been segregated, with Benjamin, into this fifteen-year class, to recover damages for cancellation of their policies for nonpayment of a mortuary call similar to the one under consideration here, levied under the same resolutions advancing the members of that class along to attained ages, and assessing them according to rates fixed for such age. In these decisions it was held that the change in the rate of assessment to advanced age, and which was to apply only to those members who entered prior to 1890, placed in a class by themselves solely for the purpose of such assessment, was an inequitable and arbitrary discrimination against that class, and violative of their contract of insurance. In the first of these cases—Ebert v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n, 81 Minn. 116, 83 N. W. 508, 509—the court, discussing this proposition, said: "It is evident that the contract contemplated an unsteady and varying death fund from which to pay death claims, and that the amount of the assessments would vary according to the number of deaths, the growth of the association in membership, and earning capacity of the reserve fund. It is also clear that the law of self-preservation applied, and if at any time, in order to meet maturing claims, it should become necessary to levy a larger amount than that stipulated in the maximum rate of the table, the power so to do was inherent in the association, and the directors would have authority to pass suitable rules and regulations for that purpose. But it is equally clear that neither by the contract of insurance, in contemplation of the laws of New York, the constitution and by-laws, nor from the natural, inherent power of the association, based upon the doctrine of the general good, does there exist authority to arbitrarily discriminate in favor of one class of members and against another class. * * * An attempt is made to justify the action of the directors upon the ground that the old members were originally taken in at the age of entry, and, in order to properly adjust their burden with relation to members subsequent to January 1, 1890, the old members should be advanced to the current rates, because that would be their equitable proportion of the current cost of the insurance. The actuary's report and the resolutions mentioned constantly refer to the members who entered prior to January 1, 1890, as 'members of the 15-year class,' as though there was something special about the contracts of those members which would authorize such discrimination. * * * Treating the so-called 15-year members as a class, it was figured out that they were not paying their equitable proportion of the cost of insurance, and so they were advanced as to age. The explanation does not explain. It simply amounts to a confession that the cost of carrying the insurance of the so-called class has been estimated by cutting them off from the association as invigorated by the new members. Such a proceeding was in violation of the contract. The old members joined the association upon the theory that it was to be a living institution. As old members dropped out and were paid off, new ones came in, younger in years; thus adding strength, and keeping up the vitality of the association. The new members entered upon the same basis and with the same expectation, yet they continue to be assessed as of the age of entry on the 1889 table. There has been shown no reason for drawing an arbitrary line as of January 1, 1890. If the board of directors could advance the age of all members who joined prior to 1890, they can keep setting out classes according to some certain year of entry, and advance its members also as to age. And if the board can advance the members who joined prior to 1890 to the current rates of the 1889 table, they can for the same reason advance them to years ahead of the current age. The board of directors had no authority to levy such an assessment as call No. 96, and the act of the defendant in canceling plaintiff's policy for nonpayment of the call made upon such basis was void." In the other case—Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n, 126 N. C. 971, 36 S. E. 353, 54 L. R. A. 605, 83 Am. St. Rep. 699—it is said: "We see but one simple point essential to the determination of the case: Can a mutual association, by whatever name it may be called, or whatever may be its purpose, enter into a contract with one of its members, and, after receiving large sums upon said contract, alter its essential terms, without the consent of the member, so as practically to destroy its value? We think not. The plaintiff became a member of the defendant association in 1883, and received a policy in the form of a certificate of membership, wherein it was expressly agreed that assessments should 'be made upon the entire membership in force at the date of the last death for such a sum as the executive committee may deem sufficient to cover said claims; the same to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each member as per table indorsed' on said certificate. * * * It seems that by successive resolutions, none of which were amendments to its constitution, the association has placed in a separate class all members who entered prior to 1890, and requires them to pay on the basis of the age attained by each at the date of each assessment, while other members continue to be assessed only as of their age of entry. That the result of such discrimination is injurious to the plaintiff clearly appears from the 16th, 18th, 21st and 22d findings of fact, as follows: '(16) * * * That since the last resolution of 1898 the plaintiff and all who joined said company prior to 1890, and who held policies similar to plaintiff's, were assessed at their full attained age, at rates applicable to such age, whereas persons who became members since 1890, and who held policies under what is styled the "ten-year class" and the "five-year class" are only assessed at their age of entry; and plaintiff is thereby assessed at a higher amount than if the entire membership were assessed at rates of their attained ages.' '(18) That call number 96, made on plaintiff in 1898, and pursuant to the resolutions of said year, is larger in amount than it would have been had all the members of the association been assessed at their full attained ages.' * * * Upon his findings of fact the court below concluded as matter of law that the assessment made in pursuance of the resolutions of 1898 was 'in violation of defendant's constitution, and excessive and invalid.' * * * Judgment was rendered accordingly. In it we see no error. All that we decide in the present case is that the defendant has violated its contract with the plaintiff in a material matter, whereby the plaintiff, having suffered substantial injury, is entitled to substantial damages. We do not decide that a mutual insurance company, or any other kind of insurance company, cannot issue policies of divers kinds and classes, if so authorized by its charter; nor do we decide that a member of a purely mutual association is not bound by all reasonable by-laws and changes lawfully made therein. We are not considering the enforcement of a contract inequitable on its face, but the violation of a lawful contract by attaching thereto, without the consent of the plaintiff, conditions which utterly destroy its value. It is evident that, if the resolution of 1898 is binding upon the plaintiff, he would, in any event, be eventually forced out of the company by the constantly increasing premiums."

It is, however, insisted by appellant that the case of Gaut v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n (C. C.) 121 Fed. 403, is opposed to the principles enunciated in the above cases, and furnishes the true rule of law to be applied in the case at bar. But we do not perceive that the Gaut Case announces any different principles. In this latter case the dispute was over the right of plaintiff to be assessed during his membership as of his "age of entry" into the association. It was decided that he had no such right. No such question is involved here. It is not contended by this respondent that Benjamin could only be assessed at his age of entry, and not at his attained age; but the contention is that in apportioning the rates under the resolutions above referred to the uniformity in apportionment on a basis of the "entire membership" of the association, which his contract provided for, was not observed; that the apportionment was fixed solely with reference to a part of the "entire membership" —the fifteen-year class; that his contract fixed a ratio as between members of the same age and members of a different age of the "entire membership" at the date of the last death claim, and required that in any apportionment increasing assessments such apportionment should be so made that every member of the same age of the entire membership should be assessed at the same rate; that the apportionment made by the resolution did not adhere to this basis, nor preserve this ratio, or attempt to do so, but the apportionment was confined solely to the membership joining prior to 1890—the fifteen-year class—and hence was a violation of his contract. This proposition was not involved in the Gaut Case, but it was the essential point involved in the Ebert and Strauss Cases, and there sustained, and we are satisfied that it must be sustained in the case at bar.

Very much is said in the briefs about "Experience Tables of Mortality," the necessity of requiring members "to pay the costs of their own insurance," the difference between the "mortuary calls" made upon the fifteen-year class and the "premium calls" paid by the ten-year class. As far, however, as Benjamin's contract is concerned, these matters only tend to confuse its proper consideration. Of course, an "Experience Table of Mortality" is the basis for figuring rates for life insurance, but this should have been taken into consideration when the association was making its contract of insurance with its members. The difficulties the association found itself in when it undertook to create the fifteen-year class, and assess them differently from its other members, and in violation of their contracts, arose no doubt, as stated by the Superintendent of Insurance of New York in his report heretofore adverted to, from "a lack of knowledge of the elementary principles of life insurance displayed by the earlier management" of the association. It is not so certain, however, but even these difficulties and the necessities they created might have been met by a uniform increase on the rates of the entire membership. But, whether they could or not, they afforded no excuse for violating the provision of the contract of insurance with Benjamin. Nor are we concerned with the distinguishing features between "mortuary" and "premium" calls. Benjamin's contract called for the payment of "assessments" for existing death claims. His contract furnished the ratio upon which an assessment should be based, namely, upon the "entire membership" in force when the liability of the assessment accrued, "to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each member" and to assess him at his attained age, and other members of his same age as of the age of their entry, was a violation of the contract of the association with him, and, for this reason, the assessment designated as "Mortuary Call 98" was void.

It is insisted by the appellant that the evidence shows an abandonment by Benjamin of his contract. This claims seems to be predicated upon the fact that he did not tender—assuming mortuary call 98 to have been illegal—the amount for which he was justly chargeable on that call under his contract, and in failing to make reply to a letter by the association to him requesting him to favor it with his "reasons for lapsing." But the assessment, being illegal and void, could not affect the plaintiff's rights. He was only required to pay legal assessments. He was not required to obtain the data upon which to correctly figure out what would be a proper amount to pay or tender, or to take chances of his tender being sufficient, if rejected, to preserve his rights. It was the duty of the association to make a lawful assessment, and the only obligation cast upon the plaintiff under his contract was to pay it on due notice, when it was lawfully made. Neither was he required to furnish the association with his reasons for "lapsing." There was no provision in his contract or the constitution or by-laws of the association requiring him to do so.

It is further claimed that the plaintiff is estopped from asserting the invalidity of "Mortuary Call 98," because her husband had paid similar calls, for several years prior thereto, without complaint, and which calls were subject to the same claim of invalidity as is asserted now. Assuming this to be true, it affords the association no ground for invoking an estoppel, for at least two reasons. In the first place, the appellant cannot take advantage of its own wrong, which would be the result if its claim of estoppel were sustained. All these prior calls, if levied upon the same theory and at the same ratio as that of call 98, were equally illegal with it, and it was wrong for the association to have levied them, or to have insisted upon their payment. They were demanded under an implied threat that, unless paid, his policy would be forfeited, and were paid under a moral compulsion. And, as said in Duggans v. Covenant Mutual Life Ass'n, 87 Ill. App. 416, quoting approvingly from a prior decision of that court: "It certainly cannot be said that Tuttle, in paying previous illegal assessments, acted fraudulently, or that he willfully did anything calculated to mislead others to their injury. When he paid illegal assessments he did so under a moral compulsion and a threat implied, at least, that if he did not pay his certificate would be forfeited, and the provisions made for his wife in case of his death be thereby lost. Can appellant be permitted to take advantage of its own wrong? We say it cannot." In the second place, and independent of the proposition that the association could not take advantage of its own wrong, the rule is general that the fact of prior illegal demands having been paid imposes no legal obligation to continue to pay them. The doctrine of estoppel has no application to such a case. Schultz v. Citizens' M. L. Ins. Co., 59 Minn. 315, 61 N. W. 331; Ins. Co. v. Knight, 162 Ill. 470, 44 N. E. 834. Some other claims are made by appellant in the way of estoppel, which have, in our opinion, no more force than the one just disposed of.

This disposes of all the points made on behalf of appellant for a reversal which we deem merit discussion. We do not pass upon the point as to the notice given to Benjamin by the association of the assessment in question, and which the lower court found was insufficient. Nor do we pass upon the preliminary objection raised by plaintiff against the consideration by us of the appeal from the order denying the new trial, which she urges upon the ground that there is nothing in the record to show that the motion for a new trial was based upon the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings in the case.

In our opinion, the evidence was sufficient to warrant the finding that the assessment in question was contrary to the express terms of Benjamin's policy and invalid, and hence the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ROONEY v. GRAY et al. (S. F. 3,092.)*

PLEADING—MISJOINDER OF ACTIONS—DAMAGES AND INJUNCTION—INJURIES TO PERSON AND PROPERTY—AMENDED PLEADINGS — APPEAL—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Where an action was tried on a second amended complaint, to which an answer was interposed, any error in the rulings sustaining the original and first amended complaints was immaterial.

2. In an action for damages for injury to dwelling houses caused by the conduct of a stone quarry, and to enjoin the further maintenance thereof, allegations of the complaint that large rocks were thrown upon plaintiff's premises; that large amounts of dirt and screenings had filled up the sewers, causing great volumes of sewer gas to arise therefrom, thereby endangering the health and lives of plaintiff, his family and tenants; that the houses were injured from flying rocks, which also endangered the lives and safety of the occupants; that clouds of dust arose and filled the air, to the injury of the health of plaintiff and his family—went to the propriety of the injunction, and did not constitute the basis of the demand for damages, so that a demurrer on the ground that causes of action for injuries to the person and for injuries to property were improperly united, or should at least have been separately stated, was properly overruled.

3. Where a complaint for damages was met by a specific denial of all its allegations, thus including a denial of all damages, and the case was tried on the issues thus raised, a judgment rendered on the merits would not be reversed because of the overruling of a demurrer addressed to the uncertainty of the allegations of the complaint in respect to the damages sustained by the particular injuries complained of.

4. Error in making a second and different order for judgment, without setting aside or modifying the first, is not available upon an appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll, but should be presented for consideration by a bill of exceptions.

5. In a suit for damages and for an injunction, the failure of the court to find upon the issue as to the right to injunction gives defendant no ground of complaint on an appeal from a judgment for damages without an injunction.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Patrick Rooney against George F. Gray and another, copartners as Gray Bros., and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants Gray Bros. appeal. Affirmed.

Fisher Ames, for appellants. Barna McKinne, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought to enjoin the defendants the Gray Bros. from working and operating a quarry and rock-crushing plant adjoining the premises of plaintiff, in the city and county of San Francisco, and also to enjoin the defendant Craig, the owner of the premises upon which said quarry and rock-crushing plant are located, from renting them to the said Gray Bros. for such purpose. Plaintiff sought also to recover damages in the sum of $5,000 from the Gray Bros. for injuries to three dwelling houses on his premises, it being alleged that the concussions occasioned through the blasting operations in said quarry had loosened and weakened the foundations of said houses, causing them to settle; that the blasts had broken the windows and projected large rocks through the sides and roofs of said dwellings, breaking large holes therein, rendering them unfit for use or occupation; and that the said Gray Bros. had negligently placed large quantities of dirt, waste rock, and screenings from their quarry on vacant land adjoining plaintiff's premises, which during a heavy rainstorm were washed down and carried on the premises of plaintiff, and deposited to the depth of from four to six feet against the west wall of a two-story frame dwelling owned by plaintiff, which caused said dwelling to be thrown out of plumb, bulged in the center, and greatly injured. The court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff against the Gray Bros. for $1,500, and in favor of the defendant Craig against plaintiff for costs. From this judgment the Gray Bros. appeal, and the case is presented here upon the judgment roll, accompanied by bills of exceptions as to some points of alleged error not available on the face of the roll.

1. The complaint in this case was twice amended, and it is urged that the court erred in overruling defendants' several demurrers to the original and the two amended complaints, and denying their motion to make the original complaint more certain and definite, as likewise their motions to strike out certain portions of the second amended complaint, and it is the accuracy of the rulings of the court on these several motions which is presented under the bills of exceptions. We are not concerned, however, with the rulings of the court upon the original or first amended complaint. These pleadings were superseded by the second amended complaint, which was answered by the defendant, and upon the issues thus made the cause was tried and judgment rendered. If this second amended complaint was not vulnerable to the attack the defendants made upon it by demurrer or motion to strike out, then it is of no moment whether the court erred in its rulings on the demurrer or motion to the previous pleadings of plaintiff or not. The sufficiency of this last pleading is alone in question.

This demurrer to the second amended complaint—to treat of it briefly, and in respect to the particular points upon which it is urged it should have been sustained—was interposed upon the assumption, unwarranted by the pleadings, that the complaint was framed for the recovery of damages solely, while it is clear that under it plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain defendants from further prosecuting blasting and rock crushing in the vicinity of his premises, as well as for damages which he alleged he had already sustained in injuries to his dwellings thereby. With a view of sustaining a right to an injunction, plaintiff averred, among other things, that the quarry was operated in such a manner by the Grays as to constantly throw large rocks upon his premises, which covered the land with débris; that large amounts of dirt and screenings from said quarry, deposited by the defendants on the streets and sidewalks adjoining the premises of plaintiff, had been swept by wind and rain upon his premises, filling up the sewers, preventing the sewage from flowing therein, and causing great volumes of sewer gas to arise therefrom, endangering the health and lives of plaintiff, his family and tenants; that his houses, two of which were occupied by tenants, and one by himself, were being injured from rocks cast upon and hurled through them, and the lives and safety of their occupants endangered thereby; that the effect of the said blasts and operations of the rock crusher was to cause great clouds of dust and fine sand to arise, filling the air about and in plaintiff's houses, to the great injury of the health of the plaintiff and his family; and that said dust settled in the houses, ruining the carpets, curtains, and household furniture therein. It is clear from these allegations of the complaint that they were made with a view of obtaining an injunction against defendants, and, except as to the allegations of plaintiff's injuries to his houses from blasts, were not made the basis of the demand for damages. So that, in this view, there was no merit in defendants' demurrer on the ground that several causes of action—damages for injuries to the person and damages for injuries to the property—were improperly united, or, if not improperly united, should have been separately stated, and hence the demurrer on this ground was properly overruled. The only damages sought were for injuries to the houses—particularly the two-story dwelling, the allegations concerning which we have already called attention to.

There are other grounds of demurrer interposed, which could not possibly have any merit, unless on the assumption that the complaint was solely one for damages; and, as it appears that that assumption is entirely erroneous, it would be waste of time to attempt to discuss them.

The demurrer urged, also, various particulars in which the complaint was uncertain, most of which, like the other grounds of demurrer just disposed of, being predicated on a false theory as to the scope of the complaint, have no force. It is particularly insisted, however, in the same line, that the demurrer should have been sustained upon the ground that, as to the injuries to his property for which plaintiff did seek damages, the complaint is uncertain as to the manner, extent, or amount thereof. It must be conceded that a more perfect pleading in this respect, as in some other particulars, might have been prepared, especially after three efforts in that regard, and it is possible that it may be to some extent open to the last objection urged against it—that it does not set forth with sufficient certainty the exact amount of damages sustained by the particular injuries complained of, although, as to the manner and extent of those injuries, the complaint is clearly certain enough. Yet we do not think it so fatally defective as to the allegation of damages that the order of the court overruling it should work a reversal. The general rule requiring the amount of damages sustained by several alleged wrongful acts of a defendant to be stated with exactness is in order that the defendant may have an opportunity of determining whether he will concede a good cause of action for any or all of the amounts claimed, or that, if not so conceding, he may be able to prepare himself with evidence upon the trial to contest them. Mallory v. Thomas, 98 Cal. 647, 33 Pac. 757; Foerst v. Kelso, 131 Cal. 378, 63 Pac. 681. Now it is quite evident from the record in this case that the defendants were not injured by the refusal of the court to sustain the demurrer in this respect under the above rule, or any extension of it which now suggests itself to us, because the answer of the defendant consists of a specific denial of all the allegations of the complaint. They deny that any of the injuries asserted by plaintiff occurred either through their acts or at all. Having presented these square issues, and the cause having been tried on them, it cannot be said that the alleged uncertainty in the complaint as to the amount of damages claimed to have been sustained by plaintiff could have misled or prejudiced the appellants, as their contention was that the plaintiff had suffered no injury at all. When a case has been tried and a judgment rendered on the facts, in order to warrant a reversal upon the ground of error in overruling a demurrer interposed on the ground of uncertainty in the complaint, it must appear that some substantial right of the demurrant has been affected—some prejudicial error, as distinguished from abstract error, suffered by him—or he has no room for complaint. Alexander v. Central L. & M. Co., 104 Cal. 537, 38 Pac. 410; Foerst v. Kelso, supra.

As to the motion to strike out portions of the second amended complaint, it is enough to say that the court granted the motion as far as the defendant was entitled to it.

2. In the record appears a "minute order for judgment" made by the trial court May 10, 1901, ordering that plaintiff have judgment against defendant for the sum of $50. On December 7, 1901, findings and conclusions of law awarding plaintiff $1,500 damages were filed, and a judgment for that amount recorded and docketed. It is insisted by appellants that the court erred in making a second and different order for judgment, without setting aside or modifying the first. But this point is not available to the appellants on the record. It cannot be considered upon an appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone. It should have been presented for consideration to this court on a bill of exceptions. The first order for judgment may have been set aside by consent of the parties or by an order of the court, and the entry in the minutes to that effect would not appear in the judgment roll. As is said in Paige v. Roeding, 96 Cal. 391, 31 Pac. 264, relative to the setting aside of a prior judgment, and which applies with all the more force as to setting aside a prior order: "Circumstances may have arisen wherein the trial court would have been justified, under the law, in setting aside the first findings and judgment, and in filing the second findings and judgment; and, with no showing to the contrary, we must assume that such circumstances did arise. * * * As already suggested, we find no bill of exceptions in the record, and it is only upon a bill of exceptions that we would be allowed to examine into the sufficiency of the reasons which moved the court to set aside and declare void its first judgment rendered in the case. Its order may have been erroneous, or it may have been entirely void; but the matter is not a proper subject of inquiry before us, not having been presented for a review in any form authorized by the statute." Also Von Schmidt v. Von Schmidt, 104 Cal. 549, 38 Pac. 361.

3. There is nothing in the point that the court failed to find upon the issue as to the right to an injunction. As we read the findings, we think it did. But if it did not, it could not affect the judgment which was rendered. This was solely for damages, and was based upon sufficient findings to warrant it; and plaintiff was entitled to recover such damages thereunder, whether there was a finding on the issue of the right to an injunction or not. The court awarded no injunction against appellants, and they have no cause to complain.

MARIPOSA COUNTY v. KNOWLES. (S. F. 4,031.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 18, 1904.)

PRIVATE ROAD—SUFFICIENCY OF BOND—DEPOSIT OF DAMAGES.

1. The validity of the bond required by Pol. Code, § 2692, to be filed with a petition for a private road, is not affected by inaccurate recitals as to the petition if the petition is sufficiently identified.

2. Where, by the terms of a bond, the principal and each surety is bound in the sum specified, the bond is both joint and several for that sum, whether it is so stated or not.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 40, Cent. Dig. Principal and Surety, §§ 105, 106.]

3. Pol. Code, § 4145, providing that the county treasurer shall receive no money into the treasury unless accompanied by a certificate of the auditor, has no application to money as damages for laying out a road deposited with the treasurer pursuant to section 2689.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the county of Mariposa against M. C. Knowles. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Wall, for appellant. J. A. Adair, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

SMITH, C. This is a proceeding to condemn a right of way for a private road over the land of the defendant. The plaintiff had judgment, and the appeal is by the defendant from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

From the findings it appears that all the proceedings before the board of supervisors were regular. But the finding as to the bond to accompany the petition required by sections 2692 and 2683 of the Political Code is attacked as not justified by the evidence; as is also the finding as to the deposit in the treasury of the $25 allowed as damages by the viewers, as required by the proviso in section 2689 of the same Code.

As to the bond the objections are "that the bond is joint, and no liability is fixed on the principal," and, consequently, none on the sureties; and that in the recitals of the bond the petition is inaccurately referred to as praying for a road "over the land of" defendant. But as to the latter point the description given is none the less accurate, because the road was also over the land of Helm, who was one of the petitioners; nor (provided the identity of the petition referred remains sufficiently clear) would a mistake in the recitals in the bond affect its validity; nor (assuming for the purpose of the decision that under the provisions of section 2690 of the Political Code objections to the bond can be considered) is the other objection more tenable. By the terms of the bond the principal and each of the sureties is bound in the sum of $100, and the bond is therefore both joint and several for that amount. Nor would the effect of the bond have been altered had the words erased from the penal clause, which purport to bind the parties "jointly and severally," been suffered to remain.

The objection to the finding as to the deposit of the $25 damages is also untenable. It is not disputed that this amount was deposited in the treasury by Helm, as a party interested in the road, under the proviso in section 2689 of the Political Code, cited, or that it was kept separate from the county moneys, which was all that was required. The provision of the section requiring the damages "to be set apart in the treasury out of the proper fund" applies only to the county moneys, and not to moneys paid by a private party under the proviso. Nor have the provisions of section 4145 of the Political Code, relating to auditor's certificate, any application to such moneys. Heppe v. Johnson, 73 Cal. 265, 14 Pac. 833.

I advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

BURBRIDGE v. RAUER et al. (L. A. 1,615.)

JUDGMENTS—ACTIONS TO SET ASIDE—PLEADING —PRESUMPTIONS—EXISTENCE OF DEFENSE.

1. An allegation of a complaint to set aside a justice's judgment that the note on which the judgment was obtained was never signed by any member of any firm of which plaintiff was a member, "to his knowledge," leaves it to be presumed, in support of the judgment, that it was so signed without plaintiff's knowledge, so as to bind not only the firm, but plaintiff himself individually.

2. A further allegation that, at the date of the commencement of the justice's court action, nothing was due or unpaid to defendant's assignor from plaintiff, permits of the presumption in support of the judgment that at that date the amount claimed was due and unpaid to defendant, who was then assignee and owner of the claim.

3. A complaint to set aside a justice's judgment, procured without any fraud on causes of action barred by limitations at the time the suit to set aside the judgment is commenced, is fatally defective where it fails to affirmatively show that there was a good defense to the justice's court action.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by O. H. Burbridge against J. J. Rauer and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Powers & Holland, for appellants. Borden & Carhart and George J. Lovejoy, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This is an action in which the plaintiff obtained a decree relieving him from a money judgment theretofore obtained against him by the defendant Rauer in the justice's court, restraining the enforcement thereof, and declaring said judgment to have been obtained without jurisdiction, and to be void and of no effect. The defendants appeal from the decree, and from an order denying them a new trial.

The appellants contend that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, or ground for the interposition of equity, for the reason that it does not show that the plaintiff in this case has or had any defense to the action in the justice's court. We think this contention is well founded, and that the general demurrer of defendants to the complaint should have been sustained.

The complaint herein, so far as necessary to be stated, runs as follows:

"That heretofore, to wit, on August 28, 1897, the said defendant Rauer commenced an action in the justice's court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, entitled as follows: 'J. J. Rauer, Plaintiff, v. First Doe, Second Doe, Third Doe, and Fourth Doe, Associated Together and Doing Business under the Firm Name and Style of Burbridge & Co., Defendants.' That in and by the complaint filed in the said action he alleged that on the 31st day of January, 1896, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, the defendants named in said action made and delivered to one H. Wahl a promissory note; a copy of said alleged promissory note being set up in said complaint, and being in the words and figures following, to wit:

" 'San Francisco, Cal., Jan. 31, 1896. On or before one year after date, we promise to pay to the order of H. Wahl (without interest) one hundred and eighteen and $^{75}/_{100}$ dollars ($118.75), at our office, value received. Burbridge & Co.

"That said complaint further alleged that the defendants therein named, though requested, had failed and refused to pay the said note, or any part thereof, and that prior to the commencement of this action the said H. Wahl indorsed the said note to the plaintiff in said action, and that said plaintiff is still the owner and holder thereof. The said complaint further alleged as a separate cause of action against the defendants therein named that there is now due, owing, and unpaid from said defendants the sum $120 for moneys loaned and advanced to the defendants within two years last past, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, at their special instance and request, by one W. S. Ray; that the defendants therein named, though requested, have failed, neglected, and refused to pay said sum of $120, or any part thereof; that prior to the commencement of said action the said Ray sold, assigned, and transferred to the plaintiff therein named all his right, title, and interest in and to the said claim and demand against the defendants."

The complaint then alleges that the plaintiff herein was never in fact served with summons in the justice's court action, though the sheriff's return thereon showed that he was so served. The complaint continues. "* * * And plaintiff further alleges that the pretended promissory note attempted to be set forth in the said action of Rauer v. Doe et al. was never signed by him, or by any member of any firm or copartnership of which plaintiff was a member, to his knowledge; and plaintiff further alleges that at the time of the commencement of said action of Rauer v. Doe et al. there was not due, owing, or unpaid from this plaintiff, or from any firm or copartnership of which this plaintiff was a member, unto the said W. S. Ray, the sum of $120, or any other sum."

There is no direct statement in the complaint and nothing to show that the note was not executed by the copartnership of which plaintiff herein appears to have been a member. The statement that the note was never signed by any member of any firm or copartnership of which plaintiff was a member, "to his knowledge," leaves it to be presumed, in support of the justice's court judgment, that it was so signed without his knowledge, but in such a manner as to bind not only the firm, but also the plaintiff herein in his individual capacity. The further allegation that at the date of the commencement of the justice's court action nothing was due or unpaid to Ray from plaintiff leaves us also to presume that at that date the $120, of the second cause of action, was due and unpaid to Rauer, the plaintiff in that action, who was at that time the assignee and owner of the claim. The causes of action set out in the justice's court case were barred by limitation before the commencement of the present action, and there was nothing to show that the plaintiff in that case was guilty of any fraud in the procurement of the judgment. Hence it would be inequitable to set aside the judgment without an affirmative showing in the complaint that there was a good defense to the justice's court action. Gregory v. Ford, 14 Cal. 139, 73 Am. Dec. 639; Harnish v. Bramer, 71 Cal. 155, 11 Pac. 888; Eldred v. White, 102 Cal. 600, 36 Pac. 944; Parsons v. Weis, 77 Pac. 1007. "Equity will not overturn a judgment valid on its face unless it is an unjust judgment." "It must be against conscience, and it must be made to appear that a like judgment would not follow in the same action, or upon the same cause of action." Harnish v. Bramer, supra. This defect in the complaint is material, and was not cured by the subsequent trial, findings, and judgment. The complaint lacked an essential and necessary allegation in a case of this character, and is fatally defective. It is therefore unnecessary to consider other questions presented in the briefs.

The judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; SMITH, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

146 Cal. 3

KENT et al. v. WILLIAMS et al. (S. F. 3,046.)

APPEAL—LAW OF THE CASE—NEW TRIAL—ORDER — CONSTRUCTION — NOTICE OF MOTION—CONTRACTS CONCERNING LAND — RECORDING OF CONTRACT — SUFFICIENCY—LIMITATIONS—SETTING UP NEW CAUSE OF ACTION—ESTOPPEL.

1. The determination of the appellate court becomes the law of the case, and is binding on the parties on another trial.

2. Where a notice of motion for a new trial by one defendant placed no limitation as to the issues upon which, or the parties between whom, such motion would be made, but stated in general terms that it was intended to move for a new trial "of the above-entitled action," and the order granting the motion was in general terms that the motion "for a new trial herein" is granted, the order, in effect, set aside the judgment as to all parties, notwithstanding a recital in the findings of fact that it was of no effect as between plaintiff and one of defendants.

3. Where the question was whether plaintiff or one of defendants should be first entitled to enforce a lien on a tract of land, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, an order granting a new trial on the motion of the defendant claiming the lien was binding on the defendant who owned the land, irrespective of whether he had notice of the motion, or made any appearance on the hearing thereof, the judgment being of such a character that the court could not, by granting a new trial, vacate it as between plaintiff and the other lienor, and leave it in force as between plaintiff and the owner.

4. Civ. Code, § 1158, declares that any instrument in writing affecting the title to real property may be recorded; section 1213 declares that every conveyance which is recorded as prescribed shall be constructive notice to subsequent purchasers, etc.; and by section 1215 the term "conveyance" embraces every instrument in writing by which the title to any real estate may be affected; and County Government Act, § 124 (Gen. Laws 1903, p. 157), requires the county recorder to record the instruments in separate books for deeds, mortgages, and "other instruments." Held, that where a contract for the sale of land called for a conveyance thereof on the full payment of the purchase price, and required the vendee to deposit a deed in escrow in favor of the vendor, conveying certain other land, and required the vendee to apply the proceeds of all sales of such land to the payment of his purchase-money note, a record of such contract in the volume of "covenants" was constructive notice to subsequent incumbrancers.

5. Civ. Code, § 1171, declares that grants absolute in terms are to be recorded in one set of books and mortgages in another. Held, that the mere fact that an instrument purporting to be an absolute grant may be shown to be a mortgage, does not authorize it to be recorded among mortgages.

6. A contract concerning land, and describing it as an undivided one-quarter interest in 1,700 acres, covering the greater portions of sections 21, 28, and 33, in township 13 south, range 23 east, in Fresno county, Cal., was not void by reason of uncertainty in description.

7. Const. art. 6, § 5, provides that an action for the enforcement of a lien on real estate may be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, is situated; and by Code Civ. Proc. § 726, there can be but one action for the recovery of a debt secured by mortgage. Plaintiff, having a lien on two parcels of land, one situated in F. county and one in another county, sued in F. county to enforce the lien on the land therein, and judgment was erroneously rendered for a sale of that land, but on a motion for a new trial the judgment was set aside. Held, that the court did not lose jurisdiction to render a judgment directing a sale of the land in both counties to satisfy all liens thereon by reason of the erroneous judgment, which had been vacated after the ascertainment of error.

8. Where a note given for the price of land was secured by a lien on that land and on another tract belonging to the vendee, and within four years after the maturity of the note the payee sued to enforce the lien on the latter land, a subsequent addition of a prayer seeking to foreclose the lien on the other tract did not introduce a new cause of action, but merely added a prayer for additional relief, which the court would have been authorized to grant without such amendment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 580, providing that the court may grant any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint.

9. The fact that on appeal counsel for plaintiff erroneously claimed before the Supreme Court that the action was brought only for the foreclosure of plaintiff's lien on a certain piece of land, did not estop him from thereafter claiming, in accordance with the opinion of the Supreme Court on appeal, the right in the same action and on the original complaint to foreclose a lien not only on such tract, but on another.

10. An order refusing to vacate a prior order or judgment, from which an appeal may be taken, is not appealable unless there is a record which presents matters for consideration that could not be presented on the appeal from the original order or judgment.

11. Code Civ. Proc. § 661, provides that, when a motion for a new trial is made on the minutes of the court, a statement shall be subsequently prepared and settled, which shall contain "the grounds argued" before the court for a new trial, and only those grounds, with so much of the evidence or other matter as may be necessary to explain them. Held, that an order denying a new trial was not subject to review on appeal where the transcript contained a document purporting to be a statement under the statute, which was signed by the attorneys and filed with the clerk, but did not appear to have been settled or authenticated by the judge, and did not contain any specifications of error, or purport to show what grounds were argued before the court.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by D. G. Kent and others against W. M. Williams and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendant the San Francisco Savings Union appeals. Affirmed.

H. C. Campbell, for appellant. John Reynolds, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. There have been two appeals heretofore in the present case, and the facts involved in the controversy are set forth in the opinions therein. 114 Cal. 537, 46 Pac. 462; 130 Cal. 401, 62 Pac. 620.

Upon the first trial of the cause, in 1895, the superior court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and afterwards, upon the motion of the appellant herein, granted a new trial, which, upon an appeal therefrom by the plaintiffs, was affirmed by this court upon the ground that, as the plaintiffs held a lien for their claim upon the Oakland as well as upon the Fresno property, while the appellant herein held a lien only upon the Fresno property, the superior court should have directed a sale of the Oakland property before resorting to the Fresno property. Upon the next trial of the cause in 1897, the superior court held that the judgment of 1895 had become final as between the plaintiffs and Williams, and that it was without jurisdiction to change its terms as against Williams, and that by reason of the former decision of this court that the Fresno property could not be sold until after the sale of the Oakland property there could be no judgment for the foreclosure of the plaintiffs' lien upon either the Oakland or the Fresno property, and therefore rendered judgment that the plaintiffs take nothing by their action. Upon an appeal by the plaintiffs from that judgment it was reversed, and upon the next trial of the cause the superior court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount of their claim, and directing a sale in satisfaction thereof, first, of the Oakland property, and, if the proceeds thereof are insufficient to satisfy their claim, then of the Fresno property. From this judgment the San Francisco Savings Union has taken the present appeal.

1. The main point urged by the appellant in support of its appeal is that, as Williams took no steps to set aside the judgment of 1895, and as the order granting a new trial upon that judgment was made solely upon its motion, the judgment against Williams became final, and there could be no further trial of the case as against him; that, as this court held upon the first appeal that the plaintiffs cannot foreclose their lien upon the Fresno property until the Oakland property has been sold, and its proceeds found insufficient to satisfy their claim, and as the plaintiffs omitted the Oakland property from the judgment of 1895, they have waived their lien thereon, and precluded themselves from obtaining any judgment for the sale of that property, there can be no judgment rendered in the case for any sale of the Fresno property which will affect the interest therein of the appellant. This proposition of the appellant is, however, the very point upon which the superior court rendered its judgment in 1897, in its favor, and which was reversed by this court upon the last appeal. In its opinion upon that appeal this court said (page 405, 130 Cal., page 621, 62 Pac.): "The court below held that the original complaint was not filed for the purpose of foreclosing the plaintiffs' lien upon the Oakland property, and that, as the first judgment had become final as to Williams, the court did not have the power to make a different decree and order the Oakland property sold first. In this, we think, the court erred." Acting upon this declaration applicable to the case before it, the superior court rendered the judgment now appealed from in accordance with the principles therein stated. An examination of the records in the two appeals shows that the facts upon this point upon which the rights of the respective parties depend are substantially identical. It must be held, therefore, that the superior court did not err in rendering its judgment in accordance with the principles declared upon the former appeal. See Klauber v. San Diego Street Car Co., 98 Cal. 105, 32 Pac. 876.

2. The proposition of the appellant that the judgment of 1895, as between the plaintiffs and Williams, was not affected by the order granting a new trial, but became and is still final so far as Williams is concerned, is not sustained by the record. Although a recital and statement to that effect is made by the court in its findings of fact, it is none the less a conclusion of law, depending upon the proceedings which had been taken in the case, and is refuted by these proceedings as set forth in the record. In its notice of motion for a new trial the appellant placed no limitation as to the issues upon which, or the parties between whom, such motion would be made, but stated in general terms that it intended to move for a new trial "of the above-entitled action"; and the order of the court granting the motion was in like general terms that "the motion of the defendant San Francisco Savings Union for a new trial herein be, and the same is hereby, granted." This order is to be construed by its terms, and as it was for a new trial of the action its effect was to vacate and set aside the judgment theretofore rendered in the action, and place the parties in the position they held before any trial had been had. Whether Williams had notice of the plaintiffs' motion, or made no appearance upon the hearing thereof, or appeared thereto without any notice, is not disclosed by the record, nor is the fact material. The judgment was of such a character that the court could not, by granting a new trial, vacate it as between the plaintiffs and the appellant, and leave it in full force in all its terms as between the plaintiffs and Williams; but, if the scope of the order is to be limited, as contended by the appellant, its effect would be to require Williams to satisfy the judgment out of property other than that which he had mortgaged for its security, and thus increase his burden, and indirectly contravene the provisions of section 726, Code Civ. Proc. If Williams did not have notice of the appellant's motion, and did not appear at the hearing thereof, the court would have been without jurisdiction to grant the motion (Herriman v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 44 Pac. 660, 46 Pac. 730, 35 L. R. A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81; United States v. Crooks, 116 Cal. 43, 47 Pac. 870), and it would have been denied; but in support of the validity of the order the jurisdiction of the court to make it must be assumed. If, in fact, the appellant gave no notice of its motion to Williams, and only asked for a new trial as between itself and the plaintiffs, the court was not precluded from granting a new trial of the entire action, and thus indirectly setting aside the judgment as to Williams, merely because he had not asked for it. Upon determining that it had erred in not directing the Oakland property to be first sold, and knowing that, in the absence of Williams, it had no jurisdiction to make any change in the judgment which would injuriously affect him, under the power which it was held at the last appeal the court possessed, it very properly granted a new trial of the entire action, as the only mode in which its error could be corrected.

3. The record of the contract between the plaintiffs and Williams, in the volume of "Covenants," gave constructive notice of its contents to the appellant. Section 1158, Civ. Code, declares that any instrument in writing "affecting the title" to real property may be recorded. Section 1213 declares that every conveyance of real property which is recorded as prescribed by law is constructive notice of the contents thereof to subsequent purchasers and mortgagees from the time it is filed with the recorder for record; and under section 1215 the term "conveyance" embraces every instrument in writing by which the title to any real property may be affected. The county government act (Gen. Laws 1903, p. 157) requires the county recorder to record the instruments authorized by law to be recorded "separately in large and well-bound separate books," and the subdivisions of section 120 of that act name the several classes of instruments for which such separate books are to be procured, and in which the instruments are to be separately recorded, the first of which subdivisions includes "deeds, grants, transfers, and mortgages of real estate," and the last of which is "such other writings as are required or permitted by law to be recorded." The contract between the plaintiff and Williams was not only an instrument which affected the title of the plaintiffs to the Oakland property which they agreed to sell to him, but by reason of the agreement therein on the part of Williams to deposit in escrow with the First National Bank of Oakland a deed of his interest in the Fresno property therein described as collateral security for his payment of the purchase price of the Oakland property it was also an instrument affecting his title to the said Fresno property. The contract was not a deed, or grant, or transfer, or mortgage by him of the Fresno property, but was an agreement by which his interest in that property, after he should deposit his deed with the bank, should be held by the plaintiffs as security for his obligation to them. In this respect the contract may be likened to an executory agreement for the sale of a parcel of real estate, and, as in the case of recording such an instrument, its record imparted notice of its contents to subsequent purchasers and mortgagees. Such instrument is not embraced within any of the classes of instruments for which separate books are specially designated, or for which the recorder is required to keep separate indexes, as was the case in Cady v. Purser, 131 Cal. 552, 63 Pac. 844, 82 Am. St. Rep. 391, cited by the appellant, but it is one of "such other writings" for which a separate book is to be provided. The recorder was, therefore, authorized to copy it into any book whose title would reasonably indicate its character, and when so copied it was duly recorded. The volume entitled "Covenants" is a proper designation of the character of the instrument, and its record therein could not have been misleading, and must be held to have been sufficient. The appellant thereby had constructive notice of its contents, and became charged with knowledge of all facts that any inquiry prompted by such notice would have disclosed. Upon such inquiry it would have learned that Williams had deposited with the Oakland bank the deed of his interest in the Fresno property, which the contract provided should be given as security to the plaintiffs for the payment of his promissory note. Such information of the existence of this unrecorded deed was as binding upon the appellant as if the deed had been properly recorded. Civ. Code, § 1217.

The contention that the subsequent recording of the deed in the volume of "Deeds" is of no effect, and that it should have been recorded in the volume of "Mortgages," cannot be maintained. The deed is without any conditions or qualifications, but is absolute in its terms; and section 1171, Civ. Code, declares that "grants absolute in terms are to be recorded in one set of books and mortgages in another." The fact that an instrument purporting to be an absolute grant is subject to a defeasance, or may be shown to be a mortgage, does not authorize it to be recorded among mortgages. Only such instruments as are mortgages by their terms are to be so recorded.

4. The objection of the appellant that the contract and deed are void by reason of the uncertainty in the description therein of the Fresno property must be overruled. It cannot be said that it is impossible, for one familiar with that part of the country to take that description, and with the aid of the record of Williams' interest in the land, ascertain and locate upon the ground the extent of his interest in the sections named in the contract. The court, in its judgment directing a sale thereof, gave a definite description of the portion in which the appellant is interested, and also of that in which it has no interest, and it must be assumed that it received competent evidence from which to ascertain these descriptions.

5. Upon filing the complaint in this action in the superior court of Fresno county that court acquired jurisdiction to render judgment for the foreclosure of the securities given for the note, and to direct a sale of the Oakland property, as well as that of the Fresno property. Under section 726, Code Civ. Proc., there can be but one action for the recovery of a debt secured by mortgage, and, if the property which is mortgaged to secure a debt is situated in different counties, under the Constitution, art. 6, § 5, providing that an action for the enforcement of the mortgage may be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, is situated, the plaintiff may commence an action in either of those counties, and in the single action obtain a judgment for the foreclosure of his mortgage upon the property in both counties. See Murphy v. Superior Court, 138 Cal. 69, 70 Pac. 1070, and cases there cited. Having acquired this jurisdiction, the court could not lose it by reason of any error which it might commit in the course of the trial, or by any erroneous judgment which it might render, and which, after ascertaining the error, it caused to be vacated.

6. The statute of limitations is not available to the appellant. The action was commenced in 1893, within four years after the maturity of the note of Williams, and the amendment of the complaint in 1897 did not introduce a new cause of action, but merely added a prayer for additional relief upon the cause of action set forth in the original complaint, which the court, under section 580, Code Civ. Proc., would have been authorized to grant without such amendment. See Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 99 Cal. 57, 33 Pac. 786. The fact that upon the first appeal counsel for the plaintiffs erroneously claimed before this court that the action was brought only for the foreclosure of their lien upon the Fresno property, did not estop them from afterwards claiming, in accordance with the opinion of this court, the right in the same action, and upon the original complaint, to foreclose their lien upon both properties.

7. The appeal from the order refusing to vacate the judgment does not present any facts for the consideration of the court other than those which are presented upon the appeal from the judgment itself; and the rule is well established that an order refusing to vacate a prior order or judgment from which an appeal may be taken is not appealable unless there is a record which presents matters for consideration that could not be presented upon the appeal from the original order or judgment. Goyhinech v. Goyhinech, 80 Cal. 409, 22 Pac. 175; Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 265, 33 Pac. 1103; Alpers v. Bliss (Cal.) 79 Pac. 171.

8. The appeal from the order denying a new trial cannot be considered. The appellant, in its notice of intention to make such motion, stated that it would be made upon the minutes of the court. Section 661, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, when a motion for a new trial is made upon the minutes of the court, a statement shall be subsequently prepared and settled, which shall contain "the grounds argued" before the court for a new trial, and only those grounds, with so much of the evidence or other matter as may be necessary to explain them. The transcript herein contains a document purporting to be such statement, which is signed by the attorneys and filed with the clerk, but does not appear to have been settled or authenticated by the judge, and does not contain any specifications of error, or purport to show what grounds were argued before the court on the motion for a new trial. For these reasons the order denying a new trial is not subject to review. Leonard v. Shaw, 114 Cal. 69, 45 Pac. 1012; Sprigg v. Barber, 122 Cal. 573, 55 Pac. 419. The appeals from the order refusing to vacate the judgment and from the order denying a new trial are dismissed.

BERRY v. BERRY. (L. A. 1,305.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 18, 1905.)

DIVORCE—NONSUPPORT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Under the express provisions of Civ. Code, § 130, a divorce may not be granted on the uncorroborated evidence of either party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Divorce, § 405.]

2. In divorce, evidence held insufficient to show that defendant had failed to support his wife to the best of his ability.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Suit by Ella Estelle Berry against John Ward Berry for divorce. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Will D. Gould and J. E. Bates, for appellant. Henry W. Nisbet, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an action for divorce. Plaintiff and defendant were married in Middlesex county, Mass., October 18, 1898. The plaintiff alleges in her complaint that for more than one year preceding the commencement of the action she has been and is now a resident of the county of San Bernardino, in the state of California. The complaint contains two counts. In the first it is charged that the defendant for more than a year immediately preceding the commencement of the action had willfully neglected and failed to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life by reason of his profligacy, idleness, and dissipation. In the second count it is charged that for more than a year immediately preceding the commencement of the action the defendant had willfully neglected and failed to provide plaintiff the common necessaries of life, he having the ability so to do, and had compelled her during said period to live upon the charity of her relatives and friends. The defendant, a resident of Massachusetts, where the parties were married, employed attorneys to defend the action, through whom a verified answer to the complaint was filed. In his answer he denied that the plaintiff had resided in the state of California for more than one year before the commencement of the action, or that at that time she was a bona fide resident of the state of California, and alleges that "the plaintiff moved from the commonwealth of Massachusetts into the state of California for the purpose of obtaining a divorce from this defendant for a cause not allowed by law in said commonwealth," and denies that he willfully or at all neglected or failed to provide for plaintiff the common necessaries of life, or that he did so by reason of profligacy, idleness, dissipation, or at all, and denies that he willfully or at all neglected or failed to provide the plaintiff with the common necessaries of life, or had compelled her to live upon the charity of her relatives or friends, or any of them; but, on the contrary, he alleges that he has at all times faithfully kept his marriage vows, and conducted himself toward the plaintiff as a faithful husband should, and alleges that the plaintiff has willfully been absent from the defendant for more than one year from the date of filing the complaint, without any cause or justification, and without the consent of the defendant. The court found that the plaintiff had been for more than one year preceding the filing of the complaint a bona fide resident of the county of San Bernardino, state of California, and that the defendant for more than one year prior to the filing of the complaint, to wit, the 29th day of June, 1901, had willfully neglected and failed to provide the plaintiff with the common necessaries of life, he, the said defendant, having during all of said time the ability so to do; and that plaintiff had been compelled to live upon the charity of her relatives and friends. The court, however, found in favor of the defendant in reference to the charge of profligacy, idleness, and dissipation. Judgment was accordingly entered granting a divorce to the plaintiff January 9, 1902. The defendant, through his attorneys, made a motion for a new trial on various grounds—among others, the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, and errors of law—which motion for a new trial was thereafter submitted and denied June 9, 1902. Thereafter, on July 3, 1902, notice of appeal from the judgment and also from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial was served and filed on the part of the defendant. Appellant, through his counsel, has filed a brief on the appeal, and at the October term of this court in Los Angeles argued and submitted the cause. The respondent has not filed any brief and failed to appear at the hearing of the cause on the argument.

From the record of the evidence contained in the statement on motion for a new trial it appears that the plaintiff was the only witness present at the trial of the cause. All the other evidence was by deposition of the parties in the East, including the father and mother of the plaintiff. The judge who tried the cause in the court below, in summing up the evidence in the case, says: "The only serious question in my mind is whether or not the wife, by the burden of proof, has shown that her husband is able, or was able during the period of the marriage, to provide her with the common necessaries of life, being firmly convinced as I am that he did not provide her with the common necessaries of life. The testimony shows that he went to Boston every day, and returned every night. We are led to infer that he worked while he was there. He testifies that he did work, and carried on his furniture business. There is no testimony which would support a finding of idleness or profligacy or dissipation on his part that I can see in the case. The only question is, was he able to provide his wife with the common necessaries of life? Our Supreme Court—and, I think, very properly, and in keeping with what I would consider to be a natural law—have said that if a man is able to work, but cannot get work, that fact in itself does not give the wife a ground of divorce. He must have property. He must have something whereby he can provide her with the common necessaries of life. * * * The only testimony I have on that point is the testimony of the wife to the effect that he was continually promising, but failed to provide; and it seems to me under all the testimony in the case—and I feel a little reluctant to arrive at that conclusion—but it seems to me under all the testimony in the case that the preponderance of the evidence is to the effect that he was able to provide her with the common necessaries of life, but that he failed and neglected to do so, and for that reason I shall order judgment in favor of the plaintiff on the second ground or cause of action." The law, however, declares in very explicit terms that no divorce can be granted upon the uncorroborated statement of either of the parties to the action. Civ. Code, § 130. And doubts should be resolved against a divorce instead of for it. "The marriage relation is the foundation of all society. It is not to be severed on slight grounds or for trivial causes. The policy of the law, therefore, is against granting divorces. Unlike other cases, in an action for divorce judgment cannot be rendered for the plaintiff on the default of the defendant, even upon a verified complaint; nor can it be granted upon the uncorroborated statement, admission, or testimony of the parties." Hatton v. Hatton, 136 Cal. 353, 68 Pac. 1016. "While an action to obtain a decree dissolving the relation of husband and wife is nominally an action between two parties, the state, because of its interest in maintaining the same, unless good cause for its dissolution exists, is an interested party. It has been said by eminent writers upon the subject that such an action is really a triangular proceeding, in which the husband and wife and the state are parties. * * * The parties to the action are not the only people interested in the result thereof. The public has an interest in the result of every suit for divorce." Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73. Upon the statement of the learned judge of the court below that the only testimony with reference to the failure to provide was that of the wife, the judgment of the court below should have been for the defendant. But in the testimony of the plaintiff herself she says, "I never knew him to withhold money from me when he had it, and I never knew him to have money around him." And there is no evidence in the transcript showing that the defendant did not do the best he could, under his circumstances, to support his wife.

At the time of the marriage the defendant was 23 and the plaintiff about 17. The defendant was just starting in as a partner in a business of repairing furniture in Boston, and was obliged to borrow from his sister in starting his business $2,500, and the evidence is all to the effect that he was an industrious, temperate man, and was never idle when he could get work. His mother and sister, it seems, did not view the marriage favorably, and the sister testifies that she met Mr. Allen, the father of the plaintiff, just before the marriage, and says, "I told him I did not think that my brother could support his daughter in the way his daughter wanted to be supported, and he said: 'I don't care if Ward has not one cent. I can afford to support them, if necessary.'" After they were married they went to housekeeping. His folks and her folks assisted in furnishing the house, and her father and mother and their adopted boy went to board with the parties from November until the next March, when the plaintiff and her mother went to Limerick, in Maine, where they remained until the latter part of the following October, 1899. Plaintiff's father, in his deposition, says: "I think my wife and I lived with Mr. Berry from November until the next March. On no occasion did I make complaint to Mr. Berry in regard to the board." In the transcript appear several letters from the plaintiff to the defendant while she remained at Limerick, of the most endearing character. Soon after their return from Limerick the plaintiff was about to be confined, and the physician who was consulted, it seems, advised taking her to a hospital of which he had charge. The deposition of the physician was introduced on behalf of the plaintiff at the trial. In this he says: "Q. I understand you recommended the removal of the plaintiff to the Frost Hospital? A. I did. Q. Did you attend her then? A. I did. Q. Did you render any bill to any one for medical services on this basis? A. I did. Q. To whom? A. The husband. Q. For attendance at the house and hospital both? A. Covering all attendance on the wife. Q. Did the husband pay this bill? A. He did. Q. Did he pay the entire bill? A. To the best of my knowledge he did. Q. Was the bill paid promptly? A. Reasonably so. Yes, sir. As doctors' bills are paid." In the deposition of Mrs. Allen, taken in Massachusetts, and read on the trial, she says: "I asked Mr. Berry if he was willing that his wife should go to the hospital, and he answered 'No,' that her place was at her home." And it appears from the defendant's deposition, as well as otherwise, that at that time the home of the parties was a suitable place for plaintiff's confinement. However, the physician thought he could attend to her better at the hospital; hence the removal there. Mrs. Allen, plaintiff's mother, further in her testimony says: "Q. How long was your daughter at the hospital? A. Two and a half weeks, I think that was the time I paid for. Q. You paid the hospital bill for the time she was there? A. Yes, sir." In this connection there was produced on behalf of the defendant, during the examination of the plaintiff herself on the stand, a letter which the defendant had written to her while she was in California, of which the following is a copy:

"Malden, Mass., June 11, 1900.

"My Dear Wife: Although I much dislike to refer to this matter you will recollect that your mother made complaint that since I had not paid the bills of Doctor Leeds, she herself was compelled to and did pay it. Yet I was surprised June 9, 1900, to learn from Dr. Leeds that she had paid him nothing whatever. Accordingly on the same date I paid his account amounting to thirty dollars as indicated by the copy of his receipt which I herewith mail to you. This I do so that you may not be misled by certain false statements and by various misrepresentations that have been made. You may rest assured of my constant and ever endearing love for you. And you ought to learn very much from this particular instance of misrepresentations here disclosed.

"Ever yours, J. Ward Berry."

Accompanying this is a copy of the bill of Dr. Leeds referred to, and which Dr. Leeds, as already shown, testified had been paid by the defendant, Berry.

The particular grievance of the plaintiff against the defendant is based upon what she supposed was his neglect to treat her properly and pay the bills while she was at the hospital during her confinement. In her cross-examination she says: "I wrote him a letter, and told him that if he could not take care of me through my confinement, and pay my bills, that I should not live with him another day. That is all I wrote him. Q. Is that the real cause of your leaving him? A. That is the real cause. Because I did not care anything about him after his abuse of me—abuses I went through and suffered all through my confinement, and before that."

In the defendant's deposition he says: "I was married to the plaintiff at Malden, Massachusetts, October 18, 1898. Our domestic relations were happy. I have never had any bad habits. I have always lived a plain and unquestionable life. I have never been profligate, idle, or dissipated, and never willfully or at all neglected or refused or failed to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life." Again, he says, after he earned some money as a clerk, "I put that money in the furniture business. I was in the furniture business from October 4, 1897, until the spring of 1900. The money I borrowed from my sister, Mrs. Cressey, I used in the furniture business. The furniture business was not a paying venture. It left me in debt other than to my sister. I had two or three hundred dollars in promissory notes I was obliged to take up. I was about three hundred dollars in debt six months before I gave up the furniture business in the spring of 1900."

The defendant testifies as follows in reference to his wife going to the hospital: "At the time of my wife's confinement the house was all furnished—five rooms; and my wife was provided with all that she needed in the way of food, clothing, and other comforts. The day that my wife went to the hospital the doctor sent for me to go down to his office to see him. He told me that my wife was in a critical condition, and that he did not care to take upon himself the responsibility of caring for her at the house, and that he wished I would consent to have her go to the hospital. I immediately went back and told my wife she had better go.

My wife said she did not want to leave her home, and she did not want to leave me. After she went to the hospital I packed the furniture up and had it moved over to Mrs. Annie Green's (her aunt), to be stored there. The same day that my wife went to the hospital she asked as a special favor to have the things and household goods packed up and stored at her aunt's house until she was able to go to housekeeping again. The child was born March 14, 1900, and died March 17th, the following Saturday, and was buried March 20th, and my wife stayed in the hospital one and a half weeks after the death of the baby. While she was at the hospital I called to see her every evening, after I was admitted, during the time she was there." It also appears from bills presented in his deposition that he paid the baby's funeral expenses. He further testified that all of his earnings went to the support of his family after his marriage, and there is nothing in the evidence in reference to his ability to provide for his family inconsistent with his own testimony.

In his deposition he also testifies that the plaintiff, in May, 1900, left Massachusetts, with her mother, and went to California for the purpose of getting a divorce. The plaintiff, in her testimony, denied that she ever told him she was going to California to get a divorce, but the circumstances surrounding the case seem to corroborate the defendant's statement. She testifies that she deserted him, and just before starting to California she dropped him a note as follows: "As I am going right away and auntie is soon to move, I sent your things over to your house. All except two carpets and the sideboard and two tables. Those I sold to pay my bills with, or help pay them. The other things are yours, the silver, that is the solid, is in your valise, and the other is in the half barrel which you had better take care of right away. Your clothes are in the packing box. I shall be many miles away when you receive your things and I thought I would see you had your things all right before I started." In her testimony she says: "My parents have been taking care of me since I have been in California. I have an explanation to offer as to those affectionate letters that have been introduced in evidence while I was living at Limerick. I was a very proud girl, and at that time I was very sick and needed sympathy, and I was too proud to go to my mother for it and so in that feeling I wrote to him. * * * And I did, as a matter of fact, think a great deal of Mr. Berry at that time; I did; I thought quite a little of him." Further she says: "I have not asked him for any money since I came to California. Q. Did he want you to come to California? A. I did not ask him. Q. You came right away on your own responsibility? A. I did; yes, sir. Q. And you never have asked him for any money for your support since then? A. No, sir."

The evidence on the part of the defendant, which is not contradicted in any material respect, is a complete answer to the plaintiff's complaint of want of care and attention on the part of the defendant during her sickness and confinement at the hospital, and this, in fact, according to her own statement, is her principal grievance on the charge of failure to provide, on the part of the defendant, the common necessaries of life. Aside from the want of evidence to support the finding on the merits of the action, it appears very plainly that the plaintiff was not a bona fide resident of this state, so as to entitle her to bring the action, even if a proper ground of divorce existed. According to the testimony of the plaintiff, her home at Highlands was with her parents, and in the deposition of her father, Mr. Allen, taken in Massachusetts, and used in her behalf on the trial, he says: "I returned from California a year ago last November, and my wife returned from California over six months ago. I returned for the purpose of protecting my business here in Boston. * * * I never voted there, and do not know that I am a citizen of California. I am a registered voter at Chelsea, and voted there at the last state election." It would appear from this, therefore, that the father of the plaintiff was not a citizen of California, but a temporary resident, at the most, in Highlands, in this state; and there is nothing to show that the plaintiff had a residence independent of that of her parents. There is nothing to show that the defendant ever was in California. His residence is in Boston. It is true she says she deserted him and came to California. Taking all the circumstances together, to say the least, it does not establish a clear case of a bona fide residence on the part of the plaintiff. But, inasmuch as the evidence utterly fails to support the finding upon the merits, it is not necessary to pass upon the question of residence.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

EXECUTIONS—EXEMPTIONS—LIFE INSURANCE.

1. The exemption from execution of "all moneys, benefits," etc., "growing out of life insurance, if the annual premiums paid do not exceed $500" (Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 18), extends to the beneficiary, and exempts insurance money received by a surviving wife from liability for her debts.

the estate of insured, after payment of the expense of administration, may be set apart for the benefit of the widow, under section 1465, without first paying the decedent's debts, and, when so set apart, are exempt as to her debts.

3. The deposit in the bank of life insurance money, which, under Code Civ. Proc. § 690, subd. 18, is exempt from execution, does not change its character so as to subject the amount to attachment under execution.

4. The court has the power to have a levy of an attachment on exempt property set aside.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by W. H. Holmes against N. A. Marshall and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Powers & Holland, for appellant. Morton, Houser & Jones, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This action is upon a promissory note for $1,000, dated October 5, 1899, signed by J. F. Jenkins and his wife, Annie J. Jenkins. J. F. Jenkins died intestate, and respondent, Annie J. Jenkins, is his surviving widow. After the action had been commenced, a writ of attachment was issued and levied upon $1,020.57 on deposit in the Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles to the credit of respondent Annie J. Jenkins. The court made an order, after notice, and on motion of respondents, setting aside the levy of said writ and dissolving it as to the money so on deposit with said bank. This appeal is from the order so made.

The principal question is as to whether or not the said money was subject to the debts of respondent Annie J. Jenkins, or exempt from execution against her. At the time of his death, J. F. Jenkins was the owner and holder of three full paid-up life insurance policies upon his own life, two of which (one for $99 and one for $1,385) were payable to respondent Annie J. Jenkins, and one of which (for $982.50) was payable to the estate of deceased, his administrators or executors. The estate of said deceased was duly probated, and the $982.50 insurance collected, which constituted the entire estate, and of which there remained $539.45 after paying costs and expenses of administration. This was set apart to the surviving widow, Annie J. Jenkins, as exempt from execution, under section 1465, Code Civ. Proc. The proceeds of all said policies were deposited by respondent Annie J. Jenkins, in one account, to her credit in said Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles. She drew against this account from time to time until the date of the levy of the attachment, when there remained the sum of $1,020.27 to her credit in said bank.

"All moneys, benefits, privileges, or immunities accruing or in any manner growing out of any life insurance, if the annual premiums paid do not exceed five hundred dollars," are exempt from execution. Code Civ. Proc. subd. 18, § 690. The main contention of appellant is that the exemption extends only against the debts of the person whose life was insured, and who paid the premiums requisite to procure the insurance and keep it in force, and that such exemption does not continue after his death, in favor of the beneficiary. In construing this statute, as in the construction of all statutes, it is the duty of the court to arrive at the intent of the Legislature, if it can be done, from the language used in the statute. Statutes exempting property from execution are enacted on the ground of public policy, for the benevolent purpose of saving debtors and their families from want by reason of misfortune or improvidence. The general rule now is to construe such statutes liberally, so as to carry out the intention of the Legislature and the humane purpose designed by the lawmakers. Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) vol. 12, pp. 75, 76, and cases cited; In re McManus, 87 Cal. 294, 25 Pac. 413, 10 L. R. A. 567, 22 Am. St. Rep. 250; Spence v. Smith, 121 Cal. 536, 53 Pac. 653, 66 Am. St. Rep. 62. Bearing this rule in mind, let us see what the Legislature has said as to this matter. It has said that where the annual premiums do not exceed $500 the insurance moneys shall be exempt from execution. Here the annual premium did not exceed $500. It has said that all moneys accruing or in any manner growing out of any life insurance shall be exempt from execution. The money here accrued and grew out of life insurance upon the life of deceased. After his death no execution could issue against him. The words "exempt from execution" were clearly intended to apply to the moneys coming from the life insurance to the hands of the beneficiary. It is exempt from execution as to all strangers or parties who have no claim to it, without any provision of statute. It was intended to exempt it from the debts of the party to whom it was payable, and who procured title to it by the death of the insured. It was not the intention that the insured might die, leaving a small insurance and a dependent family, and that the insurance money should be subject to execution for the debts of the wife, even if she is the beneficiary named in the policy. The words "exempt from execution" mean exempt from any execution. The Legislature mentioned no class of executions, and we are not at liberty to judicially insert a class. "Exempt from execution" includes the defendant Annie J. Jenkins, and applies to plaintiff. We have no decision of this court upon the question, and the decisions of other courts do not furnish much assistance, because the statute under which each decision was made is different from ours. In Kentucky and Minnesota the statutes declare, in effect, that certain insurance benefits, reliefs, etc., "shall be exempt from execution and shall not be liable to be seized, taken, or appropriated, by any legal or equitable process, to pay any debt or liability of a member." In both these states the fund or relief is held to be exempt from execution, whether against the original member, or against any beneficiary who has been paid or is entitled to be paid any benefit falling within the class described in the statute. Schillinger v. Boes et al., 85 Ky. 357, 3 S. W. 427; Brown v. Balfour, 46 Minn. 68, 48 N. W. 604, 12 L. R. A. 373; First National Bank v. How, 65 Minn. 187, 67 N. W. 994. It seems at least doubtful as to whether or not these decisions properly construe the statutes of these states. The decisions in other states—particularly in New York—hold similar language to create an exemption only as to the member or insured. In New York the language of the statute is that such funds shall be exempt "from execution, and shall not be liable to be seized, taken or appropriated by any legal or equitable process to pay any debt or liability of such deceased member." Bolt v. Keyhoe, 30 Hun, 619. The Kentucky and Minnesota cases are criticised by Freeman in his work on Executions (3d Ed.) vol. 2, § 234b. But the author says, in speaking of the language of the statutes in those states: "If these statutes stopped with the words 'exempt from execution,' there would be no doubt of the exemption in favor of the beneficiary; but the additional words in the statute indicate that the Legislature had in mind merely the debts or other liabilities of members of the association in question, and hence that, after the benefit was received by a person other than a member, it would be subject to the usual laws relating to executions." In our Code the statute stops with the words "exempt from execution." Under our statute, necessary household and kitchen furniture is exempt from execution; and, if the wife succeeds to such furniture, it is equally exempt as to her debts. The farming utensils or implements of husbandry of the judgment debtor are exempt, and, if the son should take them under the will of his father, following his father's occupation, they would still be exempt as to the son's debts. Equally true as to the insurance money in controversy herein. If it had come to J. F. Jenkins in his lifetime, it is conceded that it would have been exempt as to his debts. It came to his wife as his beneficiary, and is equally exempt as to her debts.

As to the policy payable to and collected by the estate, the estate was the beneficiary, and the money was, for the reasons before stated, exempt from execution. It was therefore assets of the deceased exempt from execution, and was properly set apart to the widow as being so exempt. Code Civ. Proc. § 1465; Estate of Samuel Miller, 121 Cal. 353, 53 Pac. 906. The administrator or executor is not the owner of any part of the estate. He, in his official character, only holds it in trust for the parties entitled to it, subject to the purposes of administration. The title to the insurance money came o respondent Annie J. Jenkins through the estate, and under the order setting it apart, and vested the title in her as effectually as if she had been named as the beneficiary of the policy. We can see no reason why the insurance money coming to her directly as beneficiary should be exempt from execution, and not that coming to her indirectly through the estate and the order setting it apart. In either case it is exempt from execution. In one case the instrument of life insurance gives her the title; in the other, the law gives it to her. The statute provides that all property exempt from execution shall be set apart for the use of the surviving husband or wife. Code Civ. Proc. § 1465. If it is exempt from execution before being set apart, it does not cease to be so the moment it is set apart. The widow takes the family allowance by order of the court. After it is paid to her, it cannot be seized on execution for her prior debts and diverted from the support of the family. The principle is fully discussed in regard to a homestead set apart for the family in Keyes v. Cyrus, 100 Cal. 322, 34 Pac. 722, 38 Am. St. Rep. 296. It was there held that the provision for setting apart exempt property, including a homestead, was for the protection and support of the family. The court said: "The authority given to the court in the first part of section 1465 to set apart for the family 'all the property exempt from execution including the homestead selected' implies that the property when set apart is exempt from execution. * * * A homestead may be set apart to the widow, even though the estate be insolvent, and the property so set apart constitute the entire estate of deceased; but, if the homestead thus set apart to her could be immediately taken in execution by one of her creditors, it would fail to be available for her use or support, and it might happen that her creditor would fare better than a creditor of the decedent whose money had perhaps been used to purchase the very property so set apart." In Barnum v. Boughton, 55 Conn. 117, 10 Atl. 514, it was held that money paid to the widow, as an allowance for her support, through the probate court, could not be taken or attached by one of her creditors. The court said: "She could neither ask nor receive it for the payment of her debts. The probate court could not grant it for that purpose. * * * If one allowance can be intercepted, so can every other, for, if the door is opened for one creditor, it cannot be closed against any, and the entire estate might thus be diverted from its legal destination. The law will not permit the instant necessities of the widow and the ultimate rights of the creditors of the estate to be postponed, in its name, to the demands of her creditors." So in this case the court will not allow the insurance money which is exempt from execution as to the creditors of the estate to be taken by the creditors of the widow. It is equally exempt as to them.

Appellant contends that by the deposit of the money in the bank the money lost its identity, and that thereafter the bank owed Annie J. Jenkins the money; that the debtor thus voluntarily parted with the money which was exempt, and acquired in lieu thereof a credit due by the bank. Such construction would seem to be unreasonable, and no authority is cited which supports it. It is true that, in one sense, by the deposit the relation of debtor and creditor was created as between the bank and Mrs. Jenkins, but she put the exempt money in the bank. She regarded it as money in the bank. She expected to, and did, draw it as she needed it. The bank did not give her the identical pieces of money that she deposited, but it gave her, as she drew upon it, money equal in value and kind. She was not required to keep the money buried or in her stocking, in order to have it remain exempt. If the appellant's theory is correct, she could not have paid a $5 grocery bill with a $20 piece, receiving $15 in change, without the risk of having the $15 attached. The law does not require such absurdity. The cases cited by appellant arose under the United States pension laws, and are not in point. The section of the Revised Statutes construed provides: "No sum of money due or to become due to any pensioner, shall be liable to attachment," etc. The courts have correctly held that the section only protected the money while due or in course of transmission to the pensioner. Money due or to become due is designed to protect the amount of the pension until it reaches the hands of the pensioner. It is then no longer money due or to become due. Our statute exempts the money, and, although deposited in the bank, it is still money and protected. It has not lost its identity because of the fact that the identical coins or bills deposited are not to be returned. Respondent probably never saw any coins or bills, but took the checks which the insurance company gave her as evidence that it had the money for her, and deposited them with the bank; having the amounts credited in her bankbook as evidence that she had the money in the bank. In Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. City and County of San Francisco, 139 Cal. 205, 72 Pac. 920, 96 Am. St. Rep. 100, it was held that the checks or orders drawn upon the Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer of the United States, payable on demand, are not merely obligations of the United States, but solvent credits, subject to taxation. The court said: "The orders were simply a convenient mode of payment of the obligation. They were, for all practical purposes, the money itself." So in the case at bar the credit in the bank is, for all practical purposes, under the exemption laws, to be regarded as the money itself. Respondent had the right to have the levy set aside upon the exempt property. Section 556, Code Civ. Proc., provides that the writ may be discharged when the same was improperly or irregularly issued. This was not a dissolution of the writ of attachment, but an order setting aside the levy as to the exempt property. It would be strange if a court were so impotent that it could not set aside the erroneous levy of its own writ upon exempt property. Any other rule would compel the injured party to bring a suit for damages, which not only would lead to delay, but might in the end prove futile. Courts have power over their own process, and to set aside a levy of a writ of attachment or execution upon exempt property. Freeman on Executions, § 271; Enc. Pl. & Pr. vol. 8, p. 579, and cases cited; Sandburg v. Papineau, 81 Ill. 446.

It follows that the order should be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; SMITH, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

SULLIVAN et al. v. GAGE et al., State Board of Examiners. (S. F. 3,062.)

CLAIMS AGAINST STATE—COSTS—FEES FOR RECEIVER'S ATTORNEYS — MANDAMUS TO STATE BOARD—EFFECT OF REJECTING CLAIM—DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—SPECIAL APPROPRIATION.

1. A judgment for counsel fees recovered by attorneys for a receiver appointed in a suit by the state to wind up the affairs of a corporation are not costs, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1038, providing that where the state is a party, and costs are awarded against it, they must be paid out of the state treasury, so as to take from the State Board of Examiners all discretion in the allowance of it as a claim against the state.

2. Where the order appointing a receiver is void for want of jurisdiction, an order awarding counsel fees for the receiver is also void.

3. An order awarding counsel fees for services of an attorney for a receiver should run in favor of the receiver, rather than to the attorney.

4. The State Board of Examiners not having authority to "entertain for a second time a demand against the state once rejected by it, unless such facts are presented as in suits between individuals would furnish sufficient ground for granting a new trial" (Pol. Code, § 670), mandamus does not lie to compel the allowance of a claim which the board has once rejected.

5. The dismissal of an appeal from an order of court is not an affirmance of the order, so as to give it any validity which it otherwise did not have.

6. St. 1895, p. 238, c. 193, making an appropriation for payment of five distinct claims of different persons, is void under the provisions of Const. art. 4, § 34, that "no bill making an appropriation for money, except the general appropriation bill shall contain more than one item of appropriation and that for one single and certain purpose, to be therein expressed."

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action for mandate by Jeremiah F. Sullivan and another against Henry T. Gage and others, constituting the State Board of Examiners. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. C. Van Fleet and W. B. Treadwell, for appellants. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, awarding a temporary writ of mandate against the defendants, the State Board of Examiners, commanding the board "to forthwith approve and allow" a claim of the plaintiffs against the state of California for $5,000. The facts material to this consideration are as follows:

In 1888 an action was commenced by the people of the state of California, upon the relation of George A. Johnson, Attorney General, under section 803 of the Code of Civil Procedure, against the American Sugar Refinery Company, a corporation, to obtain a judgment excluding that corporation from its corporate franchise on the ground of misuser. In January, 1890, a judgment was rendered in this action excluding the corporation from the franchise, dissolving it as a corporation, and imposing a fine upon it; and in February, 1890, the court, upon the application of the Attorney General, and upon order directing the defendant to show cause, made its order appointing Patrick Reddy receiver in the action, to take possession of all the property of the corporation, and to hold the same pending the appeal from the judgment. Reddy qualified as receiver, took possession of some of the property of the corporation, and so continued until the 9th day of June, 1890. Upon that date a writ of prohibition was issued from this court in the case of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192, adjudging that the order of the superior court appointing Patrick Reddy receiver, and all orders made by the superior court in pursuance or aid thereof, were null and void and of no effect, and in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court; and the superior court and its judge were prohibited and restrained from in any manner acting upon and enforcing the orders, or either of them, and the court was further commanded without delay to revoke and annul the orders, and each of them.

On January 10, 1891, Patrick Reddy filed in the superior court his account and report of his administration as receiver, in which he stated that he had been "obliged to employ counsel for the purpose of advising him in his duties in the premises, and did employ Messrs. Sullivan & Sullivan," plaintiffs herein, and that their services as such were reasonably worth $5,000. On the same day the superior court made its order appointing M. C. Blake a referee to take proofs as to the matters embodied in the report, and to report, amongst other things, "the amount proper to be allowed as compensation for the services of Messrs. Sullivan & Sullivan, attorneys at law, rendered to said Reddy while acting as such receiver." On February 3, 1891, Blake made his report, which contained the statement that Messrs. Sullivan & Sullivan had acted as attorneys and counsel of the receiver in all the matters of said receivership, and had rendered valuable and important services, and that such services were reasonably worth the sum of $5,000, and that no payments had been made on account thereof. On the day upon which the report was filed, the court made its order approving it, which order contained the following: "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that Messrs. Sullivan & Sullivan are entitled to the sum of five thousand ($5,000) dollars from the state of California." No notice was given to the state of any of these proceedings, nor was the state represented at any of these hearings. In April, 1891, the Attorney General took an appeal to this court from this last-quoted order or judgment. On December 14, 1892, and while this appeal was pending, plaintiffs presented to the State Board of Examiners their claim for "professional services rendered by said Sullivan & Sullivan as attorneys and counselors for the receiver appointed by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, in that certain action entitled 'The People of the State of California, upon the Relation of George A. Johnson, Attorney General, Plaintiff, v. American Sugar Refinery, Defendant,' during the first six months of the year A. D. 1890. Said sum of $5,000 (five thousand dollars) was fixed and allowed as the fee of Sullivan & Sullivan for said professional services by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco by order of said court duly given, made, and entered in said court on the 3d day of February, 1891." On December 15, 1892, the Board of Examiners made its order rejecting the claim, as follows: "The annexed account for $5,000, presented by Sullivan & Sullivan for legal services (case of People v. American Sugar Refinery Company), forty-first fiscal year, is rejected and disallowed, under section 662, Pol. Code, because the board is of the opinion that the state is not liable, in view of the facts, evidence, and decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192, and Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 87 Cal. 267, 25 Pac. 433, 10 L. R. A. 650." Thereupon plaintiffs appealed to the Legislature from this disallowance of their claim, and served notice upon the State Board of Examiners of their appeal. In 1895 the Legislature passed the following act (St. 1895, p. 238, c. 193):

"An act appropriating money to pay the claims of H. P. Dyer, F. F. Dyer, C. A. Granger, Gaston Goldsmith, and Sullivan & Sullivan.

"The people of the state of California, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

"Section 1. The sum of eight thousand six hundred and forty-five dollars is hereby appropriated out of any money in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the claim of H. P. Dyer for four hundred and six dollars; C. A. Granger for four hundred and thirty-one dollars; F. F. Dyer for two thousand seven hundred and seventy-five dollars; Gaston Goldsmith for thirty-three dollars; and Sullivan & Sullivan for five thousand dollars; which amounts have been assessed as costs against the state of California in the case of The People of the State of California v. The American Sugar Refinery Company, number twenty-four thousand three hundred and eighty-one, in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco."

Thereafter, and upon July 12, 1895, Messrs. Sullivan & Sullivan again presented to the Board of Examiners a claim reciting the facts above stated as to the report of Mr. Reddy, its reference to Mr. Blake, his report thereon, and setting forth "that thereafter said report came on regularly for hearing before said superior court, and said court, after due consideration, duly gave and made a judgment confirming said report, and directing payment to said Sullivan & Sullivan of said sum of five thousand dollars; that said judgment has never been reversed, vacated, or set aside; that on the 27th day of March, 1895, an act of the Legislature of the state of California was duly passed and approved by the Governor of said state, appropriating out of the moneys in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of five thousand dollars to pay said claim of Sullivan & Sullivan." On December 13, 1895, the State Board of Examiners again rejected the claim, in the following order: "The annexed account for $5,000, presented by Sullivan & Sullivan for legal services in the case of The People v. Am. Sugar Refinery Company, is rejected and disallowed under section 662, Pol. Code, because not a legal charge against the state." This last-mentioned claim was also presented and acted upon by the State Board of Examiners while the appeal from the order of the superior court was still pending. On February 7, 1899, this court made its order dismissing the appeal theretofore taken by the state from that order for the failure of the appellant to file any transcript on appeal. And upon March 10, 1899, the remittitur on such appeal was filed in the superior court. On March 6, 1899, the plaintiffs again presented to the board their claim, and on June 27, 1899, the board again rejected the claim, stating: "This claim is disapproved by the Board of Examiners. First. Because the demand was rejected by the State Board of Examiners for sufficient reason on December 15, 1892, and a second time rejected by said board for sufficient reason on the 13th day of December, 1895, and there appears no law whatever authorizing this board to entertain the same demand a third time. Accordingly the board disapproves this claim, and causes the same to be filed with the records of the board, with the foregoing statement showing such disapproval and the reasons therefor." Upon this rejection the plaintiffs sued in mandate, and, as has been stated, obtained a judgment of the trial court commanding the board of examiners "to forthwith approve and allow" their claims, and from this judgment the State Board of Examiners have appealed.

Appellants' first contention against the judgment may thus be summed up: That the board of examiners, in passing upon claims such as this, are vested with discretionary and judicial powers; that mandate will not lie therefor to compel them to exercise those powers in any given way, or, as here, to force the board to approve and allow a claim. Second. That mandate will not lie in this case, because the board has already acted, has exercised its discretionary and judicial powers, and has three times rendered its judgment against the validity of the claim; that plaintiffs' only redress is by direct appeal from such judgment, or by such other appropriate mode of relief as the state has provided, and, if the state has provided no mode of relief, then the action of its agents, the board of examiners, is final and conclusive. Respondents, in answer to this, admit the well-settled rule that mandate will not lie to compel a tribunal exercising discretionary and judicial functions to act in a particular way, but they insist that mandate will lie to compel specific form of action where no discretionary or judicial powers are vested with the board or with the tribunal, and where but one form or course of action is open to them upon the claim; and they insist that their own case is of the latter sort. Furthermore, they urged against the objection that the board has already acted by rejecting the claim that these orders of rejection do not constitute res adjudicata against them, for the reason that at the time of these rejections the appeal from the order allowing them counsel fees was still pending in the court, and was therefore sub judice, while, at the time of the commencement of this action by a dismissal of that appeal, the order had become final and valid by operation of the judgment of dismissal.

The duties and powers of the board of examiners in these matters are prescribed by sections 660, 661, et seq., of the Political Code. Three classes of claims are there specified. The one for which appropriations have been made (sections 660, 661, 662); the second, those for the settlement of which provision has been made by law, though no specific appropriation has been made therefor (section 663); and the last, those for the settlement of which no provision has been made by law (sections 664, 665, and 666). As to the third class, the board has no power other than "to report to the Legislature such facts and recommendations" as they deem proper. In acting upon a claim of the other two classes the board is authorized by these sections either to approve or disapprove them. Respondents, in support of their contention that the State Board of Examiners was not called upon to exercise discretionary and judicial functions in the matter of their claim, place great reliance upon the case of Lawrence v. Booth, 46 Cal. 187. That was mandate against the State Board of Examiners to compel the allowance of a claim for costs in an action commenced by the district attorney upon behalf of the state, which costs were assessed by the district court under the provisions of a special statute; the contention of the defendant board being that the award of costs by the district attorney was not conclusively binding upon it, and did not, therefore, control its action. That contention was disposed of in the following language: "At all events, the requirement of the statute, as we construe it, is positive, that the cost of publication, as taxed by the court, shall be paid by the state. This leaves to the auditing officers no discretion as to the amount for which the claim shall be allowed. It must still pass through the hands of the Board of Examiners, in the ordinary routine of business, but the amount allowed can be no other than that fixed by the judgment of the court." Here, it will be observed, was waged no controversy over the provisions of the statute, nor over the validity of the order of the court in fixing costs; the point of difference being merely, as has been stated, whether the court's allowance absolutely controlled the action of the Board of Examiners. Apart from such exceptional cases as that illustrated in Lawrence v. Booth, it is unquestionably the fact, and has been so declared by this court, that the State Board of Examiners does exercise, in the generality of cases, discretionary and judicial action, making their acceptance or rejection of a claim not only final, but free from collateral attack. And so it is distinctly laid down as to the powers of this board upon these very claims in Cahill v. Colgan, 31 Pac. 614, where it is said: "The Board of Examiners has unlimited power to investigate the merits of all claims presented for allowance, and may act upon facts within the personal knowledge of its members, as well as upon evidence from other sources. Pol. Code, §§ 658, 666. It was the duty of the Attorney General, as a member, to impart to the board his personal knowledge of all material facts in regard to the suit of People against Havemeyer, which suit had been prosecuted by him, and he must be presumed to have performed this duty. In the matter of approving and rejecting claims against the state, the Board of Examiners acts judicially, and its decisions in cases of which it has jurisdiction are not subject to collateral attack. In his work on Judgments (section 532), Mr. Black says: 'When the statutes commit to a board of county commissioners or supervisors or auditors or to a town council the duty of examining and auditing claims against the municipality, their action in auditing, adjusting, or rejecting such a claim is judicial in its nature, and their decision is binding and conclusive, unless reversed on appeal;' citing, among other cases, Osterhoudt v. Rigney, 98 N. Y. 222; Colusa County v. De Jarnett, 55 Cal. 373; Placer Co. v. Campbell (Cal.) 11 Pac. 602. In Osterhoudt v. Rigney, 98 N. Y. 223, the court said: 'The acts of a board of audit, within its jurisdiction, in the absence of fraud or collusion, are final and conclusive, and cannot be questioned on a collateral proceeding. Whether the claim is a proper town or county charge, in a case where it is doubtful and rests upon disputed evidence, and what amount shall be allowed when not fixed by statute, are questions which the statute commits to the determination of the board of audit; and however much it may err in judgment upon the facts, so long as it keeps within its jurisdiction and acts in good faith, its audit cannot be overhauled, but is final, as well as to the taxpayers as to the claimant.' See, also, Robinson v. Supervisors, 16 Cal. 209; Miller v. Sacramento County, 25 Cal. 94; Emery v. Bradford, 29 Cal. 75, 84; Scheerer v. Edgar, 76 Cal. 569, 18 Pac. 681; Bernal v. Lynch, 36 Cal. 135; Black, Judgm. § 250." In further support of the principles here enunciated, and on the proposition that mandate will not lie to compel specific action by a tribunal vested with discretionary powers, may be cited Tilden v. Supervisors, 41 Cal. 68; Berryman v. Perkins, 55 Cal. 483; Strong v. Grant, 99 Cal. 100, 33 Pac. 733; Jacobs v. Supervisors, 100 Cal. 121, 34 Pac. 630. While in Wood v. Strother, 76 Cal. 545, 18 Pac. 766, 9 Am. St. Rep. 249, upon which respondents rely, it is said: "If the determination of the tribunal was intended to be final, it is plain that it cannot be disturbed, either on mandamus or in any other way. If it was not intended to be final, but there is other 'plain, speedy, and adequate remedy,' the writ cannot issue, for it was not designed to usurp the place of other remedies."

We are thus brought to consider whether the claim before us presents a case within the exception to the general rule as noted in Lawrence v. Booth, for, if it does not, then clearly this action will not lie. Herein respondents cite section 1038 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that when the state is a party, and costs are awarded against it, they must be paid out of the state treasury; and their argument which follows is that the award which the court made in their favor was, in effect, an award for costs in the action, and that the order fixing the amount having been made by a court of competent jurisdiction, and the appeal from that order to this court having been dismissed, the matter becomes an absolute finality, and that naught is left for the State Board of Examiners but to approve their claim. But the parallel between this case and that of Lawrence v. Booth would be much closer, were it not for the objections which are presented to all these matters. In the first place, section 1038 is dealing merely with "costs," as such. Plaintiffs' claim is not a claim for costs, within the meaning of this section and of its chapter, nor was the award made to them by way of costs. Moreover, the validity of the order itself is here called in question, whereas the validity of the order made in Lawrence v. Booth was never in controversy. It is beyond peradventure that this court decided that the appointment of the receiver in the case of People ex rel. v. American Sugar Refinery was void, as being in excess of the jurisdiction of the court. Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192, and Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 87 Cal. 267, 25 Pac. 433, 10 L. R. A. 650. This, it will be observed, does not present the case of a reversal of an order appointing a receiver for mere error or irregularity in its procurement. It presents the case of an order void for want of legal authority, and where the receiver, in point of law, was not a receiver, but a trespasser. It is so stated in Costa v. Superior Court, 137 Cal. 79, 69 Pac. 840, where it was held that the superior court had no jurisdiction to appoint an administrator of the estate of a living person, and the appointment was therefore in excess of jurisdiction and void. This court said: "In this case the court finds that it has never acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter involved in the proceedings. Its previous orders were entirely void, and in this very judgment it is so declared. The petitioner, therefore, has not been placed in possession of the property by any valid order or process of the court. After the judgment declaring the grant of administration and all subsequent proceedings void, the petitioner will be regarded as a trespasser from the beginning. He cannot be regarded as a receiver whose possession is that of the court." See, also, Staples v. May, 87 Cal. 178, 25 Pac. 346. The cases are not infrequent where the court has settled the account of a receiver erroneously appointed, and made the amount a charge against the party who has procured the appointment, but no case has been brought to our attention where a court has made such an order when its own judicial act in appointing the receiver was nugatory and void for want of jurisdiction. The receiver is not obliged to accept such appointment, and in such a case as this, as the court was without power to appoint him, it must equally be without power to make any other order depending for its validity upon the order of appointment. The utmost that is left for a receiver appointed under such circumstances is his right of action for compensation against the party procuring his appointment. Thus, in Grant v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 324, 39 Pac. 604, where this court denied a writ of prohibition, it is said: "It is suggested, however, that an order fixing the receiver's compensation in this proceeding might conclude the rights of the petitioners as to costs to be included in the final judgment, or in a separate action by Silver to recover the amount allowed. But they certainly cannot be concluded by the order in any collateral proceeding or new action if the court has no jurisdiction to make it." And in Grant v. Los Angeles & Pacific R. Co., 116 Cal. 71, 47 Pac. 872, it was contended by appellant that, as the order appointing the receiver was absolutely void upon its face for want of jurisdiction in the court to make it, the order fixing the compensation of the receiver, being founded thereon, was equally void; and this court, after discussion, summed the matter up in the following sentence: "That order [appointing the receiver] being void, the present order must of necessity be held, as to appellant, likewise void." So, here, it must result that the order allowing compensation, being based upon a void order appointing the receiver, is itself void. But these are not the only considerations. The order, it is to be noted, is an order directing the payment of the money to Sullivan & Sullivan, and not to the receiver. Yet it is in favor of the receiver alone that the order should have run. The employment of Sullivan & Sullivan came wholly from the receiver, and to him alone were they entitled to look for compensation. If the order in question be construed as a judgment in favor of Sullivan & Sullivan, it is a judgment in favor of one not a party to the action, nor an officer of the court. If it be construed as an order, then it is fatally defective, in that the order should have run in favor of Mr. Reddy, and should have been an allowance to him upon account of his obligation to the attorneys whom he had employed. It is thus declared in Stuart v. Boulware, 133 U. S. 78, 10 Sup. Ct. 242, 33 L. Ed. 568, where the court says: "If it were proper for the receiver to employ counsel, the allowance of reasonable counsel fees is to the receiver, and not directly to the counsel, and such fees would constitute only one of the items in the receiver's account. The counsel had no cause of action, but the allowance was, in legal effect, to the receiver, to enable him to make compensation for professional services." Nor is this distinction unimportant. The receiver might have a cause of action against the party securing his appointment, whereas the attorney for the receiver has no such right of action, and can look for compensation only to the person who appointed him. So in this case Sullivan & Sullivan would have no right of action against the state. That right of action would be vested in Mr. Reddy alone. Their sole right would rest in their claim against the receiver. The same principle was declared in Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. 345, and Henry v. The Superior Court, 93 Cal. 569, 29 Pac. 230. In each of those cases an order making allowance to the attorneys directly was held to be void, and in the latter case it was annulled on certiorari.

It thus appears that the claim presented to the State Board of Examiners was a claim essentially calling for the exercise of discretion and judgment, and that this was employed with the result that the claim was three times rejected. It might well be sufficient to rest the matter here, but, in addition to what has been said, another sufficient reason may be advanced. Section 670 of the Political Code provides as follows: "The board must not entertain for the second time a demand against the state once rejected by it, or by the Legislature, unless such facts are presented to the board as in suits between individuals would furnish sufficient ground for granting a new trial." It is not disputed that the claims presented were the same. But one change had occurred since the rejection of the claim in 1895, and its new presentation and rejection in 1899, and that was that the state's appeal from the order which forms the basis of the claim had been dismissed. Upon this it is contended, as has before been stated, that the fact of dismissal not only worked an affirmance of the order appealed from, but established its validity, and that therefore the former rejection cannot be regarded as res adjudicata, and the situation was different in important legal particulars at the time of the last presentation and rejection. But the claim was last presented upon March 6th, and the judgment of dismissal did not become final by the going down of the remittitur until March 10th. So at the time of the last presentation the appeal, in contemplation of law, was still pending, and the position of the claimants was precisely the same as it was in 1895. But aside from this, the dismissal of the appeal from the order was not an affirmance of the order so as to give it any validity which otherwise it did not possess. A dismissal of an appeal is an affirmance of the judgment only in a limited sense. If the judgment is void on its face, the dismissal of the appeal from it in no wise cures such vital defect. At the most, the dismissal prevents a second appeal, and relieves the order or judgment from attack for error or irregularity which could have been taken advantage of upon appeal. Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 374, 26 Pac. 206; Ritzman v. Burnham, 114 Cal. 522, 46 Pac. 379; U. S v. Gomez, 23 How. 326, 16 L. Ed. 552, 587. Says this court in Pioneer Land Co. v. Maddux, 109 Cal. 633, 42 Pac. 295, 50 Am. St. Rep. 67: "The affirmance by the appellate court of a void judgment imparts to it no validity, and especially if such affirmance is put upon grounds not touching its validity. * * * The Supreme Court of Mississippi said that the affirmance of a void judgment on appeal, upon grounds not touching but overlooking its invalidity, did not make it valid. When a judgment is lacking in any of the foregoing particulars, it matters not whether it was rendered by the highest or lowest court in the land, it is equally worthless. No one is bound to obey it. The oath of all officers—executive, legislative, or judicial—compels them to disregard it." It follows, therefore, that the mere fact that the appeal had been dismissed did not impart any validity to this void order.

There is left for consideration the effect of the legislative act above quoted. The claim which was presented to the State Board in 1895 was based upon the act, and was rejected. In this particular the situation is not changed since the rejection of that claim, and no new rights which would "furnish sufficient ground for granting a new trial" have been shown. In that view of the case, it was the duty of the Board of Examiners to refuse to consider the claim anew, and plaintiffs were barred by the rejection of 1895. And finally, if the validity of the appropriation act itself be involved, it is, without doubt, violative of section 34, art. 4, of the Constitution, which provides that "no bill making an appropriation of money except the general appropriation bill shall contain more than one item of appropriation, and that for one single and certain purpose to be therein expressed." The language of this section is so plain that, read side by side with the act in question, it would seem to cut off the need of discussion. There is here not only more than one item, but the items themselves are not for a single purpose. Murray v. Colgan, 94 Cal. 435, 29 Pac. 871.

The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed.

WESTERN UNION OIL CO. v. NEWLOVE et al. (L. A. 1,625.)

ACTION BY LESSEE — SELF-SERVING DECLARATIONS OF LESSOR—IMPEACHING WITNESS—INCONSISTENT STATEMENT — RELATING STATEMENTS TO WITNESS—OBJECTION TO TESTIMONY.

1. In an action between a lessee and the owner of adjoining land, involving boundary, declarations of the lessor in his own favor are not admissible for the lessee.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, allowing a witness to be impeached by evidence of statements inconsistent with his testimony, where, in an action by a lessee against the owner of adjoining land, involving the question whether there had been a practical location of the boundary on the line where the lessor had erected a fence, the lessor having testified that the fence was put up by him on his own land for his own convenience, and not as a boundary fence, and that there was no agreement with reference to it, he may be impeached by inconsistent statements, though they were made after the date of the lease.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, providing that, before a witness can be impeached by statements inconsistent with his testimony, the statements must be related to him, and he must be asked whether he made such statements, it is not enough to ask him whether he had a conversation at a certain time and place with a certain person "in regard to the building of that fence to which you have referred in your direct examination," he having testified that he built it for his own convenience, and not as a boundary fence.

4. Where unobjectionable impeaching testimony of one witness is objected to "as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and also on the ground that sufficient foundation had not been laid," the statement of counsel that the same objection is interposed to the impeaching testimony of another witness, which is objectionable only in that the statements testified to by the latter witness had not been sufficiently stated to the witness to be impeached, this is not enough to call the court's attention to the distinction.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Action by the Western Union Oil Company against Joseph Newlove, executor, and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bicknell, Gibson & Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, and Canfield & Starbuck, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, for respondents.

SMITH, C. This is a suit to quiet title to a strip of land containing 54.97 acres, described in the complaint. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff appeals from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff, under a lease from Careaga to its assignor, of date March 14, 1900, is lessee for a term of years of a tract of land owned by Careaga since about the year 1882. The defendants are the executors, widow, and devisees of John Newlove, deceased, who became the owner of the tract adjoining the Careaga tract on the north about the year 1880. There is a fence on or near the common boundary between the two tracts, which was erected by Careaga in 1888. But it is claimed by the plaintiff that the true boundary is from 2.80 to 3.44 chains to the northward; and the land in controversy is the strip lying between this line and the fence. It is claimed by defendants in their answer that in the year 1888, there being some controversy about the boundary, there was an agreement between Newlove and Careaga fixing the line where the fence was shortly afterward erected by the latter, and that this fence has ever since been acquiesced in by the owners of both tracts as the boundary. It is also claimed that it was part of the agreement that Newlove, upon inclosing his land, should pay half the cost of the fence; and accordingly the agreed one-half value of the fence, $250, was in the year 1898 paid to and accepted by Careaga. On the issues thus raised the findings of the court are for the defendants. The court also finds "that plaintiff's alleged cause of action is barred by laches," and "that plaintiff is estopped from claiming that said fence line is not the dividing line between the said lands in which it has an estate for years and the lands of defendants."

The points urged by the appellants' counsel are: (1) That the court erred in ruling that Careaga could be examined as to statements made by him to witnesses Tunnell and Martin subsequently to the date of Careaga's lease to plaintiff's assignor, and also, in permitting Tunnell and Martin to testify to such declarations; (2) that the court also erred in excluding the declarations of Careaga in his own favor concerning the boundary of the Careaga ranch; (3) that the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding as to laches, or (4) as to estoppel; and (5) that the third finding conflicts with the findings from the fourth to the eleventh. But with regard to the last objection, we do not see that this is the case. Findings 4 to 11 are the findings as to the practical location of the land by the parties in 1888. The third finding is simply to the effect that the two tracts have a common boundary, but the location of that boundary is not found otherwise than as it may be inferred from the practical location. Nor, were it otherwise, would the conflict be material, as the necessary effect of a practical location is, in general, to establish a different line from the true line as originally existing. Nor are the findings as to estoppel and laches of any materiality. Presumably, they are merely legal conclusions from the findings as to practical location; otherwise there would be no evidence to support them. But they may be stricken out without affecting the judgment, which is fully supported by the findings as to practical location. Dierssen v. Nelson, 138 Cal. 397, 398, 71 Pac. 456; Cavanaugh v. Jackson, 91 Cal. 583, 27 Pac. 931; Burris v. Fitch, 76 Cal. 398, 18 Pac. 864; Helm v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 476, 18 Pac. 604; White v. Spreckels, 75 Cal. 616, 17 Pac. 715; Columbet v. Pacheco, 48 Cal. 397; Cooper v. Vierra, 59 Cal. 283; Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 626 et seq. The objection to Careaga's declarations in his own favor were also rightly sustained. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1849-1853; Williams v. Harter, 121 Cal. 52, 53 Pac. 405; Taylor v. McConigle, 120 Cal. 126, 127, 52 Pac. 159; People v. Blake, 60 Cal. 510, 511, dissenting opinion of McKee, J.; Fischer v. Bergson, 49 Cal. 297.

This leaves us to consider only appellants' first point, which, however, involves several points which will require separate consideration. As to the questions to Careaga, we do not doubt they were admissible. Careaga had testified on his examination in chief that the fence was put up by him on his own land for his own convenience, and not as a boundary fence; and also that there was no agreement with reference to it. It was therefore competent to ask him whether he had not made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony. Code Civ. Proc. § 2052. As to the testimony of Martin, that also was admissible. Careaga had been asked specifically as to the statements to which Martin testified, and had denied making them. The evidence was therefore clearly competent under the provisions of the section of the Code cited above. It is, indeed, urged that, where a witness is questioned as to a collateral matter, his answer must be taken as conclusive, and that evidence to contradict it is not admissible; and it is claimed that the test of materiality is as stated in the case of George v. State, 16 Neb. 321, 20 N. W. 312, where it is said: "If the question put to a witness on the part of the state on his direct examination would have been objectionable as being no part of the state's case, then it is collateral, and the party asking it is bound by the answer, and will not be permitted to cause another witness to contradict it." In applying this it is argued that Careaga's declarations, having been made after the date of the lease to plaintiff's assignor, were inadmissible, and therefore could not be proven. But the decision does not support this position. It refers to the original statements of the witness on his direct examination, which were material. So that the real test is whether "the matters sought to be contradicted were immaterial." Lake Erie Co. v. Morain, 140 Ill. 122, 29 N. E. 869; Attorney General v. Hitchcock, 1 Exc. 99.

But with regard to the witness Tunnell a serious question is presented. All that was asked Careaga with reference to him was whether he had a conversation at a time and place mentioned with Tunnell "in regard to the building of that fence to which you have referred in your direct examination," and the statements to which Tunnell's testimony refers were not related to him. These statements were therefore inadmissible, and, the evidence having been objected to on the ground that sufficient foundation had not been made, their admission was error. Code Civ. Proc. § 2052. But this defect in the testimony of Tunnell is not urged by counsel, and probably escaped the attention of the court. The witness Martin had been previously examined, and his testimony had been "objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and also on the ground that sufficient foundation had not been laid," and objection had been overruled and exception taken. But upon examination of Tunnell we find nothing as to the ruling of the court except the statement of plaintiff's attorney that the evidence was "subject to the same objection, ruling, and exception." This, perhaps, we may assume was assented to by the court; but it seems clear that the testimony of both witnesses was put in the same category by the plaintiff's attorney, and the court therefore could not be expected to observe the distinction. Also the statements made to Martin and Tunnell were, in effect, the same, and Careaga's denial of the former necessarily indicated that he would have denied the latter had the statement related to him. The error, therefore, we think, was immaterial.

We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

In re HOLT'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,321.)

CONTEST OF WILLS—DEVISE TO NIECES—WHO INCLUDED—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. In the contest of a will by the stepdaughter of a brother of testatrix, evidence considered, and held insufficient to show that contestant was intended to be included in the provision for "my nieces."

2. Evidence of declarations made by testator after the execution of the will is inadmissible on the question as to who were intended as testator's nieces.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 49, Cent. Dig. Wills, § 1040.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

To the probate of the will of Cecelia Holt, deceased, Anna Louttit filed a contest, and from the decree of distribution contestant appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Louttit, for appellant. Ashley & Neumiller and Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by Anna Louttit from that part of the decree of distribution in this estate which distributes certain property of the deceased to other persons to the exclusion of the appellant. The deceased left a will in which, after certain specific legacies, she refers to the rest and residue of her property, and says: "And I give and bequeath such residue and rest of my estate to my nieces and nephews * * * share and share alike." By the decree of distribution the said residue is distributed to certain persons who are the nieces and nephews, and they are the only nieces and nephews of the testatrix, and among them the appellant was not included. Appellant is not a niece of the testatrix. She is the daughter by a former marriage of a Mrs. Hunter, who afterwards married John Fisk, a brother of the testatrix. She was about six years old when her mother married Fisk, and lived in the family with her mother and Fisk. Her name until she was married was Anna Hunter. Appellant's contention is that, upon the evidence introduced in the case, she should be held as within the class designated in the will as "my nieces and nephews." It is hardly necessary in this case to discuss the question whether the well-known meaning of "nieces and nephews"—that is, children of brothers and sisters—is not so free from either latent or patent ambiguity as to leave no room for explanatory extrinsic evidence, because the evidence introduced by appellant fails to show that she was a niece in any secondary or remote sense of the word, even if such evidence could be supposed to be admissible. The appellant introduced two witnesses on the subject—Mrs. Strohmeier, a sister of the testatrix, and her daughter, Ethel Strohmeier. The former testified to parts of a letter—the other parts having been lost or destroyed—from a sister of the testatrix to the appellant, which is of no consequence, except that it closes with the words, "with love to all from your Aunt Tina"; and, in answer to the question if appellant was taken into the family of John Fisk and treated as one of the family, the witness said: "Of course, her mother took her, and she lived right with her mother." She also said that the only nephews and nieces of the testatrix of whom she had any knowledge were those mentioned in the petition for distribution. The witness Ethel was asked what, if anything, the testatrix had said to her, after the making of the will, about the appellant. To this question respondent objected on the ground that declarations of the testatrix either before or after the making of the will were not competent evidence. The court intimated that this was the rule under the Civil Code, and counsel for appellant said that the purpose of the proposed testimony was not to vary the will, but to get declarations as to the relationship between the testatrix and the appellant, whereupon the court said: "I will permit you to go on to that extent, if it is no declaration on her part as to what she meant by the will—as to relationship I will admit that." The witness then testified by question and answer as follows: "A. Well, after the will had been made she was thinking over it, and she said that, while Anna Louttit was not her niece, she felt she would like to remember her, and that she wanted her to be considered the same as her other nieces. Q. The same as her other nieces? A. That is, she did not consider her a niece, but she wanted her to come—to be brought in the will the same as the rest of them. Q. She did not consider her a niece by blood, was that it—was not a blood relation? A. Well, she never spoke of her as a niece at all—she did not consider her a niece—but then she wanted her to be remembered in the will." Mrs. Strohmeier was recalled, and said that the appellant had addressed the testatrix as "aunt," but to this question: "Did you ever hear Mrs. Holt speak of her as a niece—anything about that?"—she answered, "No."

The above was substantially all the evidence introduced by appellant on the subject. And we think that the evidence fails to show that the court was not justified in finding that appellant is not a legatee under the will. The evidence does not show, even if it were permissible to introduce evidence to show, that the appellant was so treated and considered by the testatrix as a niece as to bring her, in any sense, within the category of "my nieces and nephews." The declaration of the testatrix to the witness Ethel, after the making of the will, that "she would like to remember" the appellant, etc., did not in any manner change the will, and was, indeed, inadmissible, and was not within the purpose for which the testimony of the witness was admitted by the court. The intention of a testator must be found in the language used in the instrument, not in his oral declarations as to what he intended. Under any view of the law, the declarations of the testatrix were admissible only as evidence of the fact that she always treated and considered appellant as her niece, and the evidence introduced entirely fails to show that fact. In the case of Grant v. Grant, 5 Law Reports (Eng.) 727, cited by appellant, the facts were very different from those in the case at bar, even if that case can be considered as rightly decided; but the case was substantially overruled in the later English case of Wells v. Wells, reported in 18 Law Reports, 504.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA RY. CO. v. WORKMAN, City Treasurer of Los Angeles et al. (L. A. 1,302.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREETS—IMPROVEMENTS—RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY—LIABILITY OF ASSESSMENT.

1. Vrooman Act, § 7 (Laws 1885, p. 147, as amended by Laws 1891, p. 196), providing for an assessment on the lots and lands fronting on the improved portion of a street, to pay for such improvement, does not authorize the assessment of a special tax for street improvement on a portion of a railroad right of way abutting the improved street, not subject to sale on execution, and necessary to enable the railroad company to operate its road under its franchise.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Suit by the Southern California Railway Company against W. H. Workman, as city treasurer of the city of Los Angeles, Cal., and another. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Cole & Cole, for appellants. C. N. Sterry and T. J. Norton, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Action to enjoin a sale of a portion of plaintiff's right of way. A temporary injunction was granted, which by the judgment was made perpetual. This appeal is from the order granting the injunction and from the judgment.

The plaintiff is a railroad corporation operating a railroad about 487 miles in length, in and through five counties in the southern part of the state. A portion of its main line, running from Los Angeles to Barstow, is located and operated in Los Angeles county, and 1,012 feet of the right of way of this line abuts on Pasadena avenue, in the city of Los Angeles. The city proceeded to make certain improvements on Pasadena avenue under the provisions of the statutes authorizing the making of such improvements and the charging of the costs to abutting property. By the proceedings of the city council the cost of the improvements was to be assessed upon abutting property upon the front-foot method provided by statute. An assessment for the purposes of said improvement was attempted to be made upon a small portion of plaintiff's right of way, consisting of an irregular strip, about 9,500 feet in length and from 60 to 100 feet in width, which attempted assessment described the property as follows: "Commencing at N. W. intersecting point of Avenue 33 and the right of way of the Southern California Railway Company, thence meandering in a northerly direction 9635 min. to Avenue 50, thence along the S. line of Avenue 50, 62 min. thence meandering in a southerly direction 9566 min. to Avenue 33, thence W. 60 along the N. line of Avenue 33 to beginning. Being the Southern California Railway right of way between Avenues 33 and 50." Plaintiff refused to pay the amount of the attempted assessment, and a bond was issued by the city, and sold to appellant Fox. The bond described the property assessed the same as in the above description in the assessment, except the words, "Being the Southern California Railway right of way between Avenues 33 and 50," were omitted, and instead thereof the words "Owner is the Southern California Railway Company, a corporation." were added. The notice of sale described the property as it is described in the bond. Plaintiff commenced this action to enjoin the sale, and, after setting forth the facts, alleged in its complaint "that, unless restrained from so doing, the said defendant W. H. Workman, as such city treasurer, at the request of the defendant Fox, will on Tuesday, the 14th day of January, 1902, proceed, under said advertisement and notice of sale, to sell or attempt to sell that portion of the right of way of the plaintiff hereinabove described, and upon which it is operating a railroad as aforesaid, in accordance with said notice, for the purpose of satisfying said bond." The complaint further alleged that the threatened sale would cause it great and irreparable injury, and "create a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff to said portion of said right of way, and to its right to use and occupy the same as and for its business of a common carrier of passengers and freight." The defendants filed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and they declined to answer.

We are of opinion that the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It states that the assessment was "upon that portion of the plaintiff's right of way herein described." The assessment concludes with the words of identification, "being the Southern California Railway right of way between Avenues 33 and 50." It was evidently the intention to assess and sell the right of way as described by metes and bounds in the assessment.

The statute in regard to assessments for the improvement of streets provides for an assessment upon the lots and lands fronting on the improved portion of the street. Section 7, Vrooman Act (Laws 1885, p. 147, as amended by Laws 1891, p. 196).

There is no authority for making an assessment upon a right of way, or for selling the same. A railroad is a quasi public corporation, in which the public is interested. It holds a franchise from the state, and must operate its road or forfeit its franchise. A part of its right of way cannot be sold on execution or for a street assessment. The decisions are not in harmony on the question, but we think the best-considered cases hold that such right of way cannot be sold to satisfy a street assessment. In C., M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. City of Milwaukee, 89 Wis. 509, 62 N. W. 419, 28 L. R. A. 249, the question is ably discussed, and the court said: "Whether the track and right of way of a railroad company is subject to assessment for local improvements on the ground of special benefits, under the language of statutes, couched in general terms, providing for such assessments, is a question upon which the courts have not been agreed. The system and policy of each state enter largely into the question, and give to it a local character. By the charter of Milwaukee, the improvement of Commerce street was chargeable to and payable by the lots fronting or abutting upon such street, * * * to the amount which such improvement shall be adjudged by the board of public works to benefit such lots; and an assessment of the amount is provided for, which, when confirmed by the council, its collection may be enforced in case of nonpayment by a sale and conveyance of the lots so assessed. City Charter (Laws 1874, pp. 359, 362, c. 184, subc. 7, §§ 2, 7). So much of the lots in question as were occupied by the tracks of the railroad and supporting banks, and used for right of way purposes, had been devoted and dedicated to uses in which the public had an important interest of a probable perpetual duration; and to enforce an assessment against such right of way and track, extending about half a mile in distance, by a sale and conveyance, would necessarily dismember and break up the entirety and utility of the road as a line of travel and commercial intercourse, and interfere with and impair the paramount interests which the public have in it for these purposes. The property of the corporation in its road and appurtenances essential to its operation and use, annexed to the franchise of the company to maintain and operate its road, is an entirety, and is thus charged, in the hands of the company, with an important trust in favor of the public, though the property in all other respects is essentially private, and operated for private gain. Public policy would seem to forbid a severance and segregation of its several special or particular parts, essential to the exercise of the franchises and the use and operation of the road by forced sale upon legal process or for an assessment."

In L., N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Boney, 117 Ind. 501, 20 N. E. 432, 3 L. R. A. 435, the court said: "The other feature of the case presents a question of much greater difficulty. According to the established rule of the common law, which controls the current of modern authority, the franchises of a corporation—mere incorporeal hereditaments—were not subject to seizure and sale upon execution in the absence of express statutory provisions authorizing the sale and prescribing the method of transfer. It follows as a natural sequence that lands, easements, or things essential to the existence of the corporation and the execution of its corporate duty, and without which its franchise would be of no practical use, cannot be levied upon and sold on execution at law, so as to detach them from the franchise, and thus destroy its use."

The Court of Appeals of Missouri, in Sweaney v. K. C. R. Co., 54 Mo. App. 266, said: "The sole question is this: Does the law authorize the enforcement of a special tax bill for a street improvement against a detached right of way? * * * The tax bills in suit were issued on the theory that the land along the line of the graded street, and used by a railroad as its right of way, is chargeable with such local improvements, just as other adjacent property. This, too, is the position taken and so forcibly urged on us by plaintiff's counsel. But however cogent the argument, and however reasonable and just may be the position contended for, yet, under the repeated decisions of our Supreme Court in cases which we deem analogous, we must hold that plaintiff cannot maintain this suit, which has for its aim and purpose the carving out, sale, and conveyance of a portion only of defendant's right of way. Admitting the terms 'adjoining lands,' 'all the property on both sides,' etc., appearing in the Kansas City Charter, to be sufficiently general to embrace the railroad right of way, but even then we are met with the doctrine of our adjudicated cases that a lien will not be enforced against a mere fractional part of a railroad right of way, except it be specially authorized by the Legislature, in language not to be doubted." See City of Philadelphia v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co., 33 Pa. 41; City of Allegheny v. Western Pa. R. Co., 138 Pa. 375, 21 Atl. 763; Bridgeport v. N. Y. & N. H. R. Co., 36 Conn. 255, 4 Am. Rep. 63; Detroit, G. H. & M. Ry. Co. v. City of Grand Rapids, 106 Mich. 13, 63 N. W. 1007, 28 L. R. A. 793, 58 Am. St. Rep. 466.

It is not necessary to decide in this case as to whether or not the fee or reversion in the land can be assessed. After a right of way has been acquired by a railroad corporation by condemnation or otherwise, and its track laid upon it, we apprehend that it would be difficult to realize by a sale of the fee remaining in the grantor. But without deciding this question, it is sufficient to say that this proceeding is for the purpose of enjoining a sale of plaintiff's right of way; that is to say, its easement. The judgment is that the bond is void as a lien upon plaintiff's right of way, and that defendant be enjoined from selling "any part or portion of plaintiff's right of way in said complaint, and hereinafter described." If the defendants do not intend to sell the plaintiff's easement, but only the subordinate estate, the judgment is not in any way injurious to them. The restraining order is merged in the judgment, and the appeal therefrom may be dismissed.

We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed, and the appeal from the order dismissed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; SMITH, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed, and the appeal from the order dismissed: VAN DYKE, J.; SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

In re HAYDEN'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,318.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1905.)

GUARDIAN'S ACCOUNT—TIME FOR FILING—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—ITEMIZING BILLS PAID—CONDUCT OF COURT—SUBMISSION OF CAUSE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1774, providing that the guardian must on the expiration of one year from the time of his appointment, and as often thereafter as he may be required, present his account to the court for settlement and allowance, it is no objection to a guardian's first account that it was filed before the expiration of a year from his appointment.

2. On the contest of the account of the guardian of an aged and infirm ward, evidence is inadmissible as to an agreement by which contestant was to support the ward during her life in consideration of the conveyance to contestant of the reversion in certain land after the death of the ward.

3. Bills paid for medical services are sufficiently itemized in a guardian's account where the amount, the person to whom paid, the nature of the services rendered, and the dates of payment are given.

4. Appellant cannot complain that the court ordered the cause submitted before all of his evidence was introduced, and without argument, because the court refused to hear certain immaterial evidence, and stated that the witness could leave the stand, "and the matter will stand submitted," where appellant offered no further evidence, and did not request to be heard in argument.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge.

To the account filed in the guardianship of the person and estate of Sarah C. Hayden, incompetent, F. H. Collins filed a contest, and from an order allowing the account contestant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. Nicol & Orr and E. C. Foltz, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This is an appeal from an order allowing the first account of the guardian in the above-entitled matter. The appeal is by F. H. Collins, a contestant, who claims to be an interested party.

One of the main objections relied upon was that the court had no jurisdiction, for the reason that one year had not elapsed from the date of the appointment of the guardian. There is no merit in the objection. The guardian is subject to the supervision of the court, and must render his account as guardian for examination and approval. The usual complaint is that these accounts are not rendered often enough, and not that they are too frequent. Section 1774, Code Civ. Proc., provides that the guardian must, upon the expiration of a year from the time of his appointment, and as often thereafter as he may be required, present his account to the court for settlement and allowance. The section, while making it the duty of the guardian to file his account upon the expiration of the year, does not prohibit him from filing and presenting it sooner. We will not presume that he will file his accounts so frequently as to incur needless expense and annoy the court. If such case should occur, the court will protect itself.

Several errors are assigned as to rulings on the admissibility of evidence, which do not require special notice. We have examined them, and find no error that would justify a reversal of the order. The questions relate principally to an agreement made by Collins, the contestant, to support the ward during the remainder of her life, in consideration of the conveyance of the reversion of certain real estate after the death of the ward. The existence of such an agreement, the fact as to whether or not Collins performed it, and the consideration for the conveyance to Collins, were matters that might have been for determination in other suits under proper issues; but in this case the ward was an old lady, paralyzed, helpless, and needing the care of a nurse at all times. She had plenty of property to support her; in fact, the income appears to have been sufficient for such purpose. In such case it was the duty of the guardian and of the court to see that she had all the necessary comforts that could be supplied to her in her last days, even if it had taken the principal for such purpose. The court should not have allowed her to be deprived of suitable food, nursing, and medical attendance in order that the estate left might be larger, or that some distant relative might be benefited. If she was not cared for by Collins, and the guardian gave her such care, his account will not be disallowed because Collins had made an agreement to care for her. In this case the amount expended for board, medicine, nursing, and medical attendance, including a considerable amount paid out in litigation in her behalf against Collins from March 10, 1903, to September 10, 1903, was only $1,028.57, being only $35.26 more than the income of the estate during the same period. It certainly does not seem, on its face, to have been extravagant, and there is no evidence to show that it was so.

Appellant did not attempt to prove that the charges contained in the account were not in fact paid by the guardian, but he claims that some of them were not properly itemized. The only portion of the account called to our attention in the brief is for medical attendance. The items are as follows: "Apr. 25th. Dr. Harry 20 visits at $2.50, $50.00. Sept. 4th. Dr. Arthur medical services, $70.00." The above charges are sufficiently itemized within the meaning of the statute. They show the date of payment, the amount, the person to whom paid, and the nature of the services. It is not necessary that a bill of a physician or of a lawyer should contain each item that goes to make up the charge. If the amount of the claim is disputed, or if it is denied that the services were rendered, the court on the hearing may go into the particulars.

Appellant's counsel claims that the court ordered the cause submitted before his evidence was all introduced, and refused to allow him to argue the case upon the facts. The record shows that the contestant, Collins, had been on the stand, and had been asked several questions that appeared to be immaterial, and to which objections had been sustained. Counsel asked the witness several questions about Annie Fogacci, who had been employed as a nurse for the ward. He then asked the witness: "Q. Did you and she ever quarrel? The Court: The court is not going to sit here and listen to this. These issues have been determined in the unlawful detainer suit. If you have any evidence to offer as to this account of the moneys received or disbursed, the court will hear you. Mr. Carpenter: I think we have offered it. The Court: I will permit you to ask any questions affecting this account that you have, but the court will decline to hear any further testimony without these limits." To which ruling contestant excepted. "The Court: You may leave the stand Mr. Witness, and the matter will stand submitted. Mr. Carpenter: We except to the ruling of the court ordering the case submitted before our case is in." It does not appear that the court refused to hear any relevant evidence. On the contrary, the court expressly stated that it would hear any evidence affecting the account before it. Counsel did not ask permission to argue the case, and, even if he had done so, we do not think in this case it would have been an abuse of discretion to refuse such permission.

The court further found that contestant was not an interested party, and hence had no right to contest the account. The conclusions reached make it unnecessary for us to determine the question.

The order should be affirmed.

RESCISSION OF SALE—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

1. The fact that the purchaser of an interest in a mine was acting in the relation of trustee of such interest for the seller, did not affect the validity of the purchase, it being a fair and open transaction for full value.

2. The findings of fact by the court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on review.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action for the cancellation of an instrument by E. S. Lake against Phœbe Ann Owens, executrix of J. A. Owens, deceased, and another. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. W. Duckworth and Henry W. Nisbet, for appellant. Chas. L. Allison and C. C. Haskell, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Plaintiff brings the action to rescind a certain agreement to sell to defendant C. W. Owens an undivided sixteenth interest in the so-called "San Bernardino Iron Mines"; also to rescind the deed subsequently made thereto by plaintiff in pursuance of said agreement, and to cancel both said instruments. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and the findings and judgment were in favor of defendants that plaintiff take nothing by his action. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff alleged, and it was found, that he was the owner of an undivided sixteenth interest in the said mines, the testator of defendant Phœbe Owens being also at his death the owner of an undivided, but not the whole of the remaining, interest therein. Defendant Phœbe Owens, widow of deceased, duly qualified as executrix, and was by his will named as sole devisee of her husband's estate, and inventoried the said mines as property of the estate. Subsequently, to wit, December 18, 1901, defendant C. W.

Owens, son of deceased and defendant Phœbe Owens, procured from plaintiff a written contract, by which plaintiff agreed to sell his said interest in said mines to said defendant C. W. Owens for $200, and later, to wit, on February 8, 1902, plaintiff conveyed his said interest to defendant Phœbe pursuant to the directions of defendant C. W. Owens, and upon receiving full payment as provided in said contract. Plaintiff alleges in his complaint that he was induced to enter into said contract through the false and fraudulent representations of said C. W. Owens; that he (plaintiff) was an old man, infirm in bodily health and strength, and an inmate of the county hospital; that he reposed confidence in said Owens, and believed the representations made by him, and acted wholly upon said representation, among others, that plaintiffs' interest in said mines was not of greater value than $200; that soon after he had executed and delivered said deed he discovered that the defendants had, previously to the making of said contract and the delivery of said deed, joined in a contract for the sale of said mines for a sum which (had the contract been carried out) would have yielded to plaintiff $1,200 for his share therein, which fact defendants well knew and purposely concealed from plaintiff; and thereupon plaintiff gave notice to defendants rescinding said contract and deed, and offered to restore to defendants everything of value received from them by plaintiff. Without stating fully the allegations of the complaint, it may be conceded that plaintiff sets forth facts which, had the court found them to be true, would have entitled him to relief. But the court found that the said contract of sale made by defendants was but an option, and that "there had not been paid to either of the defendants any sum of money therefor, or upon said contract, and there was no means of ascertaining whether the said company (the purchaser) would purchase the mines and pay therefor or not." The court found against the plaintiff on all his allegations of fraud, misrepresentations, concealment, and claims of plaintiff having reposed confidence in defendant C. W. Owens in making said contract, and found that the transaction was fair and open, that plaintiff was acting on the advice of a friend other than defendant Owens, and that the price paid "was the fair market value" of plaintiff's interest in the mines. In view of the findings, we cannot see that the case presents any questions for serious discussion. If by the circumstances that in his lifetime deceased, Owens, held plaintiff's title in his name, and managed plaintiff's interest in the mines, and for that reason became trustee, and if this trust relation in some degree survived in the executrix, as claimed by plaintiff, still she could make the purchase of plaintiff's interest by fair and open dealing free from fraud, and for full value, as the court found was the fact. It is not entirely clear from the evidence that defendant C. W. Owens was acting for his mother when he procured the agreement to purchase the mines from plaintiff. But as the deed was made to her, and the payment also made by her, it is fair to assume that her son was acting as her agent. Plaintiff's principal contention is that this agent should have informed plaintiff of the then outstanding option, above referred to, and that the concealment of the fact is of itself sufficient to require a rescission of the contract. The evidence is conflicting as to what occurred between C. W. Owens and plaintiff and plaintiff's friend by whose advice plaintiff in fact made the contract. Defendant Owens explained on the witness stand all the facts and circumstances and why he did not mention the fact of the option. The trial court must have accepted defendants' evidence, and we think it was sufficient to support the findings negativing plaintiff's claim that he was misled by defendants' fraudulent concealment of important facts, as also is the evidence sufficient to support the other findings which themselves support the judgment.

It is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

Ct. Rule 18, 64 Pac. x), a case placed on such calendar without such authority will be stricken from the calendar.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Jesus Garcia against George E. Brown and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Stricken from argument calendar.

C. Linkenbach and E. J. Emmons, for appellant. J. W. P. Laird, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. The transcript on appeal was filed herein on June 26, 1902. Appellant has not filed his points and authorities, and his time to so do has long since expired. Although there were no points and authorities on file, the appeal was inadvertently placed upon the calendar for oral argument at the session of the court held at Los Angeles in April, 1904, without any order of the court to that effect, and, there then being no appearance of either party, was continued to the October, 1904, session, at which time the appellant appeared, respondent not appearing; and, upon request of appellant, the appeal was submitted, without argument, for decision. It does not appear that respondent has had any notice that the case would come on for argument.

Under these circumstances, the court will not undertake to pass upon the merits of the appeal. Under rule 18 of this court (64 Pac. x), the clerk is not authorized, in the absence of a special order to that effect, to place a case upon the calendar for oral argument until points and authorities have been filed. Until points and authorities on behalf of the appellant have been served and filed, the respondents have the right to assume that the case will not be on the calendar for argument, and are not called upon to observe whether it has been placed thereon.

Under rule 5 of this court (64 Pac. viii), appellant's points and authorities not having been filed, this appeal is subject to be dismissed on motion of the respondents, upon notice given to the appellant. It is not in condition to be decided.

The order submitting the cause for decision is vacated, and the case stricken from the oral argument calendar.

HENNE v. LANKERSHIM. (L. A. 1,314.)

PARTY WALLS—CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION—RIGHTS OF OWNERS.

1. Where a contract for the construction of a party wall specified the width of the wall from one story to another to the under side of the fifth-story joist, and thence to the top of the fire wall, and plaintiff agreed to pay an aggregate sum in five installments, due when the wall was completed to the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth floor joists, respectively, one when the wall was up to ceiling and the last on completion of the wall, such agreement provided for a five-story party wall, and precluded one of the owners thereof from thereafter raising it against the protest of the other.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Suit by C. Henne against J. B. Lankershim. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for an injunction pendente lite, he appeals. Reversed.

R. L. Horton, for appellant. John W. Mitchell, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from an order denying plaintiff's motion for an injunction pendente lite in an action brought by him for a decree perpetually enjoining defendant from constructing a proposed addition of two stories to a party wall, and from making certain proposed opening in the proposed new portion of said wall. The parties are the owners of adjoining lots in the city of Los Angeles. Each contemplating the erection of a building on his lot, a written agreement was entered into between them in July, 1896, for the construction by defendant of a party wall on the line dividing the lots, one-half of said wall to be placed on plaintiff's lot and one-half on defendant's lot. Under the terms of the agreement, defendant was to construct a wall of certain designated dimensions, varying in thickness from a footing of 5 feet 4 inches at the base to 12 inches at the top of the fire wall, and according to certain specifications. The agreement specified the width of the wall from one story joist to another, to the under side of the fifth-story joist, and thence to the top of the fire wall. Plaintiff agreed to pay to defendant the aggregate amount of $2,700, the same being made payable at various stages of the work, five installments being due when the wall was completed to the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth floor joists, respectively, one when wall was up to ceiling, and the last upon completion of the wall. It was further provided that: "When said wall is constructed as aforesaid, the same shall be and remain as a party wall for the use and benefit of the respective parties to this contract, or their heirs, administrators, and assigns in perpetuity." The agreement further provides that, if it should ever become necessary to "repair or rebuild said wall, or any portion thereof," the expense should be borne equally by the parties. The wall was constructed, as agreed, five stories in height, and each of the parties erected upon his lot a five-story and basement building, using said wall therefor. In the year 1902 the defendant, contemplating the addition of two stories to his building, was about to add two stories to said party wall, without plaintiff's consent. He further proposed to leave an opening of about 36 feet in length extending from the bottom to the top of the addition to the wall. Thereupon plaintiff commenced this action. It was claimed by plaintiff that the party wall was not capable of safely carrying the additional weight of two more stories, and that to permit the erection thereof on said wall would cause plaintiff's building great and irreparable injury. The evidence upon this question was conflicting to such an extent that, under well-settled rules, the conclusion of the lower court thereon is not open to review. If, however, defendant had no legal right, without the consent of plaintiff, to add to the height of the party wall, his so doing would be an invasion of plaintiff's rights, constituting a continuing trespass upon his real property, which eventually would ripen into an easement. This alone, independently of any question as to other damage, would entitle plaintiff to an injunction preventing such threatened invasion.

We are satisfied that defendant was not entitled to add to the height of the wall. There is no material distinction between the facts of this case and those of Frowenfeld v. Casey, 139 Cal. 421, 73 Pac. 152. The rule that either party has the right, in the absence of agreement, to increase the height of a party wall, when it can be done without injury to the adjoining building, or impairing the strength of the wall, was fully recognized by this court in that case, but it was held that the effect of the agreements between the parties in that case was to limit the party wall to six stories. The agreements in that case did not, in terms, provide that the wall should not be carried to a greater height than six stories, but they did provide for the building of a six-story party wall. It was said by this court: "An agreement to build a party wall, with no limitation as to its height, would give the right, by implication, to build it as high as would be necessary for the purposes for which it was to be used, provided it could be done without injury or danger to the property of the other party. An agreement to build a party wall for a height defined in the agreement does not give the right by implication to build it higher." The effect of that decision is clearly that, where the agreement is for a party wall of a designated height, the designation of the height is, in the absence of other provisions, a limitation, beyond which neither party can go without the consent of the other. The agreement constitutes a conveyance of the easement to that height, and no more. It was said in that case: "The extent of defendant's easement, for the purpose of a party wall, is defined and measured by the agreement. Plaintiff owns the space on his own land above the six stories by the same title that he owns the remaining portions of his lot. He has not conveyed it to the defendant. He cannot be deprived of this property at the volition of defendant without due process of law." The agreement in the case at bar was for a wall of designated dimensions, to be at once constructed to its full height by defendant, and for which plaintiff was to pay defendant a designated amount, and which wall, when so constructed, was to be and remain the party wall. In other words, the party wall, as it was then to be constructed by defendant, was the thing concerning which the parties agreed, and for which the plaintiff was to pay his portion of the cost. That the wall then to be constructed was to be only five stories high, is, we think, apparent from the terms of the agreement. That such was the understanding of the parties is demonstrated by their contemporaneous conduct. There is no pretense that the defendant did not fully perform his contract for the construction of said wall by constructing the same to the height of five stories. Both plaintiff and defendant, apparently without question, construed the contract as calling for such a five-story wall to be then constructed, and accepted the building thereof as a full compliance by defendant with the provisions of the contract relating to the construction of the wall by him. The written agreement being for a five-story party wall, the height was limited by said agreement to five stories. This case and that of Frowenfeld v. Casey, supra, differ from the cases relied on by defendant in that in the latter cases there was no agreement which could fairly be construed as limiting the height. What has been said renders it unnecessary to consider the question as to the right of defendant to leave any opening in the proposed addition to the wall.

The order appealed from is reversed.

BILL v. FULLER. (L. A. 1,308.)

SALES — CONTRACT — CONSTRUCTION—PASSING OF TITLE—WARRANTY—MERCHANTABLENESS—BREACH — ACTIONS — EVIDENCE — WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. Defendant, after having inspected plaintiff's orange orchard, contracted in November, 1900, for all of plaintiff's oranges, with certain exceptions, at certain prices; all to be taken by defendant on or before April 1, 1901, and be paid for on delivery; plaintiff to deliver when wanted by defendant. The oranges were ripe and ready for market in January, but defendant refused to accept them until March 12th, and then only on being permitted to cull unmerchantable fruit, which became so by being left on the trees an unreasonable length of time. Held, that the implied warranty of merchantableness, if any, in such contract, only warranted merchantableness of the fruit on the tree, and that when gathered in due season it should be handled and delivered with care, and did not entitle defendant to refuse to accept oranges because they were too ripe for market.

2. In an action for breach of a contract for the purchase of oranges, evidence that some dwarfed, immature fruit, that dropped from the trees and decayed on the ground, had been picked up by plaintiff, did not warrant an inference that such fruit had been delivered to defendant under the contract.

3. Where, in an action for breach of a contract to purchase oranges, plaintiff had not been asked on direct examination with respect to the condition of the fruit, a question as to whether some of the crop had been softened by rain followed by hot weather was properly excluded as not proper cross-examination.

4. In an action for breach of a contract to purchase oranges, there being no issue as to plaintiff's care of his orchard, it was not error for the court to refuse to allow defendant to cross-examine plaintiff on such subject.

5. Where, in an action for breach of a contract to purchase oranges, there was no controversy over a small amount of fruit alleged to have been prematurely delivered, which had been paid for, it was not error for the court to sustain an objection to a question put to plaintiff, whether he had himself broken the contract by such premature delivery.

6. Defendant entered into a written agreement providing that he "has this day bought all the oranges grown this year" by plaintiff, at certain specified rates, to be paid for on delivery; plaintiff to deliver the same when wanted by defendant. Held, that such contract imported a present sale of the oranges, under Civ. Code, § 1141, providing that title is transferred by an executory agreement for the sale of personal property only when the buyer has accepted the thing, or when the seller has completed it, prepared it for delivery, and offered it to the buyer with intent to transfer the title thereto, and that the oranges remained on the trees at the buyer's risk.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by W. T. Bill against Henry Fuller. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, and to set aside a judgment on findings, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank C. Prescott, for appellant. C. E. Chapman, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This was an action to recover the balance of the purchase price alleged to be due for a crop of oranges sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. The defendant appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and from an order denying his motion, made under section 663, Code Civ. Proc., to set aside the judgment entered, and to enter another and different judgment upon the findings.

The plaintiff was an orange grower in the county of San Bernardino, and the defendant was engaged in the business of buying, selling, packing, and shipping fruit. Fuller inspected the plaintiff's orchards, and immediately afterwards they made the following agreement: "This agreement, made this 19th day of November, 1900, by and between W. T. Bill and Henry Fuller, witnesseth: That said Henry Fuller has this day bought all the oranges grown this year by W. T. Bill in West Redlands and Bryn Mawr, except the St. Michaels, at two cents per pound (except the Australian navels on the five acres known as the Mabry Ranch, for which said Fuller agrees to pay one cent per pound), and said W. T. Bill hereby sells to H. Fuller at said prices. All oranges to be taken by H. Fuller on or before April 1st, 1901, except the late Valencias, and paid for in cash as soon and at the time of delivery. And W. T. Bill agrees to deliver at Bryn Mawr Station when wanted by H. Fuller." The court found that, in pursuance of this agreement, plaintiff delivered 160,256 pounds of oranges at 2 cents per pound, and 5,197 pounds at 1 cent per pound; that the defendant rejected 60,888 pounds of the 2-cent oranges, and 2,492 pounds of the 1-cent oranges, and refused to pay for those so rejected; that at the contract price the rejected oranges would amount to $1,243.26, and for this amount judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff. The principal contention arises upon the construction of the contract. The defendant claims that there was an implied warranty of the merchantable quality of the fruit at the time of delivery, and that under the last clause of the agreement he had the right arbitrarily to fix the time of delivery, without regard to the condition of the oranges, or the effect of delay upon them. In this we think the defendant was mistaken. At the time the contract was made, the oranges were practically full grown, but not yet ripe enough for the market. The testimony shows, and the court found, that the oranges became ripe and ready for market in January of the year 1901; that the plaintiff at various times from that time forward until the 12th of March informed the defendant that they were ripe and ready for picking and shipment and that delay would injure them, but the defendant each time refused to receive them until March 12th; and that at that time he told the plaintiff to deliver the oranges as fast as he could, but that he would cull out all the unmerchantable fruit. The plaintiff objected to the culling, but said he would deliver them, and demand that they all be received as fruit properly delivered under the contract. A contract of sale must be construed with reference to the character of the property which is the subject of the sale, the situation of the parties, and the natural results of time and of the operation of natural forces. The court found that in January the fruit delivered was all merchantable, and that at the time of its delivery in the latter part of March it was in as good condition as it could be kept by reasonable care, and that the unmerchantable condition of the fruit at the time of its delivery was caused solely and only by reason of the fruit being left on the trees an unreasonable length of time. Under these circumstances, we think the contract should not be construed to give Fuller the absolute right to defer the delivery of the oranges to the injury of the plaintiff. It must be construed to mean that the oranges were to be taken by Fuller on or before April 1, 1901, and at such reasonable time as should be necessary to insure their good condition with respect to maturity and fitness for market. It cannot be that under this agreement the defendant was at liberty to refuse to accept the oranges, and compel the plaintiff to keep them on the trees until one-half of them had become unfit for market. The merchantability which was warranted by the contract, if there was any such warranty, was nothing more than a warranty that the fruit should be merchantable on the tree, and that when gathered in due season it should be handled and delivered with proper care. This being the case, under the findings we think the defendant was not justified in refusing to accept the oranges which he culled from the crop because of his claim that they were too ripe and puffy for the market. The fact that they had been allowed to remain so long on the trees, and thus become unfit for the market, was the fault of the defendant, and he should not be allowed to take advantage of that fault.

There are some minor objections which may be noticed:

There was no error in sustaining the objection to the question whether or not there was fruit on the trees at the time of making the contract, which fell off, and never was incorporated into the contract at all. The plaintiff did not claim payment for any such fruit, and there is no evidence that he ever delivered any of it to the defendant. His statement that there was some dwarfed, immature fruit that dropped off the trees and decayed on the ground, and that he endeavored to pick up the most of it, is misunderstood or misinterpreted by the appellant. It is clear that he did not intend by that statement to say that he had picked up this immature fruit and delivered it as fruit sold under the contract.

It was not error to sustain the objection to the question asked the plaintiff, while he was testifying as a witness, whether or not some of the crop had been softened by reason of a rain followed by hot weather. This was not cross-examination. The plaintiff had not been asked upon his examination in chief with respect to the condition of the fruit. Nor was there error in refusing to allow the defendant to cross-examine the plaintiff with respect to the care which he gave to the orchard. There was no issue involving that proposition.

The court did not err in sustaining the objection to the question put to the plaintiff, whether he had himself broken the contract by delivering a small quantity of fruit in January, which had been paid for. There was no controversy over this fruit, nor over any fruit except that delivered in March. The testimony was that all the fruit except the March deliveries was paid for without question, and whether the plaintiff had prematurely delivered the small quantity of oranges in January was immaterial, inasmuch as the defendant accepted the same without objection. The defendant claims that some of the findings are not supported by the evidence. We do not think it necessary to discuss this question in detail. An examination of the evidence shows that the findings are all fairly supported.

We have treated the case upon the theory that the title did not pass until delivery, and that the findings were all included within the issues made by the pleadings, although plaintiff contends with much force that all the findings other than the findings that the allegations of the complaint are true, and that the allegations of paragraph No. 3 of the answer are untrue, are outside the pleadings, and, although in favor of the plaintiff, are unnecessary to a decision of the case. The evidence upon which they are based was introduced over the plaintiff's objection, and consequently he could not be held to have allowed the case to be tried upon the theory that these findings were within the issues. But treating the findings as within the issues, we are of the opinion that no error was committed by the court.

Nor do we wish to be understood as holding that the title to the crop did not pass as soon as the contract was executed. The agreement, in form, imports a present sale. The thing sold was in existence, and was identified and separated from other things. Under section 1141, Civ. Code, it would seem that title passed at once, and that the oranges remained on the trees at the risk of the buyer.

The orders are affirmed.

ASTILL v. SOUTH YUBA WATER CO.

(Sac. 1,107.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 21, 1905.)

NUISANCES — ACTIONS — JOINT DEMURRER — ABATEMENT—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—REMOTENESS—ISSUES.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 427, authorizing joinder of two or more causes of action belonging to the same class, plaintiff was entitled to join two causes of action for distinct nuisances.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Action, § 425.]

2. That such causes of action were not separately stated in the complaint was not a cause of demurrer.

3. Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 731, and independent thereof, a party injured by a nuisance may in the same action obtain a judgment abating the nuisance, and recover damages caused thereby.

4. Where, in an action for the abatement of certain nuisances and for damages, plaintiff's claim was based solely on the negligent use of an easement by defendant, which it was alleged caused the nuisances, evidence showing an adverse use of a part of the land on which the alleged nuisance existed to show title thereto in defendant, was not within the issues, and was therefore inadmissible.

5. Where defendant permitted a question to be answered without objection, and it did not appear that there was no chance to object before an answer was given, defendant's right to have the same stricken was waived.

6. In a suit for abatement of certain nuisances and for damages, evidence concerning the health of the neighborhood, or of particular persons residing therein, at a period some 15 years or more before trial, was too remote for comparison to disprove evidence as to the health of plaintiff and his family, alleged to have been affected by the nuisance.

Action by James Astill against the South Yuba Water Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

*Rehearing denied February 20, 1905.

John M. Fulweiler and Fred Searles, for appellant. Holl & Dunn, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

There is no misjoinder of causes of action. The plaintiff does, indeed, complain of what technically constitutes two distinct nuisances. One is caused by the negligence of the defendant in allowing water to escape from the banks of a ditch owned by the defendant, and extending over the plaintiff's land, whereby the land is made swampy and marshy, constituting a nuisance. The other is alleged to consist of a reservoir into which water from the ditch flows, which reservoir was allowed to become filled with vegetable matter, which became rotten and decayed, and thereby caused a nuisance. This, however, does not constitute a misjoinder. Section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure allows the joinder of two or more causes of action belonging to the same class. Plaintiff might therefore in the same complaint set up any number of separate causes of action for distinct nuisances without being guilty of a misjoinder. The fact that they are not separately stated in the complaint is not a cause of demurrer; nor do different elements of damage, arising from the same nuisance, constitute different causes of action. Under section 731 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and at common law without the aid of that section, the party injured by a nuisance may in the same action obtain a judgment abating it and recover the damages caused thereby. Yolo Co. v. Sacramento, 36 Cal. 196; 14 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 1116.

The defendant contends that the findings are not supported by the evidence, and assigns many particulars in which it is claimed the evidence is insufficient. On an examination of the record, however, we think there is ample evidence to support all the findings. There is evidence to the contrary, it is true, but it is not the province of this court to determine questions of the preponderance of evidence.

Several errors of law are complained of, in excluding testimony tending to show adverse use of a part of the land upon which it is alleged a nuisance existed, and which, it is claimed, would tend to prove title to such land in the defendant. There was no error in this ruling. There was no claim set up by the defendant to a fee-simple title to any land. The plaintiff was the grantee of the patentee of a certain subdivision of United States government land. He held the title subject to the rights of the defendant, acquired through its predecessor previous to the issuance of the patent, to maintain a reservoir thereon, and carry water thereto through a ditch over the plaintiff's land. The reservoir was in part situated on plaintiff's land, and in part on other lands adjoining thereto. This alleged right was not a fee-simple title, nor anything more than a mere easement, dependent upon use. The court found, and the evidence supported the finding, that the area of land covered by the water in the reservoir, if it was filled to the brim, was some 24 acres of land, of which 8.85 acres was on the land of the plaintiff. There was some contention on the part of the defendant that it had title to some land extending further up the ditch beyond this high-water line, with a right at some time to use the same as a reservoir. There was, however, no issue of this nature tendered in the answer. The only claim set up in the answer is a mere easement, consisting of the reservoir and ditch actually used; and the limit of the defendant's right under the answer is fixed by the area of land shown to be actually occupied by the reservoir and ditch, with sufficient ground for access thereto for the purposes of maintenance and repair and use. This right to the reservoir, and to the ditch connecting therewith, is not disputed by the plaintiff. The precise extent and boundary of the reservoir are not important. The plaintiff's claim is based solely upon the negligent use of the easement, which it is alleged has caused the nuisances. There being no issue with regard to the title of the land outside of the reservoir, it was not error to exclude the testimony.

There was no error in refusing to strike out the answer to the question put to the plaintiff, "How much was your time worth?" Conceding that the question was improper in form, the plaintiff did not object to it, but allowed the answer in, and thereby waived his right to strike it out. It does not appear that there was no chance to object before the answer was given.

There was no error in excluding testimony concerning the health of the neighborhood, or of particular persons residing in the neighborhood, at a period some 15 years and more before the trial. Even if a comparison could be made in this way to disprove the evidence of the effect of the alleged nuisance upon the health of the plaintiff and his family in 1898, when the nuisance is alleged to have been caused, the time referred to in the testimony offered to be given was too remote to furnish a safe standard of comparison.

We find no error in the record. The judgment and order are affirmed.

MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ANTICIPATION OF INJURY—RELEASE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—FINDINGS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action for injuries to a servant while washing an insecurely fastened window pane, evidence held to require submission of the questions of defendant's negligence, plaintiff's contributory negligence, and whether the injury could reasonably have been anticipated by defendant, to the jury.

2. Where in an action for injuries to a servant plaintiff testified that a receipt executed by him was given for wages and $10 additional, which defendant proposed to pay on plaintiff's doctor bill, which amount the receipt exactly covered, a finding that, though it recited that it was "in full of all demands," it did not constitute a release of defendant's liability for plaintiff's injuries, was justified.

3. It is not error for the court to refuse requested instructions on subjects fully covered by the instructions given.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Charles F. Davis against the Diamond Carriage & Livery Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying defendant a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hendrick & Wright and James E. Wadham, for appellant. Luce & Sloane, for respondent.

GRAY, C. Suit for damages for personal injuries. Plaintiff had a verdict and judgment for $500. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying it a new trial.

The plaintiff was employed by defendant, and directed to wash windows in defendant's livery stable. He placed a chair at the window inside the harness room, and standing thereon he proceeded to wash the window, and, as he puts it, "at the very first pass" one corner of a plate of glass broke out, letting his hand through, and cutting it so severely at the wrist as to permanently cripple it. It appears that the window pane was whitewashed, and was insecurely fastened in the frame. The glass was fastened with zinc points instead of putty. These points still remained at the bottom of the pane and to some extent on the sides, but at the top, and particularly at the upper part of the side about the corner that gave way while being washed, there were no points to hold the glass to the sash, and under the pressure applied the corner broke out. The plaintiff testified that he had washed windows before, and in this instance applied the same pressure "as I would on any other window washing it." He also testified: "When I commenced to wash those windows, I could not see how the glass was fastened, or whether it was fastened in at all or not, but supposed it was properly fastened in. The glass was fastened in the sash from the outside of the building, and I was on the inside." The evidence further showed that it was usual to fasten glass in windows with points and putty all round the glass, thus securing the entire outer edge of the pane to the sash, and when thus secured it would resist much more force without breaking than when insecurely fastened, as in the present case. It also appeared that the insecure fastening of the panes was discernable from the outside of the building if a person would take the trouble to look at it. We think it was within the province of the jury to say on this evidence whether the injury to plaintiff was the result of the want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant. It is the duty of the master to furnish the servant with a safe place to work, and he must use reasonable care to see that any object is safe to work upon or with before he directs the servant to perform labor upon it. The servant has the right to presume that the master will perform his duty, and will not set him at work upon objects that contain hidden defects which make them unsafe to work upon, without warning him of the danger. It is urged that this injury occurred in a way and from a cause that could not have been reasonably anticipated by defendant. That was also a question for the jury. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that the defendant has exercised ordinary care to prevent injury to its servants when there is evidence tending to show that an examination of this window from the outside would have disclosed its dilapidated and dangerous condition. That it was dangerous the result shows, and we think (as the jury seem to have thought) that the danger might have been discovered by the men in charge of the stable by the exercise of ordinary care, and that it was negligence not to exercise such ordinary care. Whether the plaintiff was also negligent was again a question for the jury. If they believed his version of the matter, they were warranted in finding that he was not negligent; and we must presume, in support of the verdict, that they took his statement as true. We think the jury and the trial court were fully warranted in finding against defendant on its contention, based upon a "receipt in full of all demands," that the damages here sought to be recovered had been settled and paid for by defendant. The written receipt did not discharge the indebtedness unless it was so intended at the time it was made. Plaintiff testified that the receipt was for his wages, and the amount which was paid at the time of making the receipt exactly covers his wages and the $10 defendant proposed to pay on the doctor's bill. The plaintiff's testimony looks reasonable, and the jury were warranted in acting upon it. The same considerations which lead us to uphold the action of the trial court in refusing to set aside the verdict for insufficiency of evidence lead also to the conclusion that the denial of the motion for a nonsuit was warranted by the evidence.

Appellant complains of the refusal of the court to give certain instructions regarding contributory negligence, and as to the degree of care required of defendant, and also as to the effect of a receipt and the burden of proof in relation thereto. All these subjects are fully covered by the instructions which were given, and the rules of law concerning all those matters were fully and fairly stated to the jury.

We see no error in any action of the trial court, and advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; SMITH, C.

NEW TRIAL—APPEAL—RECORD—ERROR.

1. Where the record on appeal from an order granting a new trial contained a settled statement on motion for a new trial, and a copy of respondent's notice of his intention to move, but such notice was not incorporated in the statement, or in any bill of exceptions, and was therefore no part of the record, there was nothing in the record showing that the motion was not based on one or more of the grounds requiring affidavits for their support, or some other of the first four grounds for the motion specified by Code Civ. Proc. § 657, and hence error was not thereby conclusively shown.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by M. F. Skinner against T. L. Horn and others. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Purington & Adair, for appellant. Wright & Lukens, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. On motion of one of several defendants the superior court ordered a new trial of this cause, and plaintiff appeals from the order.

After the transcript was filed, the respondent suggested a diminution of the record, and moved to amend the transcript by the addition of certified copies of affidavits alleged to have been used in support of his motion for a new trial. In denying that motion to amend we have practically decided this appeal. 77 Pac. 904. We held that a party appealing from an order must bring up a record demonstrating conclusively that the lower court erred in its ruling, or must fail in his appeal, and that an order granting a new trial must be affirmed when the record contains nothing but a statement on motion for a new trial, and fails to show that the motion was not based also upon one or more of the grounds which require affidavits for their support. Such is the condition of this record. It contains a settled statement on motion for a new trial, and there also appears in the transcript what purports to be a copy of respondents' notice of his intention to move. But this notice of intention is not incorporated in the statement or in any bill of exceptions, and therefore is no part of the record. Pico v. Cohn, 78 Cal. 384, 20 Pac. 706. If we could consider it, we might be justified in assuming that the motion for a new trial must have been based exclusively upon the grounds covered by the statement. But we have no more right to consider this notice of intention than we have to consider the affidavits which we have refused to order certified upon the ground that they are no part of the record. Non constat, therefore, that the order granting a new trial was not supported by affidavits disclosing newly discovered evidence, or some other of the first four grounds for the motion. Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

The order is affirmed.

NATHAN v. DIERSSEN. (Sac. 1,099.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 23, 1905.)

QUIETING TITLE — EVIDENCE — POSSESSION — OWNERSHIP—RECORDS OF JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS—STIPULATIONS — PAYMENT OF TAXES—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A stipulation, entered into prior to the first trial, that the parties will admit certain facts upon the trial of the action, may be used as evidence by either party on subsequent trials, presenting substantially the same issues as the first trial, in the absence of anything limiting the effect of the stipulation to a single trial.*

2. Where the court erroneously ruled out a stipulation, it was within its discretion to subsequently vacate its ruling, and permit the stipulation to be introduced, in the absence of a showing of any injustice or hardship to the adverse party.

3. In an action to quiet title, a deed conveying the property to plaintiff's predecessor in interest, who was shown to have owned the land, was competent without preliminary proof that the grantor in the deed was possessed of the title at the time he made the conveyance.

4. In an action to quiet title, a question asked of a witness as to who was in possession of the property in a certain year was not objectionable as calling for the conclusion of the witness on legal possession, in the absence of anything in the form of the question or previous questions put to witnesses indicating that the word was used in its technical sense as synonymous with "seisin."

5. In an action to quiet title the inventory and appraisement filed in the matter of the estate of plaintiff's predecessor in title was not competent to show that plaintiff's predecessor in his lifetime exercised acts of ownership over the property.

6. The admission of incompetent evidence on an uncontroverted fact is harmless error.

7. In an action to quiet title obtained on a foreclosure sale, the record of the foreclosure action, the commissioner's deed, and the writ of assistance, with the sheriff's return, showing delivery of the property to plaintiff, are competent to show the complete divestiture and transfer of the judgment debtor's title to plaintiff.

8. Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 321, an action to recover land in favor of the holder of the legal title thereof is not barred unless it appears that the land has been possessed adversely to him for five years before the institution of the action.

9. Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 325, one whose possession of land is not founded on a written instrument must, in order to prove adverse possession, show that he, or his predecessors and grantors, have paid all taxes levied and assessed upon the land; that their possession has been continuous and uninterrupted, and that it has been protected by a substantial inclosure, or that the land has been usually cultivated or improved.

10. In an action to quiet title, by the holder of the paper title, the burden of proving adverse possession is on defendant.

11. Under Code Civ. Proc., § 325, requiring one who claims land by adverse possession not founded on any written instrument, to show payment of all taxes which have been levied and assessed upon the land during the statutory period, one who had admitted that he had paid no taxes, and that there were no assessments other than those paid by the holder of the paper title, was not prejudiced by the introduction in evidence, by the holder of the paper title, of void assessments paid by him, as it would have been necessary for the adverse possessor himself to have introduced such void assessments in order to show that no valid assessment had been made.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

A. M. Johnson, A. L. Shinn, and Devlin & Devlin, for appellant. Isaac Joseph and D. E. Alexander, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to quiet title to a strip of land constituting a part of swamp-land surveys numbered 755 and 851, in Yolo county, Cal. After trial, judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant, within 60 days after its rendition, appealed therefrom, and makes the proceedings on the trial a part of the record by a bill of exceptions. A number of errors are assigned by the appellant, which we will consider in their order.

1. The case was tried before. Judgment was given for the defendant, and on appeal to this court the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Nathan v. Dierssen, 134 Cal. 282, 66 Pac. 485. Some time prior to the former trial the plaintiff and defendant entered into a stipulation to the effect that one Herman Huber died seised and possessed of the land in question on February 3, 1889. The material part of the stipulation, so far as the question here raised is concerned, is as follows: "It is stipulated as follows: That the plaintiff and the defendant, George E. Dierssen, hereby admit, and will admit upon the trial of the above-entitled action," that the property was vested as aforesaid. At the beginning of the trial now under review the plaintiff offered in evidence this stipulation. The court at that time sustained an objection to the stipulation on the ground that it appeared to have been made merely for the purposes of the former trial, and was not binding upon the second trial. The trial was then continued for several weeks, and upon its being resumed the stipulation was again offered, and the court then changed its ruling, and allowed the stipulation to be admitted in evidence against the defendant. There was no error in this ruling. There is nothing in the stipulation or in the circumstances under which it was made to show that its operation was intended to be limited to the first trial. The issues on the last trial were substantially the same as when the stipulation was made. In the absence of anything limiting its effect the stipulation was available to both parties, and could be used at any subsequent trial. 20 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 626. It was within the discretion of the court to vacate its ruling that the stipulation might be withdrawn, and give the plaintiff leave to introduce it as evidence. There was no claim by defendant that any facts or circumstances existed showing any injustice or hardship to him by reason of the change in the ruling which would make it an abuse of discretion. He offered no evidence to dispute the fact agreed to in the stipulation, and he does not claim that any such evidence could be produced.

2. There was no error in admitting the deed from the Capital Savings Bank to Herman Huber. It having been shown that Herman Huber owned the property, evidence of the deed conveying the same to him was competent, without preliminary proof that the grantor in the deed was possessed of the title at the time it made the conveyance.

3. The following question was asked of a witness: "Who was in possession of this De Grosse Ranch in '80?" The objection of the defendant to this question on the ground that it called for the conclusion of the witness as to the legal possession was properly overruled. It is true that there have been some intimations in some decisions that a question in this form calls for a conclusion of law, and if the word is to be taken as synonymous with "seisin," it may be that the answer would involve a conclusion. But witnesses are not supposed to be testifying with the technical accuracy of a lawyer, nor do they usually understand language with such precision. The ordinary meaning of the word "possession" is the same as "occupancy." It is defined as "the act of possessing; a having and holding or retaining of property in one's power or control." Cent. Dic. Unless there is something in the form of a question or of the previous questions put to witnesses indicating that the word is used in the narrow sense of "seisin," the question is unobjectionable. Nothing of the sort appears in the record in this case.

4. The court allowed the introduction of the inventory and appraisement in the matter of the estate of Herman Huber, deceased, for the purpose of showing that the deceased in his lifetime exercised acts of ownership over the property. We do not think this was competent evidence for that purpose, but in view of the other evidence, and the fact there was really no controversy over the question of his ownership, we think the error was immaterial.

5. The evidence does not show that the action was barred by the statute of limitations.

By virtue of the stipulation that the legal title was in Herman Huber at his death in 1889, the deed of partition between Herman Louis Huber and Amanda J. Huggins, and the foreclosure deed to plaintiff, the plaintiff became vested with the legal title. Consequently the action would not be barred unless it appeared that the land had been held and possessed adversely to him for five years before the action was begun, which was on October 18, 1898. Code Civ. Proc. § 321. Defendant's possession and that of Herman Louis Huber, under whom he claims, was not founded on any written instrument. Hence, in order to prove adverse possession, it must be shown that the successive claimants have paid all taxes levied and assessed on the land, that the possession was continuous and uninterrupted, and either that such possession was protected by a substantial inclosure, or that the land was usually cultivated or improved. Code Civ. Proc., § 325; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 49 Am. Rep. 100. Prior to March, 1895, there was no inclosure, nor was the land, except a small portion thereof, cultivated or improved. The testimony of Dierssen, the defendant, who was the only witness as to possession prior to that date, shows that he was not possessed of sufficient knowledge to state whether or not the possession of Herman L. Huber of any part of the land was continuous or uninterrupted from October 18, 1894, to March, 1895. The burden to show adverse possession was on the defendant, and upon this condition of the evidence the court was not bound to find that the action was barred, and its finding that it was not barred is therefore sustained by the evidence.

In order to prove the adverse possession, the defendant must further show either that he had paid all taxes levied and assessed on the land during the preceding five years, or that no valid assessment had been made. He admitted that he had paid no taxes and that there were no assessments other than those paid by plaintiff. He could not prove that there were no valid assessments without introducing in evidence the assessments introduced by plaintiff. Therefore if, in fact, they were void, or did not include all the land, the evidence was not injurious to the defendant, and if they were valid and included any part of the land the defense must have failed as to the part included. The descriptions in the assessments covered the north 156 acres of the lots. The southern boundary must therefore have been a true east and west line, and the evidence shows that this line would have included within the assessments all that portion of the land which the defendant's predecessor, Herman Louis Huber, ever actually occupied. The assessments paid by plaintiff were valid for the land described, and the description includes all of the land in controversy which the defendant could have had title to by adverse possession if he and his predecessors had paid the taxes.

6. The plaintiff obtained his title from the successor of Herman Huber, deceased, by commissioner's deed on foreclosure sale. He introduced in evidence the record in the foreclosure action and the deed of the commissioner therein to the plaintiff, and also a writ of assistance thereafter issued by the court, with the return of the sheriff thereon, showing the delivery of the property to the plaintiff in pursuance of the writ. We cannot perceive that this was error. It was a part of the record of the plaintiff's title showing that he had obtained not only the title, but the possession, so far as it could be obtained from the judgment debtor. It was not evidence to show that he had ousted the defendant, and it does not appear that it was received for that purpose, but it was competent to show the complete divestiture and transfer of the title and legal possession of the judgment debtor.

RIDGLEY v. ABBOTT QUICKSILVER MIN. CO. OF ILLINOIS.* (S. F. 3,966, 3,982.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT—RECITALS—SUFFICIENCY—APPEAL—PARTIES AGGRIEVED.

1. In a foreclosure suit, a finding that a certain sum was due and unpaid from defendant to plaintiff, which was not made a part of the judgment, and which was not accompanied by an order for a deficiency judgment, was not an adjudication of personal liability, gave the clerk no authority to docket a deficiency judgment, and confined plaintiff to the mortgaged property alone for the satisfaction of his judgment and costs.

2. A defendant in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, which had sold all its interest in the property before the suit was brought, and against which no personal or deficiency judgment was rendered, was not aggrieved either by the judgment or by an order allowing plaintiff receiver's costs and fees, in such sense as to entitle it to appeal from either the judgment or the order.

Department 1. Appeals from Superior Court, Lake County; George W. Buck, Judge.

Action by Edward Ridgley against the Abbott Quicksilver Mining Company of Illinois. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order allowing certain costs and fees, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Gavin McNab, for appellant. William Denman, J. P. Langhorne, Haven & Haven, Page, McCutchen & Knight, and E. S. Pillsbury, for respondent. Frank M. Stone, pro se.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. The defendant, the Abbott Quicksilver Mining Company of Illinois, failed to answer, and judgment by default was entered against it. It brings two appeals—one from the judgment of foreclosure, and one from a subsequent order allowing certain receiver's costs and fees. A motion is made to dismiss these appeals upon the ground that the appellant is not a party aggrieved.

We think the appeals should be dismissed upon the ground and for the reasons stated. It appears that the appellant had sold all its right, title, and interest in the property upon which rested the foreclosed mortgage before the suit was brought. The judgment appealed from ordered a sale of the premises mortgaged, and that the proceeds be applied to the payment of the amounts found to be due from appellant to the plaintiff. There was no personal judgment against appellant, nor was there any order that a judgment be entered for any deficiency left after application of the proceeds of the sale to the debt. To be sure, it was found that a certain sum was due and unpaid from appellant to plaintiff; but this was only a finding, and no part of the subsequent decree or judgment, "and cannot be regarded as an adjudication of personal liability." Without this "adjudication of personal liability" the clerk had no authority to docket a deficiency judgment. Herd v. Tuohy, 133 Cal. 61, 65 Pac. 139, and cases therein cited.

It follows from the foregoing that, the appellant having no interest in the property to be sold and it being impossible to enter any valid deficiency judgment against it on the decree rendered by the court and here appealed from, the plaintiff must look to the mortgaged property alone for satisfaction of his judgment, as well as for the amount allowed him on the subsequent order, and that appellant cannot be held in any way or for any sum by either the judgment or order appealed from. It follows that appellant is in no way aggrieved by said judgment, or by said order.

The appeals are dismissed.

SHAW, J. I concur in the foregoing, and add the following: The Code provides that, if the proceeds of the mortgaged property are insufficient to pay the amount due the plaintiff, "judgment must then be docketed by the clerk * * * against the defendant or defendants personally liable for the debt, and it becomes a lien on the real estate of such judgment debtor, as in other cases in which execution may be issued." Code Civ. Proc. § 726. The docketing of a judgment is a proceeding, ministerial in character, which cannot occur until there is a judgment rendered. It is not the making or giving of a judgment. It is the act of a mere clerk, and it necessarily implies the pre-existence of the judgment to be docketed. In this state the docketing must not only await the rendition of the judgment, but, according to the directions of the Code, it is to be done after the filing of the judgment roll, which takes place after the judgment is entered. Code Civ. Proc. § 671. The direction in section 726 that a clerk must docket a judgment for the deficiency indicates that there must be an existing judgment of the court declaring, at least, the existence of a personal liability, the amount thereof, and the persons from whom and to whom the same is due. Neither findings, conclusions of law, nor recitals will suffice.

CENTRAL EUREKA MIN. CO. v. EAST CENTRAL EUREKA MIN. CO. et al.

MINES—LOCATION—EXTRALATERAL RIGHTS—DIVERGENCE OF END LINES—REPEAL OF STATUTE—QUITCLAIM DEED.

1. Act Cong. July 26, 1866, c. 262, 14 Stat. 252, in relation to the location of mines, granted extralateral rights, but did not require the end lines of locations to be parallel. Act Cong. May 12, 1872, c. 152, 17 Stat. 91, also granted extralateral rights, required the end lines to run parallel to each other, repealed existing laws relating to the location and patent of mining claims, but excepted from its repealing operation all the rights of locators under previous laws. Plaintiff's application for a patent was made while the act of 1866 and the act amendatory thereof of July 9, 1870, c. 235, 16 Stat. 217, were in force, and was pending when the act of 1872 was enacted, awaiting the approval of the surveyor general; but the patent did not issue until subsequent to that act, when final payment was made. The patent purported to grant the mining premises described, "throughout its entire depth, although it may enter the land adjoining, provided that the right of possession thereby granted of any portion of the vein, outside of the vertical side lines of the survey, should be confined to such portions thereof as lay between vertical planes drawn downward through the end lines of said survey at the surface, so continued in their own direction that such vertical planes will intersect such interior parts of such vein," and recited that the proceedings were had under the acts of 1866, 1870, and 1872, and the patent was issued in conformity with such acts. Held, that the nonparallelism of the end lines of the location did not deprive plaintiff of the right to follow its vein on the dip beyond the side line of the surface.

2. A mining company having contracted to purchase a strip of agricultural land adjoining its mine, a quitclaim deed to another of its interest in the "real property described in said contract," and "lying east of that certain patented mining ground," described by name, did not convey any interest in the mine, though the vein thereof dipped beyond the surface line of the survey.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Amador County; R. C. Rust, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Central Eureka Mining Company, a corporation, against the East Central Eureka Mining Company, a corporation, and James and Eliza A. Toman. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants Toman appeal. Affirmed.

Campbell, Metson & Campbell (Galpin & Bolton, of counsel), for appellants. Carter & Rickets, amici curiæ. Olney & Olney, W. J. McGee, and C. H. Lindley, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Defendants Toman appeal from a judgment quieting plaintiff's title to certain mining property, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The plaintiff is the owner of the Summit quartz mine, situated in Amador county, and the controversy here is as to so much of the vein of ore having its apex within the surface lines of plaintiff's location as lies within vertical planes drawn through the end lines of such location and those lines produced in their own direction, and underneath the surface of defendants' land. This vein, at the apex, traverses plaintiff's location, crossing both the southern and northern end lines. In its downward course the vein descends into the earth at an angle approximately of 65 deg. eastwardly, and on such downward course passes outside of a plane drawn down vertically through the east side line of plaintiff's surface location, and enters the adjoining land of defendants at a depth of 1,094 feet from the collar of plaintiff's shaft, and extends for a considerable distance therein. Plaintiff has already sunk its shaft to a depth of about 2,000 feet, and was at the time of the commencement of this action engaged in removing the ore and mineral-bearing rock from said vein at such depth of about 2,000 feet. The end lines of plaintiff's claim are not parallel, but converge in the direction of the dip of the vein.

Plaintiff's title to the Summit quartz mine is derived from Hall McAllister, the patentee from the United States. The patent was issued November 25, 1873, and the final entry and payment were made on October 11, 1872, several months after the passage of the act of Congress of May 10, 1872, relative to the promotion of the development of the mining resources of the United States. The application for the patent, based upon two locations made in the years 1863 and 1865, respectively, was filed on February 7, 1871, while the act of July 26, 1866, c. 262, 14 Stat. 252, commonly known as the "Lode and Water Law," was in force, and was pending on May 10, 1872, awaiting the approval by the surveyor general of the survey which had already been made and submitted for approval. The patent subsequently issued upon said application purported to grant to the patentee the mining premises described therein, with the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of 1,165.56 linear feet of said vein (the length thereof on the apex between plaintiff's end lines) throughout its entire depth, although it might enter the land adjoining, provided that the right of possession thereby granted to any portion of the vein outside of the vertical side lines of the survey should be confined to such portions thereof as lay between vertical planes drawn downward through the end lines of said survey at the surface, so continued in their own direction that such vertical planes will intersect such exterior parts of such vein. The patent recites that the proceedings were had in pursuance of the act of July 26, 1866, the act amendatory thereof approved July 9, 1870, c. 235, 16 Stat. 217, and the act of May 10, 1872, c. 152, 17 Stat. 91, and that the patent is issued in conformity with said acts. The defendants own the adjoining land, known as the "Toman Ranch"; their title being derived through mesne conveyances from patents issued under the laws of the United States providing for the sale and disposition of agricultural lands, which patents were junior in point of time to the patent for the Summit quartz mine, and contained a reservation giving the right to the proprietor "of a vein or ledge to extract and remove his ore therefrom should the same be found to penetrate or intersect the premises hereby granted."

*Rehearing denied March 2, 1905.

It will be seen from the foregoing that the mining patent purported, upon its face, to grant to plaintiff's predecessor all that portion of the vein of ore which is here in controversy. Defendants contend, however, that notwithstanding the attempted conveyance, in terms, of the property in dispute, the patent failed to convey any extralateral rights, by reason of the fact that the end lines of plaintiff's claim, as located, surveyed, and granted, were not parallel, as required by the act of May 10, 1872.

It appears to be recognized by the authorities that compliance with the requirements of the act of May 10, 1872, that the end lines shall be parallel, is essential to the existence of any right in the locator or patentee to follow his vein outside of the vertical planes down through the side lines, in all cases where the location was made under such act. Iron S. M. Co. v. Elgin, M. & S. Co., 118 U. S. 196, 6 Sup. Ct. 1177, 30 L. Ed. 98; Del Monte M. & M. Co. v. Last Chance M. & M. Co., 171 U. S. 55, 18 Sup. Ct. 895, 43 L. Ed. 72; Argonaut M. Co. v. Kennedy M. & M. Co., 131 Cal. 15, 25, 63 Pac. 148, 82 Am. St. Rep. 317.

Plaintiff urges that as the only object of such requirement was to prevent the locator, in following his vein downward, from acquiring a greater length underneath the surface than he had apex at the surface, a grant of extralateral rights within converging end line planes, as in this case, would be within the spirit and intent of the act of 1872, and therefore valid. This view is opposed to statements made in the opinions in the cases last cited, which appear to incline to the conclusion that extralateral rights are granted under the act of 1872 only when the end lines are parallel. However, it is unnecessary to definitely decide this point in this case, for we are satisfied that as the locations upon which the patent was based were made prior to May 10, 1872, the requirement as to parallelism of end lines was not applicable thereto. It was not until the passage of the act of 1872 that there was any such requirement, and it is not disputed that, had the patent issued prior to the passage of such act, it would have conveyed the extralateral right between the converging end planes. While the act of May 10, 1872, repealed the previous statutes regarding the location and patenting of mining claims of the character here involved, the framers thereof were very careful to manifest their intention that existing rights should not be affected by such repeal. By section 2322, Rev. St. [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1425]—one of the sections of said act—it was declared that "the locators of all mining locations heretofore made * * * so long as they comply with the laws of the United States, and with state, territorial and local regulations not in conflict therewith, shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of their locations, and of all veins, lodes and ledges throughout their entire depth, the top or apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extended downward vertically, although such veins, lodes or ledges may so far depart from a perpendicular in their course downward as to extend outside the vertical side lines of such surface locations," provided that their right of possession to such outside parts of such veins shall be confined between vertical planes drawn downward through the end lines of their locations, continued in their own direction. It was further expressly provided in the act that "such repeal shall not affect existing rights. Applications for patents for mining claims now pending may be prosecuted to a final decision in the General Land Office, but in such cases, where adverse rights are not affected thereby, patents may issue in pursuance of the provisions of this act." And further: "Nor shall this act affect any right acquired under said act" (the act of 1866). And still further: "Provided that nothing contained in this act shall be construed to impair in any way rights or interests in mining property acquired under existing laws." In the face of such provisions, it cannot be held that it was the intention of Congress to deprive a previous locator, by any new requirement, of any existing right, unless such intention is very clearly manifested. So far as the particular requirement as to parallelism of end lines is concerned, it would appear to be well settled that it has no application to locations made prior to the act of May 10, 1872. The objection of want of parallelism in end lines, where the patent was issued subsequent to the passage of said act, based upon locations made prior thereto, has been several times disposed of by the simple statement that when the locations were made there was no law requiring such parallelism. See Carson City G. & S. M. Co. v. North Star M. Co. (C. C.) 73 Fed. 597, 599; Id., 83 Fed. 658, 669, 28 C. C. A. 333. In Iron S. M. Co. v. Elgin M. & S. Co., 118 U. S. 196, 208, 6 Sup. Ct. 1177, 30 L. Ed. 98, the Supreme Court of the United States said, in effect, that a locator under the act of 1866 has in such a case extralateral right, notwithstanding the lack of parallelism. The question was fully considered and definitely decided by this court in favor of such right in Argonaut Min. Co. v. Kennedy M. & M. Co., supra. It was said therein that it would have been competent for Congress, in the law of 1872, to have required parties who had equitable rights to patents to have made their end lines parallel before a patent issued, on pain of losing all extralateral rights, but there were no such provisions in the act of 1872, and that the rights of locators under former laws were by said act expressly confirmed to them. The extralateral right was in that case confirmed, although the end lines diverged; it being held that it could be determined, as matter of law, from the patent, what portion of the vein between those lines, not exceeding at any depth the stated number of linear feet at the apex, was conveyed. Where the end lines converge, as in this case, there can, of course, be no question as to the definiteness of the description of the extralateral right conveyed. By reason of such converging, the patentee is confined, within well-defined boundaries, to less on the dip below the surface than he had upon the surface.

It is sought to distinguish this case from the Argonaut Case, and other cases relied on by plaintiff, by showing that in all these cases the applicant for a patent had made his application, and paid his money thereon, prior to the passage of the act of May 10, 1872, and thereby had acquired an equity susceptible of enforcement against the government, while in the case at bar, although the locations and application for a patent had been made prior to May 10, 1872, the payment was not made or the survey finally approved by the surveyor general until after that date. We find nothing in the report of the case of Carson City v. North Star, etc., Co., supra, showing that the money had been paid prior to May 10, 1872, and, so far as appears therein, the case was an exact parallel to this case. We are, however, of the opinion that the distinction alleged is not at all material. We are not concerned here with the question as to how far a locator must have proceeded with his claim, to put it beyond the power of the government to interfere with him in the enjoyment of the same. As we read the act of 1872, it seems very clear that it was the intention of Congress to preserve to the prior locator everything that his location would have given him, had the act of 1872 not been enacted, except possibly the width of the claim on the surface. See Lakin v. Roberts, 54 Fed. 461, 4 C. C. A. 438.

We have already referred to the various provisions upon this subject contained in the act of 1872, and it is unnecessary to here restate them. The rights sought by the act to be preserved were such rights as had been acquired under the prior acts, by the making of a valid location, even though those rights were not of such a nature that the government might not, if it had seen fit so to do, deprive the locator thereof; and the right to obtain a patent in accordance therewith under the provisions of the act of 1872 was given for the reason that the previous laws as to the issuance of such patents were repealed, and there was no other law under which a patent could be issued for any such mining claim. It was left to the Land Department to determine, as to any such alleged prior location, what the rights of the locator were under the previous acts, and, in accordance with the procedure laid down by the act of 1872, to issue a patent conveying the title of the government, so far as might be necessary to effectuate such rights.

The patentee did not waive or renounce any extralateral right by the acceptance of the patent. It is true that the patent did, in accordance with the express provisions of the act of 1872, purport to grant, in addition to the vein or lode originally located, the right to all other veins or lodes, the top or apex of which lay inside of the surface lines of the location extended downward vertically, to their entire depth, although in their course downward they extended outside of the vertical side lines. It might, perhaps, be contended with some force that as to these other veins and lodes, which were not embraced within the original location, and the right to which was for the first time given by the act of 1872, the requirement as to parallelism of end lines might preclude any extralateral right. But the patent, in terms, also purported to grant the 1165.56 linear feet of the original vein, throughout its entire depth, between the end lines continued in their own direction. By the acceptance of such a patent, there was no indication of any intent to waive or renounce any right to follow the vein, between the end lines, given by the original location, for those rights were expressly confirmed thereby, and plaintiff bases its claim entirely thereon. We cannot see that the legal effect of such an acceptance was a waiver or renouncing of any such right. These particular rights the patentee was entitled to, even though his end lines were not parallel, and the fact that the patent purported to also grant something else to which he may not have been entitled cannot affect his rights as to the original vein, which are also confirmed by the patent. It is true that the patent recites on its face that it is issued in pursuance of the act of 1872, but it also recites that it is issued in pursuance of the act of July 26, 1866, and the act amendatory thereof, approved July 9, 1870, and, in conjunction with the public records in evidence, shows that it was issued upon locations made prior to May 10, 1872, and upon an application pending at that date.

The decision in the case of New Dunderberg v. Old, 79 Fed. 598, 25 C. C. A. 116, relied upon by appellants, does not sustain their claim. The Dunderberg owners claimed the right to follow their vein on its course or strike outside of and beyond their patented boundaries, and into a prior claim (the Frostberg). They claimed that they had this right under the claim of 1866, but they had so located their claim on the surface that the lode crossed both side lines of the claim diagonally on its strike, and passed out of the claim more than 300 feet before it entered the Frostberg claim, and had accepted a patent for this location. This patent did not purport to grant the extralateral right alleged, and could not, under the law, grant it upon the surface location, which had to be made under either act, for under both acts the locator was confined, in following the strike of his vein, within the surface boundaries he had himself defined. To include the extralateral right sought in that case, it was necessary for the Dunderberg owners to go beyond their location, entry, and patent, and claim something not embraced therein at all. It was in regard to such a case that the Circuit Court of Appeals said that the claimant was bound by his own location, entry, and application, and a patent in accordance therewith, and that his location and entry for a patent was a notice of abandonment of everything not included therein. It was said: "A claimant who discovered and located a lode mining claim under the act of 1866 renounces and abandons all rights and privileges to follow his lode on its course beyond the exterior lines of his patented claim, when he located it upon the surface of the ground, enters it, and accepts a patent for it under the act of May 10, 1872." Since the side lines of the Dunderberg claim crossed the course of the strike of the vein, they were held to constitute end lines, and it was held that, under the express terms of the patent, the owner of the claim was without right to the possession of the lode outside of those lines after he obtained his patent. This case is in no way applicable here.

A question is raised as to the effect upon plaintiff's extralateral right of a quitclaim deed made by plaintiff to the defendants Toman on December 31, 1898. By this deed, plaintiff purported to remise, release, and forever quitclaim unto the Tomans "All those certain lots, pieces, or parcels of land situate, lying and being in the said County of Amador, State of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit: First, That portion of Sections Eight (8) and Seventeen (17) Township Six (6) North Range Eleven (11) East, Mount Diablo Base and Meridian, lying north of the center of that certain wagon road extending between the towns of Ione and Volcano and known as the Ione and Volcano wagon road, and lying east of that certain patented mining ground known as the Summit Quartz Mine, and also east of that certain patented mining ground known as the Amador Consolidated Mine." The second parcel described lay to the west of the Summit quartz mine, and is in no way here involved. By this deed the plaintiff further purported to remise and release the Tomans from all claims, bonds, and contracts made by the Tomans to it or its predecessors, and specially from any covenant contained in an agreement between the parties dated October 23, 1897, and duly recorded. The deed recited that it was made pursuant to a resolution of the board of directors adopted December 31, 1898. The making of the deed was subsequently ratified by two-thirds of the stockholders. The objection made by plaintiff when defendants offered this deed in evidence was sustained, and the deed excluded, upon the ground, as stated by the court, that it did not purport to convey any portion of the mining ground of plaintiff. Admittedly, the description in the deed does include the land of the Tomans adjoining plaintiff's claim, through which the vein in controversy has its dip. Defendants, relying upon the well-recognized principle that a conveyance of land, in the absence of express reservation, carries not only the surface of the earth, but everything under it and over it, including the minerals therein contained, claim that the effect of this deed was to convey to defendants the portion of the vein here in dispute. As the plaintiff was at the date of the deed the owner of such portion of said vein, such must be held to be the effect of the quitclaim deed if the description in the deed includes the same. As has already been seen, the deed purported to convey only such portions of the sections of land as lay east of "that certain patented mining ground known as the Summit Quartz Mine and also east of that certain patented mining ground known as the Amador Consolidated Mine." It is only by construing this language as referring exclusively to the lines of the surface location that defendants' contention that this description included the vein can be upheld. As a matter of fact, the vein under the Toman surface was, so far as it lay between the converging end line planes of plaintiff's claim, as much a part of the Summit quartz mine, and of the patented mining ground known as such mine, as was the land within the surface lines of plaintiff's location. Tyler Min. Co. v. Last Chance M. Co., 90 Fed. 15, 21, 32 C. C. A. 498; Empire State, etc., Co. v. Bunker Hill, etc., Co., 121 Fed. 973–977, 58 C. C. A. 311; Davis v. Shepherd, 31 Colo. 141, 72 Pac. 57. It had been by the United States government severed from the Toman land, and granted to plaintiff's predecessor, as an integral part of the Summit quartz mine, and the agricultural patents of defendants' predecessors contained a corresponding limitation upon the estate granted to them. Unquestionably it would have been conveyed by any instrument purporting to grant the Summit quartz mining claim or the Summit quartz mining ground, for it was part and parcel thereof. The reasons which would require us to hold that the vein was conveyed by a deed purporting to convey the Summit quartz mining claim or mining ground are equally applicable to a deed purporting to convey only lands lying east of such claim or ground, and forbid the conclusion that it was intended to convey any part of the mining claim or ground itself. A very different case would be presented if we were dealing with a deed which contained a description of a parcel of land simply by metes and bounds, or a deed which purported to convey all lands lying east of a certain defined surface line. We have no such deed here, but one which, in terms, limits its operation to such portions of the designated sections as lie east of the "mining ground" of plaintiff. Taking into consideration simply the character of plaintiff's property, we are of the opinion that the deed did not purport to convey any portion of any vein that had its apex within the surface lines of plaintiff's location, so far as it lay between the converging end lines of plaintiff's claim.

When we examine the deed in the light of the circumstances surrounding its execution, as disclosed by the evidence introduced by defendants, it is apparent that there was no intention to convey any part of the mining claim. The resolution of the board of directors of plaintiff authorizing the execution of the deed, which is referred to in the deed, and the instrument of ratification signed by the stockholders of plaintiff, show that the object of the quitclaim deed was to free the land and title of the defendants from the effect of a contract made on October 23, 1897, by the Tomans and plaintiff, whereby the Tomans had agreed to sell and convey to plaintiff their lands adjoining plaintiff's claim. It appears from the resolution of the board of directors that the Tomans, owning the agricultural lands lying east of plaintiff's claim, had agreed to sell and convey to plaintiff, the owners of the Summit quartz mine, certain real property, the description being apparently the same as that in the quitclaim deed, and that it had been mutually agreed that the agreement should be canceled—the plaintiff to pay the Tomans $1,000 in consideration of such cancellation—and the president and secretary were authorized to execute on behalf of the corporation "a quitclaim deed of all the right, title and interest of the corporation in and to the real property described in said contract of sale, and particularly described as follows." Then follows the description contained in the deed. The ratification by the stockholders recites the execution to the Tomans of "a quitclaim deed, conveying all their right, title and interest of said corporation in and to the property described in said contract," and ratifies such a deed. It is very clear that it was not the intention of either directors or stockholders to remise or release or quitclaim any interest of plaintiff in or to anything that was not covered by the agreement of sale executed by the Tomans. The manifest object was to place the Tomans, so far as title was concerned, exactly where they were at the date of the execution of the agreement of sale. Only "the property described in said contract" was to be quitclaimed. The only property described in said contract of sale was property adjoining plaintiff's mining claim. No part of such mining claim was included therein.

We are therefore of the opinion that there was no error in refusing to receive the deed in evidence, for the reason that, quitclaiming only lands lying east of the "mining grounds known as the Summit Quartz Mine," it did not purport on its face to affect any portion of plaintiff's mining claim, and there is nothing in the surrounding circumstances shown by the evidence introduced by defendants, conceding that the language of the deed is such as to justify consideration of those circumstances, that would justify such a construction of the deed as would make it a conveyance of any portion of plaintiff's interest in its mining claim.

The judgment and ordered are affirmed.

CORPORATIONS — CONTRACTS BETWEEN STOCKHOLDERS—EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY FOR STOCK.

1. If acting in good faith, it is valid for all the stockholders to agree that shares of stock be issued to themselves in exchange for property conveyed by them to the corporation, and to acquire which, in part, the corporation is formed.

2. After corporate stock has been issued in good faith by agreement of all the stockholders in payment for leases transferred to the corporation, the remedy of a subsequent stockholder, who was misled by false representations of some of the stockholders, is personal to himself, and not in the name and for the benefit of the corporation, whose transaction was valid when made.

3. The fact that defendant was secretary of the corporation did not prevent him from procuring oil leases from third persons, which were valuable, and transfer them to the corporation in exchange for corporate stock issued to him, where the transaction is free from fraud or concealment of facts.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by D. F. Garretson against the Pacific Crude Oil Company and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Goodrich & McCutchen and Oscar A. Trippet, for appellant. Geo. P. Adams, J. W. McKinley, and Cochran & Williams, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Plaintiff is a stockholder in defendant corporation, and as such sues for its benefit and that of all the stockholders, the corporation having, on plaintiff's demand, refused to bring the action. The complaint sets forth two causes of action: First, to cancel an issue of 68,000 shares of the capital stock of defendant corporation; second, an issue of 250,000 shares. The first of these issues was made to defendant Corbin for himself and the original corporators, who, with the corporation and one Wilbur, constitute the defendants in this action. The stock will be referred to as the "Corbin shares." The second issue was made to defendant Wilbur, and will be referred to as the "Wilbur shares." The cause was tried by the court, and the findings of fact were in favor of defendants. Judgment passed dismissing the action, with costs to defendants. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is not distinctly claimed in plaintiff's brief that the findings do not sustain the judgment, although the argument in effect is that the court drew wrong conclusions from the facts found, and that in some respects the facts were not just inferences from the evidence. No point is made that the court committed any errors of law in ruling upon the evidence admitted or excluded. Plaintiff's brief is not as helpful as it might otherwise have been, nor is it conformable to the spirit of the rules of the court, for it fails to specify the particulars wherein the findings are unsupported by the evidence except in a very general way, and in its statement of facts it fails to cite the folios of the transcript in support thereof. Turning to the specifications in the transcript wherein the findings are claimed to be unsupported, there is almost an entire failure to point out the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence. An examination of the record, however, convinces us that the findings of fact have support in the evidence, and, unless the trial court drew wrong conclusions from these findings, the judgment and order must be affirmed.

The 68,000 Corbin Shares. It appears that defendant Corbin held an option on certain leases of oil lands. By arrangement among the defendants other than Wilbur, it came about that for a consideration Corbin conveyed to these defendants an interest in the option held by him, and defendant corporation was formed for the purpose of taking over these leases, in consideration of which 68,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation were to be issued to Corbin, he to be entitled to certain of those shares, and the balance to be divided among the other defendants except the corporation and defendant Wilbur, who at this time knew nothing of the transaction, and had no interest in it. The capital stock of the corporation was 1,000,000 shares of the par value of $1 each. It was also agreed by these original corporators that each of them should subscribe for 2,000 shares of the corporation at 10 cents per share, and pay the money into the treasury, which was accordingly done, and the shares were issued to them. The organization of the corporation was effected on April 8, 1900, the defendants other than Wilbur being the only stockholders and directors. The first meeting of the directors and stockholders was held on the day last above named, and, all being present and agreeing thereto, resolutions were duly passed accepting the Corbin option for leases, and authorizing 68,000 shares of the capital stock of the corporation to be issued to Corbin pursuant to the agreement above referred to, and the leases were executed and delivered to the corporation by the companies which had given the options. The shares issued to Corbin bear date April 25, 1900, and on May 29, 1900, certificates for 6,785 shares were issued to each of defendants except defendant corporation, which had been transferred by Corbin pursuant to the agreement already referred to, he retaining the remaining shares. Defendant Wilbur had, previous to April 23d, come into the company, and had subscribed for 2,000 shares of the company's stock on the same terms as the original shareholders and directors, and received 6,785 shares of the Corbin stock in common with them. About 2,500 shares had been sold to other persons, whose certificates are dated April 23, 1900, and on May 31, 1900, plaintiff's shares were issued to him.

Plaintiff alleged that the defendant stockholders combined and confederated to cheat and defraud the corporation and the bona fide stockholders thereof in the issue of this Corbin stock; that Corbin paid nothing for the leases transferred by him to the corporation; that said leases had no value, all of which the directors knew when they passed the resolutions referred to above; that defendants paid nothing for said Corbin shares issued to them, and the corporation received no consideration, nor was there any property received by said corporation therefor. The court found otherwise on these issues; that the corporation "did receive a full and valuable consideration for the issuance of said stock to said Corbin, and labor was done for and on account thereof, and property actually received by said corporation for the issue of said 68,000 shares of stock," and the same was not fictitious, nor was it issued without consideration, nor is it void. The court also found "that neither the acts of said directors nor of said Wilbur or of any of them in the issuance of said 68,000 shares of stock were done in bad faith, or with intent to appropriate to themselves the property or the stock of the corporation without compensation." The court also found that when the 68,000 shares were issued there were other stockholders (although plaintiff was not then a stockholder), but that "when the resolutions were passed for said issuance of stock to defendant Corbin in consideration of said leases, defendants herein, other than defendant corporation and Wilbur, were the only stockholders in said corporation, and all of said defendants were present at the meeting of the directors at which said resolutions were passed, and were fully familiar with all the facts with reference to the issuance of said stock to said Corbin and the agreements with reference to the disposition thereof, and consented and agreed to the issuance of said stock, and to all the agreements with reference thereto," and said transaction, except as to the formal issue of the certificates for said stock, was fully completed and the agreements performed by the parties thereto before any person other than defendants became a stockholder in said corporation, and no persons other than defendants became stockholders in such corporation prior to April 21, 1900.

It was also alleged in the complaint that before plaintiff had purchased his said shares the officers and directors of defendant corporation falsely represented that they "have all paid for their stock at the rate of ten cents per share." The court found that this statement was caused to be published by defendant Corbin, as secretary of the company, with knowledge of the directors, and that at the time plaintiff purchased his stock he believed it to be true. Acting in good faith, it was competent for all the stockholders to agree by unanimous concurrence that shares of the corporation should be issued to themselves in exchange for property conveyed by them to the corporation, and to acquire which in part the corporation was formed. Kellerman v. Maier, 116 Cal. 416, 48 Pac. 377; Scadden Flat G. M. Co. v. Scadden, 121 Cal. 33, 53 Pac. 440; Smith v. Ferry & C. H. Ry. Co. (Cal.) 51 Pac. 710; Morawetz on Corp. § 267; Cook on Stockholders, § 38, notes p. 50. The fact that the Corbin shares were not issued until after other shares had been issued is immaterial, for the Corbin stock passed upon the completion of the agreement by which the consideration was conveyed to the corporation. Nothing remained to be done but the formal issuance of the certificate, upon which the ownership of the stock did not depend. Cal. S. Hotel Co. v. Callender, 94 Cal. 120, 29 Pac. 859, 28 Am. St. Rep. 99; San Joaquin L. & W. Co. v. Beecher, 101 Cal. 70, 35 Pac. 349; Pacific Fruit Co. v. Coon, 107 Cal. 446, at page 452, 40 Pac. 542.

As to the alleged false representations concerning the price paid by defendants for their stock, the statement was true as to their cash purchases, and there was evidence tending to show that the Corbin leases had a value, when acquired, nearly or not quite equal to 10 cents per share of the stock. However this may be, the purchase of the Corbin leases with stock was done in good faith, and was a legitimate transaction, and no other stockholder could complain, for all of them agreed to the purchase. If plaintiff was misled to his injury by subsequent false representations of defendants, the fact could not affect the corporation. His remedy would be one personal to himself, and not in the name and for the benefit of the corporation, whose corporate transaction was valid when made.

The 250,000 Wilbur Shares. The complaint alleges that defendant Wilbur was appointed secretary and general manager of defendant corporation, and that while acting in these capacities, and for the corporation, he secured from one Treadwell and others certain leases of oil lands; that he subsequently assigned these leases to the corporation, and was given 250,000 of its shares therefor. The claim is that he was the agent and trustee of the corporation when he took the Treadwell leases, and in equity the corporation was entitled to the benefits of the transaction. The court found that Wilbur was not the general manager of the corporation when he acquired these leases or at any other time; that he had been elected as secretary previously thereto, but "it was upon the express agreement that he should devote but little of his time to the duties of such office, and should be free to deal in all properties on his own account." The court found further that in negotiating for and examining these Treadwell leasehold properties Wilbur paid his own expenses, and acted wholly in his individual capacity, and "he was not acting for or on behalf of said corporation, and did not secure said lease for said corporation"; and "said corporation was not entitled to have said lease made direct to it or to have said assignment made to said corporation by said Wilbur without compensation or consideration"; and that "the assignment of said lease to said corporation" constituted "a full, adequate and valuable consideration for said stock, and the said issue was not fictitious or without consideration." The court found against plaintiff's claim that these shares were issued to Wilbur through a corrupt combination with the other defendants, and for their mutual benefit, and found that they were issued in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, to Wilbur alone, in which neither the other defendants nor the corporation at the time had any interest. The evidence is full and explicit as to all the circumstances attending this deal, and justified the ultimate facts found by the court. There was evidence, and the court found, that there was no fraud in the dealings complained of, and no concealment of the facts, but that the various steps in the transactions set forth in the complaint were duly entered on the books of the corporation, and that there were no secret agreements between the parties in respect to the acts complained of.

It is not necessary to controvert the principles of law stated by plaintiff as governing officers and directors of corporations in their dealings as such. Plaintiff's case is grounded on the alleged fraud of defendants other than the corporation, and upon the corrupt concealment of their official acts and their fraudulent combination to cheat and defraud the other stockholders and the corporation. Proof of these averments was essential to plaintiff's case, and was not forthcoming. On the contrary, the evidence justified the court in finding that there was neither actual nor constructive fraud in respect of the two transactions, the subject of plaintiff's complaint. The facts do not bring the case within the rules relied on by plaintiff. The purchase of the Treadwell leases was made by the directors openly and free from any taint of fraud, and the evidence is that these leases had great value. We do not think the plaintiff has made a case which would warrant the court in canceling the shares given in payment for the leases, and at the same time allow the corporation to retain the consideration, and plaintiff does not offer to restore the leases. Plaintiff is seeking equity for the benefit of the corporation while wholly failing to do equity or requiring the corporation to do equity.

The judgment and order should be affirmed and it is so advised.

In re GIANELLI'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,315.)

EXECUTORS — ACCOUNTING — PROFITS—LOSSES —FINDINGS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE —REVIEW.

1. Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1613, 1614, an executor is chargeable in his account with the whole of his decedent's estate which may come into his possession at the value of the appraisement contained in the inventory, and is neither entitled to profits derived from a sale thereof nor liable for losses on sales justly made.

2. Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the court's findings thereon will not be disturbed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Judicial settlement of the accounts of Bertha Gianelli, as executrix of the estate of B. Gianelli, deceased. From a decree charging the executrix with certain sums, she appeals. Affirmed.

Louttit & Middlecoff, for appellant. E. P. Foltz, Buck, Miller & Clark, and Miller & Clark, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal by Bertha Gianelli from the judgment and order of the superior court of San Joaquin county settling her account as executrix of the last will and testament of B. Gianelli, deceased. B. Gianelli died December 21, 1902. After his death, on January 9, 1903, his widow was appointed by said court executrix without bonds, in accordance with the terms of the decedent's last will and testament. Decedent left certain real estate and two grocery stores in Stockton—one at California and Fremont streets, and one at Weber avenue and El Dorado street, in said city. After the said executrix had been running the stores in question for some five months, certain creditors of the deceased became dissatisfied with the management of the estate, and petitioned said court to compel the executrix to give bonds. Thereupon, after hearing, the court ordered the executrix to give bonds in the sum of $19,000, whereupon she resigned, and J. S. Moulton, the public administrator of San Joaquin county, was appointed administrator with the will annexed of said estate, and took possession of both stores. The executrix, under order of the court, filed her account and report of her administration of said estate. Said creditors and the public administrator, respondents herein, objected to the same, and filed a contest, with the result that the court disallowed certain items of the account, and also charged the executrix with the estate not accounted for, and thereupon "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said executrix, Bertha Gianelli, pay to J. S. Moulton, as the public administrator of the county of San Joaquin, state of California, as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of B. Gianelli, the sum of $2,215.57, but out of said sum of $2,215.57 said Bertha Gianelli shall be entitled to retain the sum of $720 family allowance, and $156.65, her compensation as said executrix, and subject to the above payment; and said account is hereby in all respects as rendered, approved, allowed, and settled." It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the evidence does not sustain or justify the findings and decree that the executrix failed to turn over all the goods in the store when she resigned, and, further, that the court erred in finding and decreeing that the executrix had made a gain of $614.98 in carrying on the business of the decedent. We have read the evidence, taken at the hearing on the settlement of the account of the executrix, and the most that can be said in favor of the contention of appellant is that in some particulars the court might have found the other way. Still, the evidence as a whole is but substantially conflicting. Under the law the executor is chargeable in his account with the whole of the estate of the decedent which may come into his possession at the value of the appraisement contained in the inventory. Code Civ. Proc. § 1613. He shall not make profit by the increase, nor suffer loss by the decrease or destruction, without his fault, of any part of the estate. He must account for the excess when he sells any part of the estate for more than the appraisement, and if any is sold for less than the appraisement he is not responsible for the loss, if the sale has been justly made. Code Civ. Proc. § 1614. As already stated, the executrix carried on the business of these two stores for some five months, and the evidence shows very clearly that she was in many respects lacking in the necessary knowledge of the business to conduct it in a proper businesslike manner, and failed to account satisfactorily for some of the alleged losses. It also shows that her agent, Gus Gianelli, brother of the deceased, in the management of one of the stores was incompetent or unfit to carry on the business. In his cross-examination he was asked: "Q. Would you consider the services of a manager who run his store behind some $700 in less than six months a proper manager, or consider his services worth $200 [per month] if he didn't discover sooner than six months that he was running his store behind? A. I don't know about that. I don't know anything about it. * * * Q. But you rendered an account to the executrix showing a loss, did you not? A. I could not say." Again, he says, in speaking of some of the accounts: "I have not turned these accounts over to the public administrator because they have not been asked for. I will turn them over whenever they are asked for or demanded. I do not know exactly how many of these outstanding accounts for merchandise sold since Mr. Gianelli's death have been collected." The judge of the court below, with the witnesses giving their testimony before him, and observing their demeanor while testifying, is better able to give proper weight and credibility to such evidence than is the appellate tribunal. This fact is the reason of the rule that, where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the finding or judgment of the trial court will not be disturbed. Mahan v. Wood, 105 Cal. 12, 38 Pac. 507; Adams v. Burbank, 103 Cal. 646, 37 Pac. 640; Moore v. Douglas, 132 Cal. 399, 64 Pac. 705.

PEOPLE v. MODINA. (Cr. 1,173.)

CRIMINAL LAW—ROBBERY—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF REQUEST—APPEAL—ORAL ARGUMENT—POINTS NOT RAISED IN BRIEF—MISCONDUCT OF COURT—PREJUDICE.

1. Where, in a prosecution for robbery, the evidence established that the robbery was committed by force, and there was no testimony that prosecutor was compelled to part with his money through fear, it was not error to omit to charge with reference to robbery committed through fear, as defined by Pen. Code, § 211.

2. In a prosecution for robbery, it was not error, in the absence of a request, to omit to charge that defendant, under the information, might be convicted of petit larceny.

3. On appeal in a criminal case, it is improper for defendant's counsel, in oral argument, to raise a point as to alleged misconduct of the trial court, not referred to in the briefs, and which counsel for the state has had no opportunity to consider and reply to.

4. In a criminal prosecution, alleged misconduct of the court in addressing defendant's counsel in an emphatic and abrupt manner, criticising him for alleged unnecessary repetition of questions propounded to the prosecuting witness, was not ground for reversal, where it did not appear that accused was prejudiced by such remarks.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Albert Modina was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. Marion Brooks and E. H. Bentley, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

LORIGAN, J. Defendant was convicted of robbery, and this appeal is from the judgment, and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The information charged the crime of robbery by means of force and fear. As defined by the Penal Code (section 211), robbery is the "felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear." And section 212, following, specifies what may constitute fear, as an element in robbery. The court instructed the jury relative to what constitutes robbery by reading to them section 211. It is insisted by appellant that the court should have also read them section 212, defining fear, and the failure to do so is assigned as error. The court however, should only give such instructions as are applicable to the evidence in a case. The evidence in the case at bar shows that the robbery charged was committed by means of force. There was no evidence in any way tending to show that the prosecuting witness had been compelled to part with his money through fear. As no element of fear entered into the perpetration of the crime, there was no necessity or propriety in the court instructing the jury on that subject.

It is next insisted that the court should have instructed the jury that under the information the defendant might be convicted of petit larceny. It is too well settled, however, by the decisions of this court to be open to further discussion, that if a defendant wishes an instruction to be given to the jury of their right to find him guilty, if the evidence warrants, of any lesser crime included in the greater one with which he is charged, it is his duty to ask it. If he fails to do so, he cannot complain that it was not given. People v. Wilson, 135 Cal. 334, 67 Pac. 322; People v. Bailey, 142 Cal. 435, 76 Pac. 49; and a long line of decisions referred to in both those cases.

These points are the only ones made in the brief of counsel for the appellant. Upon the oral argument, however, it was claimed that a new trial should be awarded on account of misconduct upon the part of the court occurring during the trial. This alleged misconduct consisted of remarks of the court addressed to counsel for appellant during his cross-examination of the prosecuting witness, and it is claimed that these remarks created a prejudice with the jury against counsel, and therefore against the defendant, whom he represented. This point was not made in appellant's brief, and the practice of making points in criminal cases upon oral argument which were not made in the appellant's brief is not to be approved, especially when no reason appears or is given why they were not made there. Unless there is some reasonable excuse for it, it is unfair to counsel on the other side to permit them to be made or considered. Counsel appear in court prepared to argue such points as in the appellant's brief it is indicated he relies on, and, when new points are raised on oral argument, it usually necessitates the granting of leave to respondent to file a brief in reply, thus creating unnecessary delay in the final submission of a cause. In this case this neglect to make the point originally would be sufficient reason for our declining to now consider it, as it is also some indication that counsel did not think it of sufficient merit then to present it. Examining it, however, we do not think it discloses any ground for a reversal. The remarks of the court were addressed to counsel with reference to what the court deemed an unnecessary repetition by him of questions propounded to the prosecuting witness, and the asking of other questions which had no relevancy or bearing in the case, and which all served only to waste time. While counsel seems to have been perfectly courteous to the court, the record discloses that many unnecessary repetitions of questions and irrelevant inquiries were made, which warranted the court in warning counsel to cease making them. The language of the court was quite emphatic and abrupt, but it was addressed solely to that point. Attention might have been called to this impropriety of counsel in wasting the time of the court in a more urbane manner and in more courteous language. But the proper courtesy which shall be exercised between court and counsel must, of course, be left to the judge's own sense of propriety, and we are only concerned with its exercise, in any given case, to the extent of considering how far the want of it affected the jury, if at all, to the prejudice of the defendant; and, from a consideration of the entire case, we do not perceive that the cause of defendant was prejudiced by the remarks of the court.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.

BROOKS et al. v. UNION TRUST & REALTY CO. (L. A. 1,293.)

(Supreme Court of California, Jan. 31, 1905. On Rehearing, Feb. 28, 1905.)

RESULTING AND CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS—PAROL EVIDENCE—REHEARING—PETITION—SERVICE.

1. Though a consideration is recited in a conveyance, parol evidence is admissible to establish a resulting and constructive trust in favor of another than the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 47, Cent. Dig. Trusts, §§ 129–133.]

2. Under Sup. Ct. Rule 30, authorized by Const. art. 6, § 4, as amended November 8, 1904, and providing that applications for rehearing must be filed and a copy served on the adverse party within a certain time, and the adverse party shall have a certain time to answer, and such times shall not be extended, a petition for rehearing, not served on the adverse party, must be disregarded.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Francis Brooks (formerly Burkhart) and another against the Union Trust & Realty Company. From an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Reversed.

Dunnigan & Dunnigan, for appellants. Walter Bordwell, for respondent.

SMITH, C. This is a suit to enforce an alleged trust (resulting and constructive) in land conveyed to defendant's grantors by plaintiffs' alleged trustee. The findings and judgment were for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial. Both parties—with an exception that will be noted—rely on the same deraignment of title, which is as follows: (1) Judgment in favor of plaintiff Burkhart against Teresa Luhring, of date September 19, 1891, for the sum of $85.85, afterwards assigned to plaintiff Brooks, who was then the wife of Burkhart, but afterwards divorced. (2) Sheriff's sale under execution on the judgment for the sum of $135.75, and certificate of sale to plaintiff Brooks, of date July, 1895; at which time, it is alleged in the complaint, and not denied, she was still the wife of Burkhart. On this point there seems to be some confusion. The finding of the court is to the contrary of the allegation, and in the respondent's brief it is said that the parties had been divorced nearly two years prior to the sale. But we are cited to no evidence in support of this assertion, and have not been able to find any. The point is material only to the matter of evidence. (3) Assignment of certificate of sale for recited consideration of $135.75, and subsequent sheriff's deed, January 22, 1896, to Daniel Burkhart and Leonard Brooks; sons, the former of plaintiff Burkhart, the latter of plaintiff Brooks. (4) Conveyance by Leonard Brooks to Daniel Burkhart, and allotment of the land in question to the latter by judgment in a partition suit in the year 1899. (5) Deed of Daniel Burkhart, during his last illness, to Sexton & Grider, of date January 8, 1901. (6) Deed from Sexton & Grider to defendant, of date January 9, 1901. In addition to the above, it is alleged in the second count of the complaint that during the last illness of Daniel Burkhart, and before his deed to Sexton & Grider, a deed in execution of the trust was made and delivered by him to his father and brother John Burkhart. But there will be no occasion to consider this aspect of the case.

It is alleged by the plaintiff, in effect, that the plaintiff Mrs. Brooks, under agreement to that effect, took the certificate of purchase at the sheriff's sale for the joint use and benefit of herself and husband, in certain definite proportions; that the certificate was assigned by her, and, by the direction of plaintiffs, the sheriff's deed made, to Leonard Brooks and Daniel Burkhart, without consideration, and upon a parol agreement and understanding that they should hold the land in trust for plaintiffs; that the deed of the former to the latter was made by direction of plaintiff Burkhart upon the same trust and confidence; that the trust was repeatedly admitted by Leonard and Daniel; and, finally, that the deeds from Daniel to Sexton & Grider, and from the latter to the defendant, were taken by the grantees, respectively, with full knowledge of the trust. It is further alleged, in effect, that the deed to Sexton & Grider was procured by the fraud and undue influence of the grantees, acting in conspiracy with one Bigelow and others; and that the defendant took the deed with knowledge of the trust relations between Daniel and the plaintiffs and of the fraud and conspiracy of its grantors and Bigelow. These allegations occur in the second count of the complaint, wherein all the facts set out in the first count are also alleged. On all of the issues thus raised the findings were adverse to the plaintiffs.

The points urged by the appellants are that the material findings are not supported by the evidence, that a new trial should have been granted on the affidavits of newly discovered evidence, and that the court erred in sustaining the objections of the defendant to questions put to the plaintiff Brooks and her son Leonard as to the agreement or understanding under which they took their respective titles. The last point, if sustained, or held to be untenable, will dispose of the appeal, and, as we are of the opinion that it is well taken, it will be sufficient to say of the others that evidence was introduced by the plaintiffs tending to prove their material allegations—some of it of a very cogent nature—and that it is claimed by the appellant, not without some plausibility, that, "had the court not been in error upon the law of this matter, it would doubtless have granted a new trial on the affidavits." Our attention will therefore be confined to the point raised by the exclusion of the testimony of Mrs. Brooks and her son Leonard. As to the former, it is urged by the respondent that the evidence offered was inadmissible, because it appeared that Mrs. Brooks was "the owner of the judgment which was the consideration of the sale." But—leaving out of view that it appears that advances for sheriff's costs were made by Burkhart, which would constitute part of the consideration—her testimony as to her part interest with her husband in the property purchased (the fruit of the judgment) would have been cogent to prove that she was similarly interested in the judgment itself; and the justice of this inference is confirmed by her own express testimony to that effect. Nor, were it otherwise, are we to be understood as holding that the point would be tenable. But the principal point urged relates to the testimony of Leonard, and is that, a money consideration being recited in the assignment of the certificate and in the sheriff's deed to him, parol evidence was inadmissible to establish the alleged trust; in support of which contention Russ v. Mebius, 16 Cal. 350, and other cases, are cited. But these were cases where the trusts sought to be established were in favor of the grantor; and if it be assumed, for the purposes of the decision, that such trusts continue to exist, as resulting trusts, under the Codes (Feeney v. Howard, 79 Cal. 530, 21 Pac. 984, 4 L. R. A. 826, 12 Am. St. Rep. 162), yet the principle announced in Russ v. Mebius is peculiar to that class of cases, and has no application to the kind of resulting trusts referred to in section 853 of the Civil Code. In trusts of this kind the consideration is usually recited, yet parol testimony is always admissible. Hidden v. Jordan, 21 Cal. 93; Bayles v. Baxter, 22 Cal. 575; Millard v. Hathaway, 27 Cal. 119, 142; cases cited Pomeroy's Ed. Civ. Code, section cited. The evidence offered was, we think, clearly admissible, and its exclusion material error.

We advise that the order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial: VAN DYKE, J.; SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

In bank. On petition for rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The respondent has filed with the clerk a petition for rehearing without serving a copy thereof on the adverse party. Section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, as amended November 8, 1904, contains the following provision: "The Supreme Court shall make and adopt rules not inconsistent with law for the government of the Supreme Court and of the district courts of appeal and of the officers thereof, and for regulating the practice in said courts." In pursuance of this authority and command the Supreme Court has adopted rules of practice which are now in force. Rule 30 provides as follows: "(1) Applications for a rehearing of a cause by the court rendering judgment therein must be filed, and a copy served on the adverse party, within twenty days after the judgment is pronounced. The adverse party may file an answer thereto not less than two days before the expiration of the time within which the rehearing can be granted. * * * (4) The times herein prescribed shall not be extended, and the clerk must not file any such application or answer after the time therefor has expired." By virtue of the power conferred by the amendment, the Supreme Court now has authority to make rules of practice which have the force of positive law, so far as the rights of the parties are concerned, provided such rules do not conflict with any act of the Legislature. The provisions of rule 30, above quoted, are consistent with the law. They confer a positive right upon the prevailing party to have a copy of such application served upon him at least ten days before the expiration of the time within which the application can be considered by the court, and give him at least eight days thereafter within which to file an answer thereto. These are substantial advantages to adverse parties, and, if they are wisely used, the court will be materially aided in the disposition of the application. Where rules of court are of such a nature that important rights are given by them, a compliance therewith must be strictly enforced. In cases where it is shown that by unavoidable accident or excusable mistake parties have been prevented from observing such rules, and it appears that substantial injury will be inflicted by their enforcement, the court may, on proper terms, allow a departure therefrom. Such cases, however, must be extremely rare, and the circumstances extraordinary, and the court will be reluctant to vary in the least from the exact practice prescribed. Under the circumstances here shown the petition should not have been filed without the service upon the adverse party, and it must be disregarded.

PEOPLE v. HILL. (Cr. 1,174.)

CRIMINAL LAW—ACQUITTAL—APPEAL BY STATE.

Where accused was tried in a court of competent jurisdiction on a valid information for attempting to bribe a witness, and was acquitted by a verdict, jeopardy attached, and, as she could not again be tried, the case will not be reviewed on appeal by the state.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 14, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 345-361; vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Criminal Law, §§ 2604, 2605.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Spencer, Judge.

Laura Hill was indicted for attempting to bribe a witness, and from a verdict of not guilty the state appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty., and C. C. McComas, Dep. Dist. Atty., for the State. Emmet H. Wilson and Yoakum Spencer, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Defendant was charged in the information with a felony, to wit, an attempt to bribe a witness, contrary to the provisions of section 137 of the Penal Code. The defendant pleaded not guilty. A trial was had on the issue. Evidence was introduced by both parties, and after it was all in, and the parties had rested, the court advised and directed the jury to find for defendant upon the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant a conviction. Thereupon the jury rendered a verdict of not guilty. The people appeal from the order advising and directing the jury to acquit.

The respondent was tried on a valid information, in a court of competent jurisdiction, and was acquitted by the verdict of the jury. "Jeopardy" therefore attached, and respondent cannot again be tried for the said alleged crime. Under these circumstances, and as held in prior decisions of this court, it would be a vain thing to consider the general questions discussed by appellant. People v. Horn, 70 Cal. 17, 11 Pac. 470; People v. Roberts, 114 Cal. 67, 45 Pac. 1016; People v. Terrill, 132 Cal. 497, 64 Pac. 894. In the cases just cited the orders appealed from were affirmed, and we will follow that course here.

PEOPLE v. KELLY. (Cr. 1,186.)

CRIMINAL LAW—ROBBERY—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Where, on appeal in a criminal case, a point is argued at length in the opening brief, but is abandoned in the reply brief, it will not be considered.

2. Where, in a prosecution for robbery, the person robbed testified explicitly to all the circumstances of the crime, and clearly identified defendant as one of its perpetrators, the evidence was sufficient to justify a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 42, Cent. Dig. Robbery, § 34.]

3. Where evidence, though immaterial, could not have injured accused, the court's refusal to strike it out was not reversible error.

4. Code Civ. Proc. § 1832, defines "indirect evidence" as that which tends to establish the fact in dispute by proving another which, though true, does not of itself conclusively establish that fact, but which affords an inference or presumption of its existence; and section 1963 (subdivision 20), with reference to presumptions, declares that it is presumed that the ordinary course of business has been followed (subdivision 28), that things have happened according to the ordinary course of nature and the ordinary habits of life, and (subdivision 32) that a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature. Held, that where in a prosecution for robbery a witness had testified that he was city electrician, and that he knew of the electric lights at the intersection of certain streets in the city, and that no report came in from there on January 14, 1902, he was entitled to testify that reports were not made unless a light went out, to show the ordinary course of business of the city with regard to its lights and their general or usual condition.

5. In a prosecution for robbery, testimony of a witness that he made a visit to the place of the crime with a detective, who "located the place where he understood the hold-up occurred," followed by testimony as to the condition of the electric light at that point, was inadmissible, in the absence of evidence that the place referred to was the true place of the crime.

6. Such evidence was harmless, however, in view of evidence that the place shown the witness was midway between two lights, prosecutor having testified that the place where the hold-up occurred was an open space in the middle of a block between certain trees, since, if the place was elsewhere than at the middle of the block, the light would have been stronger.

7. Where, in a prosecution for robbery, prosecutor testified that he pointed out to N., in company with others, the place where the crime was committed, evidence of N. that he, in company with such others, went to the place of the crime and made certain measurements from the point so shown by prosecutor, was admissible.

8. Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, provides that it may be shown by the examination of a witness or the record of the judgment that he has been convicted of a felony, and section 17 provides that words used in the singular number include the plural. Held, that where, after an information for robbery had been dismissed as against M. on his pleading guilty to robbery in another case, he appeared as a witness for defendant, he was properly interrogated as to five different felonies of which he had been convicted prior to the robbery as to which he pleaded guilty.

9. Where, in a prosecution for robbery, two ex-convicts testified as witnesses for defendant, it was not error for the district attorney to emphasize such convictions in his argument to the jury.

10. Where, in a prosecution for robbery, a witness answered in the negative a question as to whether he had not stated that K., defendant, and himself came to L. together, defendant was not prejudiced thereby.

11. In a prosecution for robbery, evidence that defendant was booked at the police station by an assumed name was inadmissible.

12. Where M., C., and K. were charged with robbery, evidence of the keeper of a boarding house, at which they stopped prior to the commission of the offense, that C. and K. registered under assumed names, was admissible.

13. In a prosecution for robbery, evidence of a conversation had between witness and defendant, in which the latter stated that on the night of the offense he slept in a box car down by the bridge, was not a confession of guilt, and therefore did not require proof that it was voluntary, in order to justify its admission.

14. An instruction that, if the jury is convinced that a witness has willfully stated what is untrue with intent to deceive, the jury must treat all his testimony with distrust and suspicion, and reject it unless they are convinced that, notwithstanding his base character, he had in other respects sworn to the truth, was not objectionable as withdrawing the credibility of the witness from the jury.

15. Where, in a prosecution for robbery, the prosecutor's ownership of the property taken was not controverted, an instruction requiring a verdict of guilty if the jury believed from the evidence facts hypothetically stated, which included all the facts constituting the offense except that the property taken from prosecutor was his property, was not error.

William Kelly was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. L. Shinn and F. H. Thompson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

SMITH, C. The defendant was convicted in the lower court of the crime of robbery, committed by him and two others on one Powers in the city of Los Angeles, the precise place of the crime being on the west side of Olive street between Ninth and Tenth streets. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Numerous points are urged by his counsel as grounds for reversal, and these will be considered in the order in which they occur in the brief. It will be understood that the several rulings complained of were made over the objections and exceptions of the defendant.

1. The point is made and argued at length in appellant's opening brief that the court erred in refusing to set aside the information, but in the reply brief this point is abandoned.

2. It is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. But Powers, the man who was robbed, testifies explicitly to all the circumstances of the crime, and clearly identifies the defendant as one of its perpetrators. The argument of the counsel goes only to the credibility of his testimony, which was a matter for the jury to consider.

3. It is objected that the court erred in refusing to strike out the testimony of the witness Smith as to the whereabouts of one Ah Hing. Doubtless this testimony was immaterial, but it could not have injured the defendant in any way.

4. The witness Manihon had testified, without objection, that he was the city electrician, and that he knew of the electric lights at the intersection of Ninth and Tenth streets and Olive, and that no report came in from there on the 14th of January, 1902. He then testified that reports were not made unless a light went out. But it was competent, we think, for the prosecution to show the ordinary course of business of the city with regard to its lights and their general or usual condition. Code Civ. Proc. § 1832 and section 1963, subds. 20, 28, 32. As to the effect of the evidence, that was for the jury to determine. The same witness testified that he had made a visit to the place of the crime the night before with Detective Steele who "located the place where he understood the hold-up occurred"; and he then testified as to the condition of the light at that point. We have been unable to find in the record any evidence tending to show that the place referred to was the true place of the crime, and, in the absence of such evidence, we think the testimony was improperly admitted. But it appears from the testimony of the witness that the place showed him by Steele was about midway between the two lights, from which it may be inferred that it was the darkest point between them (except under the trees), and consequently, for the defendant, the spot most favorable for observation. For it appears from the testimony of Powers that the place of the crime was in the open space towards the middle of the block between the trees to the north and to the south, and, if the place of the crime was elsewhere than at the middle of the block, the light would have been better. Under these circumstances the evidence could not have injured the defendant.

5. The same objection was made to the testimony of the witness Noble, who, in company with Steele, Powers, and others, went to the place of the crime and made certain measurements from the point shown by Powers as the place of the crime. But here Powers himself had testified that he had pointed out to Noble, in company with other persons named, the place of the crime, and the evidence was therefore unobjectionable.

6. The witness Myrtle, with defendant and Case, were originally parties to the information in this case, but as to Myrtle and Case, upon their pleading guilty to a charge of robbery in the case referred to as the "Klokke Case," the information was dismissed. Both were called as witnesses for the defendant, and Myrtle was asked as to five different felonies prior to the Klokke Case of which he has been convicted, and which he admitted. This testimony, we think, was admissible. By section 2051, Code Civ. Proc., it is expressly provided that "it may be shown by the examination of the witness or the record of the judgment that he has been convicted of a felony"—which means that as many felonies as he has been convicted of may be thus shown. Code Civ. Proc. § 17.

7. Similar questions were asked of the defendant Kelly, and the same observations will apply as to the case of Myrtle.

8. Another objection urged is that the district attorney in his argument to the jury dwelt with much emphasis upon previous convictions of the witnesses Myrtle and Case and of the defendant. This was objected to by defendant's counsel, but we see nothing reprehensible in what was said. Nor, indeed, do we find any ruling by the court except in the observation that the former convictions were admissible only in attacking the credibility of the witness, which seems to have been all that the defendant could reasonably have asked for, and to which, at least, he took no exception.

9. The witness Case was asked whether he did not tell Officer Kelly or some one in his presence that he and Kelly, the defendant, came down to Los Angeles together from Alameda county, and it is claimed that the question should not have been allowed. But as the question was answered in the negative, the defendant was in no way prejudiced.

10. Defendant also claims that the court erred in refusing to permit him to prove that he, the defendant, was booked at the police station by the name of Badger, but this evidence was clearly inadmissible.

11. Another objection is to the testimony of Mrs. Lightfoot, keeper of the boarding house at which Myrtle, Case, and Kelly put up prior to the commission of the crime, who testified that Case and the defendant registered under the names of Russel and Truan. This evidence, we think, was clearly admissible.

12. The witness Steele testified to a conversation with the defendant, in which, among other things, the latter said that on the night of the 14th he slept in a box car down by the bridge; and it is objected that the evidence should not have been admitted, both because it was immaterial, and because it was not shown to have been made without inducement of hope or fear from the witness.

But the evidence, we think, was material, and the statement of the defendant was not a confession of guilt, and therefore did not require proof that it was voluntary. People v. Hickman, 113 Cal. 86, 45 Pac. 175.

13. One of the instructions of the court objected to is the following: "The jury being convinced that the witness has stated what is untrue, not as the result of a mistake or inadvertence, but willfully and with the design to deceive, must treat all of his testimony with distrust and suspicion, and reject all unless they shall be convinced, notwithstanding the base character of the witness that he had in other particulars sworn to the truth." But the effect of this instruction is simply that the jury must reject the testimony of the witness referred to unless they shall be convinced of its truth, which is to leave the credibility of the witness to the jury.

14. Other instructions are objected to as "giving undue prominence by repetition to the impeaching instructions" found in the record, but we think the instructions are unobjectionable in this or any other particular.

15. In another part of the charge the jury is instructed to find the defendant guilty if they should believe from the evidence certain facts hypothetically stated, which included all the facts constituting the crime of robbery, except that the property taken from the party robbed was his property. But there was no dispute as to the ownership of property, which was proved to be that of Powers, the party robbed, and hence the jury could not have been misled by the instructions.

PEOPLE v. WONG FOOK SAM. (Cr. 1,183.)

CRIMINAL LAW—PERJURY—APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT—INSTRUCTIONS—REVIEW.

1. On an appeal in a criminal case on the judgment roll alone, the judgment will not be reversed for the giving of an instruction, unless such instruction would be erroneous in every conceivable state of the case.

2. Where an indictment for perjury charged, not only that the testimony given was false, but that it was willfully given with knowledge on defendant's part that it was false, as provided by Pen. Code, § 118, and the court charged in terms that all the allegations of the information except the falsity of the testimony were admitted, an instruction that if the jury believed beyond all reasonable doubt by the testimony of two witnesses, or by the testimony of one witness and corroborating circumstances, that the testimony in question was false, they should convict, did not constitute reversible error, on an appeal on the judgment roll alone.

3. The term "false," as used in Pen. Code, § 118, defining perjury, and providing that every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify truly, willfully and contrary to such oath states as true any material fact which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury, means "false in fact," as distinguished from legal falsity.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Wong Fook Sam was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry C. Dibble & Dibble and Edgar D. Peixotto, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and C. N. Post, Dep. Atty. Gen. (George D. Collins, of counsel), for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was convicted of perjury, and appeals from the judgment. There is no bill of exceptions, the appeal being on the judgment roll alone.

The only point made for reversal is that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows, viz.: "The only question for you to determine is, was it true or false? * * * If you are satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt by the testimony of two witnesses, or by the testimony of one witness and corroborating circumstances, that the testimony given in that trial was false, your verdict in that case would be, 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the information.'" The contention is that this instruction omits an essential element of the crime of perjury, viz.: that the testimony upon which the charge is based was not only false, but was willfully given, with the intent that it should be taken as true, and was given with the knowledge on the part of the witness that it was false. It is not disputed that this was an essential element. People v. Von Tiedeman, 120 Cal. 128, 52 Pac. 155, and cases there cited. The Code, in defining perjury, provides that "every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify * * * truly, * * * willfully and contrary to such oath states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury." Pen. Code, § 118. The information against defendant was drawn in accordance with this well-settled principle, charging not only that the testimony was false, but that it was willfully given, with the knowledge on the part of the defendant that it was false and untrue.

It is, however, a well-established rule that, in the absence of the evidence, this court will not reverse a judgment for the giving of an instruction, unless such instruction would be erroneous in every conceivable state of the case. People v. Mendenhall, 135 Cal. 344, 347, 67 Pac. 325; People v. Strong, 46 Cal. 302; People v. Donahue, 45 Cal. 321; People v. Torres, 38 Cal. 141. In People v. Donahue, supra, this rule was applied in a capital case, and this court, in affirming the judgment, while admitting that the instruction may have been erroneous, said: "Still, if any state of facts might have been proved in view of which it would be proper, then we must suppose that that state of facts was proved, and that the defendant was not prejudiced. The rule is that judgments will be reversed for alleged errors in instructions only when, looking at the testimony, we can see that the jury may have been misled by them to the prejudice of the defendant, or when, in the absence of the testimony, it is apparent that the instruction would be improper under any possible condition of the evidence. * * * It would not be difficult to suppose a case that would justify the instruction, and under the rule announced we cannot reverse the judgment." We are of the opinion that this rule must be held applicable to this case. It is conceivable that all the elements essential to perjury, except the single one of the untruth or falsity of the testimony, were, on the trial and for all the purposes of the trial, effectually admitted to exist, and that the only real question left for determination by the jury was as to whether the alleged false testimony had been satisfactorily proved to be false by the testimony of two witnesses, or by the testimony of one witness and corroborating circumstances. If this was the state of the case, it cannot be held that the instruction was improper. It may seem unlikely that one on trial for perjury should, for the purposes of the trial, deny the allegation that the alleged false testimony was untrue, and at the same time admit the truth of the allegation to the effect that he willfully gave the testimony with the knowledge that it was untrue. Yet such a condition of affairs is conceivable, and that is all that is necessary to preclude us, in the absence of a bill of exceptions showing the proceedings, from holding that the instruction was erroneous. The essential as to knowledge of falsity pertains to the condition of mind of the witness at the time he gives the alleged false statement. The question in that connection is, did he at the time know the statement to be false in fact? If the statement was in fact true, he could not, of course, have known it to be false; but the subject-matter of the statement may be such that the defendant well knows that if such falsity can be shown by the testimony of two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances (as is required by section 1968, Code Civ. Proc.), it would be useless for him to deny that he knew it to be false. He might, therefore, choose to put the prosecution upon proof only as to the question as to whether the alleged false testimony was in fact true or false, and for all the purposes of the trial effectually admit all the other allegations of the information, including the one as to his knowledge. Such a state of the case is clearly conceivable, and, if it existed, the instruction was not erroneous.

The instruction in question was part of a general instruction upon the evidence essential to show perjury. The court had already defined perjury in the language of section 118, Penal Code, and then informed the jury that under the Code of Civil Procedure the statement alleged to have been testified to falsely must be proved to be false, either by the testimony of two witnesses or one witness and corroborating circumstances. In this connection the court said: "In this case all of the allegations of the information, except the question as to whether the testimony given was true or false, are admitted. All the allegations of the information, with the exception of that stated, are admitted, and the court instructs you that on those facts, of course, there is no question—that the trial was had as charged in the information, and the oath administered as charged in the information, the oath taken as charged in the information, and the testimony so given as charged in the information, and that the testimony was material as charged in the information. The only question for you to determine is, was it true or false? You must determine that yourselves. It is a question of fact, resting solely with you, and you must find that it was false, either from the testimony of two witnesses, or from the testimony of one witness with corroborating circumstances; and if such testimony is not before you, of course, you cannot convict, or if you have a reasonable doubt, from all the testimony in the case, as to whether it was true or false—whether the testimony given on the trial mentioned in the information was true or false—he is entitled to an acquittal at your hands." Then followed the concluding paragraph of the portion hereinbefore quoted. It thus appears that the court told the jury in terms, that all of the allegations of the information, except the single one as to the falsity of the testimony, were in fact admitted. This absolute statement is not qualified or limited by the subsequent paragraph, in which the court further stated several particulars wherein the allegations of the information were admitted. Such statement in no way purports to be a limitation on the preceding statement, and is not at all inconsistent therewith. With the question as to whether the fact was in accord with the statement of the court that all of the allegations were admitted, except the single one as to the falsity of the testimony, we are not here concerned. That question could arise only on a bill of exceptions, showing the proceedings.

It is suggested that the issue really left for the consideration of the jury, after the admissions made on the trial, was as to the "legal truth or falsity" of the testimony, as distinguished from its truth or falsity in point of fact, and that this is shown by the instructions of the court. The word "false," in the statute defining perjury, means false in point of fact. As used in the instruction, it undoubtedly means the same thing. If the instruction could be construed as meaning what is called by appellant "legal falsity," it would not be open to the criticism made by him; for it would have required the jury to find the existence of all the elements essential to such "legal falsity" before they could convict. But the term "legal falsity" is meaningless in this connection. To constitute perjury, the testimony given must be false in point of fact, and must have been given with knowledge that it was so false in point of fact. These are separate and distinct elements, and each must be alleged in the information. "To say that a witness testified falsely does not necessarily imply that he did it willfully or knowingly; and saying that he so testified contrary to his oath is merely to say in another form that he testified falsely. The language of the statute is 'willfully, and contrary to such oath, states as true any material matters which he knows to be false.' Pen. Code, § 118. This, or language of like import, must be employed to satisfy the statute." People v. Ross, 103 Cal. 425, 37 Pac. 379. According to the statement of the court, as shown by its instructions, the only allegation of the information that had not been admitted was the allegation to the effect that the testimony was false in point of fact.

WILLEY et al. v. CLEMENTS. (L. A. 1,607.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 28, 1905.)

EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY—FRAUD—RATIFICATION—RESCISSION—RETURN OF CONSIDERATION—FINDINGS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—APPEAL—CONCLUSIVENESS.

1. Where, in a suit to set aside a conveyance for fraud, the evidence was contradictory, findings of the court that the representations were made to induce plaintiff to make the trade, in accordance with plaintiff's testimony, and that they were false and known to be false by defendant, will be accepted as conclusive on appeal.

2. In a suit to set aside an exchange of property for fraud, evidence held to justify a finding that K., who was active in furthering the exchange, and who deceived plaintiff with reference thereto, represented defendant, and was not plaintiff's agent.

3. In a suit to set aside an exchange of property for fraud, oral misrepresentations made to induce plaintiff to enter into the contract were not inadmissible under Civ. Code, § 1625, providing that a written contract supersedes previous verbal negotiations, such section being inapplicable until after the contract in writing has been executed.

4. Where plaintiff, after making an exchange of properties, signed an instrument expressing her satisfaction with the exchange, knowing of defendant's fraudulent representations concerning a deficiency in the quantity of the land conveyed to her and concerning an incumbrance thereon, but without notice of the falsity of other representations concerning the quality of the land, its productiveness, and water rights appurtenant thereto, which would not be disclosed by a mere examination of the property, she was not estopped by her ratification from subsequently rescinding the exchange therefor.

5. Plaintiff, on discovering such further fraudulent representations, was entitled to rescind the ratification as well as the original transaction, under Civ. Code, § 2314, providing that a ratification may be rescinded when made with an imperfect knowledge of the material facts of the transaction ratified.

6. Where, in a suit to set aside an exchange of real estate for fraud, the court found that K. acted in the transaction as defendant's agent, though he represented to plaintiff that he was acting in her behalf, plaintiff was not required to return a sum paid K. by defendant, as a condition to her right to rescind the exchange.

Action by Warner E. Willey and another against James I. Clements. From a decree in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John W. Kemp and Byron L. Oliver, for appellant. J. Wiseman MacDonald and Clarence A. Miller, for respondents.

HARRISON, C. Action for rescission and to set aside certain instruments of transfer executed between the plaintiffs and the defendant.

In January, 1902, the plaintiff Lulu K. Willey was the owner of certain real estate in Los Angeles, which she subsequently conveyed to the defendant in exchange for a tract of land in Tulare county conveyed to her by him. She seeks by this action to rescind the transaction upon the ground that she was induced to make the exchange by reason of certain false and fraudulent representations made to her by and on behalf of the defendant. The plaintiff Warner E. Willey is the husband of Lulu, and for that reason is joined with her as a party plaintiff.

At the trial of the cause the court found that, among the inducements to make the exchange the defendant represented to Mrs. Willey that his tract of land in Tulare county consisted of 380 acres, of which 100 acres had been planted to alfalfa, and had produced crops of alfalfa each year; that there were 25 tons of alfalfa stacked on the place, and in the barn, which had been produced on the ranch; that the ranch had produced in the preceding year 5,400 sacks of grain; that the profits of the ranch for that year amounted to $6,000; that there was a water ditch running across the place, which furnished all the water necessary for the crops upon the land, at a cost of 50 cents per acre; that there was appurtenant to the land 500 shares of water stock, which he held, and which entitled the ranch to an abundant supply of water free of charge; that the property was incumbered by a mortgage of $2,000, bearing interest at 6 per cent.; that all the personal property on the place went with it; that with said personal property there was a valuable gang plow. The court found that the ranch consisted of only 320 acres; that there was an incumbrance of $6,000 upon it, which also covered certain other property; that, with the exception of about 20 acres, no part of the ranch had ever been planted to alfalfa or produced any alfalfa, and that this 20 acres had never yielded a crop of alfalfa; that no part of the 25 tons of alfalfa then stacked there had been produced upon the place, but that all of it had been cut from an adjoining ranch; that the ranch did not produce 5,400 sacks of grain in the year 1901, but produced only 1,100 sacks in that year, and that that was the largest crop that had ever been produced in one year on the ranch; that the profits of the ranch for the year 1901 did not amount to $6,000, or to any sum of money whatever; that there was no water stock appurtenant to said ranch, or entitling the ranch to any supply of water whatever, free of charge, or at all; that no water could be obtained for the ranch except at the cost of $1.50 per acre; that there was no gang plow on the ranch belonging to the defendant. The superior court thereupon rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

In support of the appeal, the appellant urges that the evidence before the court was insufficient to justify its decision in favor of the plaintiff; that before the deeds of exchange were executed Mrs. Willey had caused an examination of the Tulare property to be made, and relied upon such examination and her judgment thereon, instead of the representations made to her by the defendant; that after the deeds of exchange had been executed and recorded she ratified the transaction by a subsequent instrument in writing.

Upon the issue whether the above representations were made to the plaintiff, as well as upon many other issues in the case, the testimony on behalf of the respective parties was directly contradictory, and the above findings of the court that the representations were made in accordance with the testimony given on behalf of the plaintiff, rather than in accordance with the testimony on behalf of the defendant, must be accepted as correct. That the representations were false, and were known to the defendant to be false when they were made, is not controverted by him. That they were made in reference to facts which were material to the transaction is evident from their nature.

Some of the above representations to the plaintiff were made by one MacKnight, who acted quite prominently in the transaction, and the finding of the court that he was the agent of the defendant for the purpose of effecting the exchange, and that therefore his representations to Mrs. Willey as to the character of the Tulare property are to have the same effect as if made by the defendant himself, is challenged by the appellant as not sustained by the evidence. Whether he was such agent was an issue sharply contested at the trial, and was to be determined by the court upon a consideration of the entire evidence respecting the course pursued by him during the negotiations, rather than upon any specific testimony by him or by the defendant as to the fact; and the inference which the trial court might reasonably make from such evidence is entitled to the same consideration as its finding of a fact upon contradictory evidence. The evidence before the court, however, fully justified it in finding, not only that MacKnight was the agent of the defendant for the purpose of effecting the exchange, but that during all the negotiations in reference thereto he falsely pretended to Mrs. Willey that he was acting in her interest, while he was in fact acting in the interest of the defendant and against her interest. Although he had for some years prior thereto been her agent in collecting rents, and had aided her in other business transactions to the extent that she reposed trust and confidence in him, she did not employ him for this transaction, but received the proposition for the exchange from him. This proposition was made, in the first instance, by the defendant to MacKnight, and was typewritten and signed by the defendant in the office of MacKnight. MacKnight thereupon requested Mrs. Willey to come to his office, and there she first met the defendant, and in his presence MacKnight then read the proposition to her. During this interview oral representations as to the character of the Tulare property were made by both the defendant and MacKnight, and MacKnight strongly urged her to accept the proposition. The contention of the appellant that these oral representations cannot be considered, for the reason that they were superseded by the written proposition, is without merit. The representations, whether oral or written, were made as inducements for entering into the contract, and the provision of section 1625, Civ. Code, cited by the appellant, that the writing supersedes the previous verbal negotiations, has no application until after the contract in writing has been executed. The subsequent conduct of MacKnight during the course of the transaction fully supports the conclusion of the court that he was at all times acting as the agent for the defendant and in his behalf, and consequently that the defendant is accountable for his representations made in his absence, as well as for those made in his presence.

The facts relied upon as a ratification are as follows: At the time the appellant's proposition to exchange the properties was submitted to Mrs. Willey (January 10th), she wrote at the bottom thereof, "If the property is satisfactory upon investigation I will trade," and signed her name thereto. On January 16th she was taken seriously ill, and for several weeks thereafter was confined to her bed, and by reason of her illness was unfitted during that time to do business. While she was in this condition, MacKnight, on January 17th, falsely stated to her that the defendant had received an offer of $5,000 more for his Tulare property, and that he was likely to accept the same, and presented her a document, the nature of which he concealed from her, but which he represented to her to be an instrument which would have the effect of holding the defendant to his bargain, and urged her to sign it, stating to her that the document was to be held by him in escrow. Upon these representations she signed the document without reading it, or having it read to her, and MacKnight took it away with him. The instrument was in fact a conveyance of her Los Angeles property to the defendant, and although she was ignorant of this fact, and did not in fact acknowledge her execution of it, MacKnight on the same date, after leaving her, affixed to it his certificate, as a notary public, that she had acknowledged its execution to him, and, instead of keeping it as he had promised, he delivered it to the defendant, at whose request it was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Tulare county on January 24th. On January 27th she learned that the instrument was a conveyance of her Los Angeles property, and that the Tulare property consisted of only 320 acres, and upon calling the attention of MacKnight to this fact he said to her that he had got the paper and finished the thing up through his zeal for her welfare, but that if she did not want the ranch he could fix it; that, if she would indorse her acceptance upon the defendant's original proposition, that would make it a contract, and the defendant could be made to pay her the full value of the 60 acres shortage, or she could knock the trade over if she wished. Thereupon she wrote upon the document of January 10th, "Above proposition accepted," and signed her name thereto, and MacKnight took the paper away. This indorsement was written by her on January 27th, but MacKnight caused it to be dated January 16th, thus making it appear that she had accepted the proposition prior to the execution of her deed. A day or two later she consulted an attorney in reference to the transaction, and on January 30th he wrote to the defendant, calling his attention to the discrepancy in acreage of the Tulare tract. On the next day the defendant, instead of responding to the letter of the attorney, sent to Mrs. Willey through the post office a registered letter, in which he stated to her that he knew no reason why she should be dissatisfied with the deal, but that he was perfectly willing to trade back, and offered to do so, stating also that his offer would remain open for 10 days. At the time he sent this letter he knew that Mrs. Willey was ill, and would not for that reason be able to act upon it during the 10 days therein named, and that she had not ascertained, and could not during that time ascertain, the truth as to the aforesaid representations made by him. MacKnight also advised her, upon her receipt of the letter, to disregard it, saying to her: "Do not pay any attention to that offer of Clements to rescind. I will fix matters up." A few days after this MacKnight again visited the plaintiff, and falsely represented to her that she was indebted to him in the sum of $925 as a commission for his services in the transaction, and stated to her that the defendant would pay him this commission, and would allow her certain other money connected with the transaction, and would extinguish the incumbrance on the Tulare property in excess of $2,000 if she would ratify the transaction of exchange and waive any claim on account of the 60 acres shortage; and on February 14th presented to her an instrument purporting to express her satisfaction with the exchange, which, at his request, she thereupon signed.

At the time she signed this document she knew that the Tulare property was 60 acres less in extent than defendant had represented it to be, and she accepted the plaintiff's agreement to reduce the incumbrance thereon to $2,000. If these had been the only items of misrepresentation, her execution of the instrument would have rightly estopped her from claiming any rescission. The defendant had, however, made the other representations above mentioned of the character and condition of his property, whose falsity she did not ascertain until after she went to the property in April. These were statements of facts which were peculiarly within his knowledge, and which would not be disclosed by a mere examination of the property, and upon which she had the right to rely without any investigation for the purpose of ascertaining their truth. Bank of Woodland v. Hyatt, 58 Cal. 234; Calmon v. Sarraille, 142 Cal. 638, 76 Pac. 486. Her subsequent ascertainment of their falsity gave her the right, under section 2314, Civ. Code, to rescind the ratification as well as the original transaction.

The court rightly held that defendant was not entitled to be reimbursed for the $925 paid to MacKnight. The plaintiff was only required to restore what she had received from the defendant. As she was under no obligation to MacKnight, the payment to him by the defendant was not for her benefit, and she was not required to refund it to him.

CONTEMPT—JURISDICTION—RECORD—REPORTER'S NOTES.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1211, provides that, when a contempt is committed in the immediate view or presence of the court or judge in chambers, it may be punished summarily, and that an order must be made reciting the facts as occurring in such immediate view and presence, adjudging that the person proceeded against is thereby guilty of contempt, and that he be punished as therein prescribed. Held, that under such section the jurisdiction of every court to punish for contempt is special and limited, and its authority to render judgment must be shown by the record of conviction.

2. A certified copy of the minutes of a superior court, reciting that in a certain case petitioner, the district attorney, was sworn and examined as a witness for the defense, and on refusing to answer, after being ordered to do so by the court, was adjudged in contempt and ordered committed to jail until he should answer the interrogatories, was insufficient to show jurisdiction of the court to punish petitioner for contempt or to sustain his incarceration.

3. Where a district attorney, on being sworn as a witness in a criminal case, refused to testify, after being ordered to do so by the court, and was thereupon committed for contempt, the reporter's notes of the proceedings leading up to the order of contempt was no part of the record of such contempt proceedings.

Application for writ of habeas corpus to obtain a release of E. H. Hoar, incarcerated for contempt. Petitioner discharged.

J. K. Law and F. W. Henderson, for petitioner. Frank H. Farrar and F. G. Ostrander, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. On petition of E. H. Hoar, alleging that he was unlawfully imprisoned by the sheriff of Merced county, a writ of habeas corpus was issued, and has been duly served and returned. Both by the petition and the return an attempt has been made to raise questions of some importance relating to the procedure in criminal cases, and to those questions the argument of counsel has been mainly directed. The case, however, does not call for a decision or any discussion of those questions, for it is clear upon the face of the sheriff's return that, whichever contention might be sustained, it would equally follow that the prisoner must be discharged.

The only authority for his detention is a certified copy of the following order:

"Minutes of the Superior Court. Merced County. Tuesday, Jan. 24th, 1905. Present: Hon. E. N. Rector, Judge. The People of the State of California v. F. A. Robinson. The defendant and respective counsel return into court. E. H. Hoar, district attorney, is sworn and examined as a witness for the defense, but refuses to answer certain interrogatories after being ordered to do so by the court, and he is again adjudged to be in contempt of court, and the court orders that he be committed to the county jail until he shall answer said interrogatories."

In cases of contempt every court exercises a special and limited jurisdiction, and its authority to impose a fine or term of imprisonment must be shown by the record of conviction. Code Civ. Proc. § 1211; Overend v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 284, 63 Pac. 372, and cases cited. This order is wholly insufficient to show jurisdiction, and the official reporter's notes of the proceedings leading up to the order are no part of the record.

The petitioner is discharged.

SUBMISSION OF CONTROVERSY—SEARCH WARRANT—JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION—MATTER OF DIFFERENCE—CERTIORARI.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1138, declares that parties to a question in difference which might be the subject of a civil action may, without action, agree on a case containing the facts on which the controversy depends, and present a submission of the same to any court which would have jurisdiction if an action had been brought. Held, that where a justice of the peace had issued a search warrant against L., which had been delivered to the sheriff, but the sheriff had taken no steps to serve it, no "question in difference" existed betwen the justice and L. which could be the subject of an action, so as to authorize a submission by them of the question whether the justice had jurisdiction to receive and file the affidavit for the warrant, and to issue the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Submission of Controversy, §§ 4, 5.]

2. It was immaterial, under such circumstances, that the action of the justice in issuing the warrant might be reviewed by certiorari.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Controversy without action, between F. A. De Lucca and William H. Price, justice of the peace. From a judgment in favor of the former, the latter appeals. Reversed.

Cassius Carter, Dist. Atty., and W. R. Andrews, Dep. Dist. Atty., for appellant. Hendrick & Wright, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an attempt, without action and under the provisions of section 1138 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, to obtain a decision as to whether a search warrant, requiring a search of the premises of respondent for certain property, and the taking of the same, if found, already issued by the appellant, as justice of the peace, and in the hands of the sheriff of San Diego county, who was about to execute the same, was issued without jurisdiction and authority of law. The agreed case was submitted to the superior court of San Diego county by respondent and appellant alone, the officer holding said warrant not being a party to the submission. The question to be decided, as stated in the submission, was "whether the said William H. Price, as he is justice of said Julian township, county of San Diego, state of California, have power, authority, and jurisdiction to entertain, receive, and file said affidavit for said search warrant, * * * and whether he have power, authority, or jurisdiction to issue said search warrant." The superior court ordered and adjudged that said justice had no such jurisdiction, and that the warrant was issued without authority of law. The justice of the peace appeals from such judgment.

We are clearly of the opinion that the superior court was without jurisdiction, upon the submission presented to it, to determine the question stated therein. The special jurisdiction conferred by section 1138, Code Civ. Proc., is limited, in terms, to the hearing and determination of such questions in difference as might at the time of the submission be the subject of a "civil action" between the parties making the submission, and it must appear in such a proceeding, by affidavit, that the controversy is real, and the proceedings in good faith, "to determine the rights of the parties." In other words, there must at the time of the submission be a real controversy between the parties thereto, which might then be settled in a civil action brought by one or more of such parties against the others. The language of the statute is, "Parties to a question in difference, which might be the subject of a civil action, may, without action, agree upon a case containing the facts upon which the controversy depends, and present a submission of the same to any court which would have jurisdiction, if an action had been brought." Section 1138, Code Civ. Proc. As has been said by this court, "this provision has reference to interested parties, authorized and capable of litigating the question involved" (Bailey v. Johnson, 121 Cal. 562, 54 Pac. 80), and only such parties may, by their agreement, confer jurisdiction upon the court "to hear and determine the case, and render judgment thereon, as if an action were depending." The record shows no "question in difference" between De Lucca and the justice of the peace which could at the time of the submission have been the subject of a civil action between them. Even if it should be contended that for any damage caused De Lucca by the execution of a void search warrant the justice of the peace issuing the same would be in any degree liable to De Lucca, there certainly could be no liability on his part until the possession of De Lucca had been invaded. At the time of the institution of this proceeding the justice of the peace had issued the warrant, and it was in the hands of the sheriff, unexecuted. Whatever remedy De Lucca might then have had, in the way of civil action, against the sheriff who was threatening to execute the warrant, no possible claim which could then be the subject of a civil action was asserted by him against the justice. His only claim was that the justice of the peace had, in the exercise of the duties of his office, exceeded his jurisdiction in the issuance of the warrant, and that another officer, not a party to the proceeding, acting under the void warrant, was about to cause him damage. Manifestly, no civil action known to our law could at that time have been maintained by him against the justice. If any "question in difference" then existed, which might be the subject of a civil action, it was a question between himself and the officer who was proceeding to execute the warrant. It is doubtful, however, whether there was any such "question in difference," as is within the meaning of section 1138, Code Civ. Proc., between De Lucca and such sheriff. See, also, Bailey v. Johnson, supra.

It may be suggested that certiorari would lie, on the application of De Lucca, to review the action of the justice's court, and this may be true. See Quan Chick v. Coffey, 75 Cal. 371, 17 Pac. 427. But that fact does not show any such question in difference between De Lucca and the justice of the peace as is within the contemplation of section 1138, Code Civ. Proc. A tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions is not authorized to litigate, as a party, the mere question as to whether it has, in the doing of an official act, exceeded its jurisdiction. The law has provided methods by which the party aggrieved may have such an act reviewed by a superior tribunal. Ordinarily this is accomplished by an appeal. Where there is no appeal, or any other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, such act may be reviewed on certiorari. The proceeding in certiorari is simply an additional method of reviewing the action of an inferior tribunal exercising judicial functions, being similar in its nature to an appeal; and the tribunal whose act is assailed thereby has no interest in the matter, in which it has simply acted in a judicial capacity (I X L Lime Co. v. Superior Court, 143 Cal. 170, 174, 175, 76 Pac. 973), to any greater extent or in any different degree than such interest as it may have when an ordinary appeal is taken from its order or judgment. The proceeding is against the completed act alleged to have been in excess of jurisdiction, rather than against the inferior tribunal; and, while the writ runs to the tribunal whose action is sought to be reviewed, the real adverse party in interest is the one in whose favor the act complained of has been done. In this matter the real parties in interest upon the question of the validity of the search warrant were the people of the state of California, in their collective capacity, and De Lucca. The tribunal which, on the application of the people, in the exercise of its judicial functions, issued the search warrant, was not competent, under the law, to agree upon a case containing the facts upon which its jurisdiction depended, and was not authorized by any provision of statute to submit to a superior tribunal for review a transcript of its record and proceedings in the matter until it had been ordered to do so by a writ issued from such superior tribunal.

The superior court had no jurisdiction, in the proceeding before us, to affirm or annul the proceeding in the justice's court, and could not render any enforceable judgment in the matter.

We are satisfied that the judgment must be reversed, and the matter remanded, with directions to the superior court to dismiss the proceeding, and it is so ordered.

In re GEARY'S ESTATE. (L. A. 1,550.)

HOMESTEAD—UNSURVEYED PUBLIC DOMAIN—DESCRIPTION — CONVEYANCE — FAILURE OF WIFE TO JOIN—ABANDONMENT—PROBATE ORDER—APPEAL—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

1. The merits of an appeal from a probate order can ordinarily be fully reached on a bill of exceptions to the order itself, without a motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 2, Cent. Dig. Appeal and Error, §§ 1650, 1659.]

2. Petitioner settled on a tract of the unsurveyed public domain, marking the corners by a pile of stones, and named the same "G.'s Ranch." He thereafter filed a declaration of homestead, which described the property as "known by name of 'G.'s Ranch,'" and also by imaginary legal subdivisions, which were afterwards found to be erroneous, on the land being surveyed. Thereafter petitioner obtained a patent for the land, which described it by correct legal subdivisions, as they had then been established. Held, that the erroneous description by legal subdivisions in the declaration might be disregarded as surplusage, and that the remaining description by name was sufficient.

3. Petitioner conveyed his homestead in question to B. in fee, by deed in which petitioner's wife did not join, and some two years thereafter B. reconveyed the premises in fee to petitioner's wife, then living. Held that, since the deed to B. was void for failure of the wife to join, it did not constitute an abandonment of petitioner's homestead rights in the property.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; N. H. Conklin, Judge.

Petition by Daniel Geary for an order setting off a homestead from the estate of Catherine Geary, deceased, to which Mary Ellen Boardman filed objections, and, from an order granting the relief prayed, appeals. Affirmed.

Luce & Sloane, for appellant. W. T. McNealy and J. B. Mannix, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. In the administration of the estate of Catherine Geary, deceased, her surviving husband, Daniel Geary, petitioned the court to set off to him as a homestead certain lands described in the petition, under sections 1474, 1475, et seq., of the Code of Civil Procedure. The court made the order setting off the homestead as prayed for. The contestant made a motion for a new trial, and, for the purposes of such motion, presented and had settled a statement. The motion for a new trial was denied, and contestant appeals from the order setting off the homestead, and also from the order denying the motion for a new trial. On the appeal from the first order there is no bill of exceptions.

Respondent contends that the motion for a new trial was entirely unwarranted, and the appeal therefrom cannot be considered—citing Estate of Franklin, 133 Cal. 584, 65 Pac. 1081, and other cases—and that, as there is no bill of exceptions to the original order, this appeal must be considered on the judgment roll alone. Under our views of the case, it is not necessary to decide this question, and we will not do so. But it is, perhaps, well to remark that the disposition of many attorneys to inject the procedure of a motion for a new trial into probate litigation uselessly raises difficult questions. The merits of an appeal from a probate order can ordinarily be fully reached on a bill of exceptions to the order itself which is sought to be reviewed.

Appellant's first contention is that the declaration of homestead on which respondent relies is fatally defective for want of a sufficient description of the homestead premises, but, in our opinion, this contention is not maintainable. The premises consist of a tract of 160 acres, which at the time of the declaration of homestead was upon unsurveyed United States public lands, in an unsettled region of country. Petitioner went upon the land with his family, consisting of his wife and her daughter, and at that time there was on the land a small adobe house, which he occupied. A couple of months afterwards he built a frame house, into which he moved with his family. He plowed some of the land, built a brush fence around 10 or 15 acres, and put in a crop. A couple of years afterward he built a larger frame house, into which he moved with his family, built a board fence where the brush fence had been, built a stone fence around a large corral, fenced in an additional 40 acres with a board fence, and used the land for farming and cattle raising. He located and claimed 160 acres, and marked it by a pile of stones at each corner. His place was known as "Vicetus," and afterwards as "Geary's Ranch." In his declaration of homestead the land is first described as a lot of 160 acres, "on which I now reside with my family," in San Diego county, Cal.; and then follows an attempted description by legal subdivisions, which, after the land had been surveyed by the United States government, was found to be incorrect. But the description continues as follows: "Said homestead known by the name of 'Geary's Ranch,' and being the piece of or parcel of land occupied by me and my family nearly three years from the date hereof, together with all the improvements thereon, and it is my intention to use and claim the said lot of land and premises, together with the dwelling house thereon and its appurtenances, as a homestead, and I do hereby select and claim the same as a homestead," etc. This description by name designated with sufficient certainty the premises intended to be covered by the declaration of homestead, and the other erroneous descriptions by legal subdivisions may be disregarded. It was, no doubt, unwise to attempt to describe the land by imaginary legal subdivisions which then had no existence, and the lines of which, when afterwards established, could only be guessed at. It was an isolated place on which petitioner lived with his family and had marked by monuments, upon which he had erected buildings and fences, and thus distinguished it from the wild country around it; and, as this place was known as "Geary's Ranch," the description by that name was, under the circumstances, sufficient. Petitioner afterwards obtained a United States patent for the land after it had been surveyed, which described it by correct legal subdivisions as they then had been established. It was averred in the petition that the land thus patented was the same land upon which he had placed his declaration of homestead, and the court so found, upon sufficient evidence to sustain the finding. We think, therefore, that the point that the declaration of homestead is void for want of sufficient description of the homestead premises is not tenable. See Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 148, where Field, J., delivering the opinion of the court, elaborately discusses the subject. There was also a subsequent declaration of homestead by petitioner's wife, which need not be noticed.

The other main point made by appellant is that before the death of petitioner's wife he conveyed to her the said homestead premises, and thus lost his homestead right therein, or at least only retained the right to have the homestead set apart to him for a limited period. But petitioner did not convey the premises to his wife, and therefore we need not consider the vexed question as to what extent, if any, the conveyance by a husband to his wife of homestead premises affects his homestead right therein. In November, 1887, the petitioner executed a deed to one L. A. Blochman, purporting to convey the said homestead premises in fee to said Blochman, but petitioner's wife did not join in this deed. About two years afterward Blochman executed a deed purporting to convey said premises in fee to petitioner's wife, Catherine Geary, who was then living. It was averred in appellant's answer that the said deed from petitioner to Blochman was made "in trust for, and with the understanding and agreement that said L. A. Blochman should thereafter deed and convey the said premises to, the said Catherine Geary, as her separate property"; and it is contended that the deed to Blochman and the deed from the latter to Catherine should be taken as substantially a direct conveyance from petitioner to his wife. But the court found that the deed to Blochman was not in trust for Mrs. Geary, "nor was the same executed for the purpose or with any understanding or agreement that said L. A. Blochman should thereafter deed or reconvey the said premises to the said Catherine Geary"; and this finding is amply supported by the evidence, for it appears very clearly that it was made for an entirely different purpose. Therefore the deed of the homestead premises to Blochman by the petitioner alone did not convey any title to the former, and, of course, his deed to Catherine conveyed nothing, even if petitioner consented to or directed it.

The foregoing conclusions as to the two main points above noticed are determinative of the other contentions of appellant, which are merely incidental to the main points, and we see nothing further in the case which calls for special notice.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MANNING. (Cr. 1,156.)

CRIMINAL LAW—HOMICIDE—ISSUES—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where in a prosecution for homicide there was nothing showing that defendant was acting in self-defense, his contention being that the killing was purely accidental, it was not error to refuse instructions presenting the issue of self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 26, Cent. Dig. Homicide, § 624.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. P. Lawlor, Judge.

Nathan C. Coghlan and Robert Ferral, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., for the People.

VAN DYKE, J. The defendant by the information was charged with murder. He was tried and convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment in the state prison. The trial commenced in July, 1901, and judgment was rendered September 21, 1901. The appeal is taken from the order denying a new trial and from the judgment and sentence. The bill of exceptions on appeal was not settled until January 9, 1904.

The facts concerning the homicide are about as follows: On the evening of July 4, 1899, Mr. and Mrs. Kennedy, with their children, made a friendly visit to the home of Mrs. Manning, on Jones street, in San Francisco. The visitors and the family of Mrs. Manning, except the defendant, took dinner together, and, after the meal had been finished and the table cleared, the defendant came home and asked for his dinner, and his mother told him to help himself. After he had dined, defendant entered into a conversation with the Kennedys, when John Tarleton came in and was engaged in conversation by the defendant. The conversation between defendant and Tarleton resulted in defendant, who was considerably under the influence of liquor, applying to Tarleton offensive and obscene names, and repeating them several times. Thereupon Tarleton left the house. According to the testimony of Kennedy, Mrs. Manning upbraided her son for insulting the guest Tarleton. In this, however, there is some conflict. Mrs. Manning in her testimony says: "Tarleton bid them good night, and went to the door to go, and I went with him. At the door I had a conversation with him. * * * Tarleton was pretty drunk. After I let him out of the door I returned to the kitchen, and when I came into the kitchen Kennedy and Mrs. Kennedy had Connie down on the lounge. Mr. Kennedy had him by the throat, and Mrs. Kennedy had him grabbed by the legs, and sitting on him and holding him down, grabbed by her hand. And I said to Mr. Kennedy: 'Please let him get up.' * * * And when he got up he ran out towards the dining room, and they knocked me down, some of them. I don't know whether it was Mrs. Kennedy or Mr. Kennedy. They shoved up against me, I guess, and I fell down near the sink." She says after her son got up from the lounge he started to run out through the dining room, and Mr. Kennedy and Mrs. Kennedy followed. She stayed in the kitchen, and did not see the occurrence in reference to the throwing of the lamp or the burning of Mrs. Kennedy, except when she was brought back into the kitchen and laid on the lounge. Kennedy and the defendant are the only witnesses to the act that caused Mrs. Kennedy's death. In Kennedy's testimony he says: "My hat dropped off in the scuffle putting him on the lounge, and I stooped down to look for my hat. I was about to leave at that time. My wife had the children dressed, and we were about to leave, and I thought everything would be all right, and we were going out. And so all at once I heard his mother exclaim, 'For God's sake, Connie, don't throw that lamp.' That drawed my attention, and I turned around without picking up my hat, and I saw him in the dining room with a small lamp in his hand. * * * When I first saw him he had a small lamp in his hand. And then there was a bright light in the dining room as if the lamp had exploded—overturned or something—and then my mind was on the children, because I knew that they were in there dressed. And then he came forward to the end of the dining room table—that would be on the north end—and he grasped the large lamp in his right hand and picked it up in this manner (showing), and he caught it in his left hand as if to unscrew it. And he threw it right forward in the line of my wife. She was going forward and going into the dining room at the time from the kitchen. The lamp struck her —must have struck her in the face. She received the contents of the coal oil right over her face and arms here, on her waist here (showing), and of course it burned her in such a manner that she only lived— She died inside of six days afterwards." In the defendant's version of the transaction he says that after he got up from the lounge he went out of the kitchen into the dining room, and that Kennedy followed him, and "he either tripped me or I tripped myself, and I grabbed at the door and fell over on the table and knocked the lamp over, and when I reached for the lamp with my left hand the position of the table was such that anybody in the kitchen would be directly back, and not in front of me or to the side of me. This door was just as it is now. I mean the position it is in now. I caught hold of the lamp with my left hand. The oil ran out and burned me, and I tried to right the lamp. That was my intention—to right the lamp—and, when my hand took fire and a portion of my coat, I threw the lamp from me and kept on going. I didn't stop. I did not take the lamp up in my hand and throw it."

The testimony of Kennedy and the defendant are in direct conflict. That of Kennedy seems to be supported by the circumstances surrounding the transaction, and was accepted by the jury in rendering their verdict. The appeal in this case is based upon the refusal of the court to give four different instructions requested by the defendant, numbered 8, 9, 13, and 16. These, in their order, are as follows, with the indorsement of the judge of the trial court giving reasons for the refusal to give them: "(8) When the defendant interposed his plea of not guilty, he put in issue every fact necessary to establish his guilt. Therefore if you believe, under all the evidence, that in what he did he acted in self-defense, believing as a reasonable man that he was then and there in imminent danger of death or great bodily harm, your verdict should be not guilty. (Refused—no claim of self-defense either in the evidence or the theories of the parties; calculated to mislead the jury; contravenes defendant's proposed instructions Nos. 10 and 11, which were properly requested and pertinently given.)" Instructions Nos. 10 and 11, referred to, are as follows: "(10) If there is a reasonable doubt whether the defendant threw the lamp in this case, your verdict should be not guilty. (11) If you are in reasonable doubt whether the defendant intended to throw the lamp at anybody, your verdict should be not guilty." Instructions 9, 13, and 16, refused by the court, are as follows: "(9) If the evidence shows that the defendant, in his own house, while not assaulting nor threatening the life of anybody, nor threatening nor attempting to do bodily harm, was assaulted and thrown down, he had the right to resist such assault with all the force in his power, even to the extent of taking life. (Refused, for the same reasons as given in refusing defendant's proposed instruction No. 8.)" "(13) If you believe the defendant threw the lamp at Mr. Kennedy, and in such throwing was acting in self-defense, your verdict should be not guilty, no matter how serious the consequences may have resulted to anybody else. (Refused; no claim in the evidence that the defendant acted in self-defense; incorrect as a statement of the law thereof; leaves out the element whether the action of the defendant in throwing the lamp, if he did throw it in self-defense, was proportioned to the danger presented, real or apparent. See annotation to defendant's proposed instruction No. 12.)" "(16) When the defendant interposed his plea of not guilty, he thereby put in issue every fact necessary to establish guilt. [Therefore, if you believe from the testimony that the defendant was assaulted by Mr. Kennedy in the dining room and thrown with force and violence on the lounge in the kitchen; that defendant struggled to free himself from Kennedy; that he succeeded in getting up, and then ran out of the kitchen; that Kennedy pursued him, and while in hot pursuit caught up with the defendant at or close to the dining-room table; that thereupon the defendant feared and had good reason to fear that he was in imminent danger of great bodily harm at the hands of Kennedy—then I charge you that under such circumstances the defendant would be justified in defending himself against Kennedy by any and every means within his power. And if in so doing a lamp was thrown, and Mrs. Kennedy received burns which resulted in her death, the defendant would not be responsible therefor.] (First sentence given. Portion in brackets refused—calculated to confuse and mislead jury in the light of the evidence; no such state of facts contained in the evidence; it is not contended that the defendant acted in self-defense; incorrect as a statement of the law thereof; leaves out the element as to whether the action of the defendant in throwing the lamp, if he did throw it in self-defense, was proportioned to the danger presented, real or apparent; and for reasons assigned in refusing defendant's proposed instruction No. 12.)"

It is hardly necessary to add anything to what is said by his honor the judge of the lower court in refusing the instructions in question. The charges of the court and instructions given are 30 in number, and cover every point necessary to be presented to the jury to aid them in arriving at a proper verdict upon the testimony introduced before them. Appellant in his brief claims the defense was twofold, and says: "The whole force of this twofold defense * * * was taken away by the wholesale refusal and modification of defendant's instructions, and by the ruling of the lower court which prevented defendant from proving that he acted in self-defense." There is nothing in the testimony showing that the defendant was acting in self-defense. According to his testimony, it was accidental. According to the testimony of Mr. Kennedy, he purposely threw the lamp on Mrs. Kennedy, which caused her death. The trial court should only give such instructions as are applicable to the evidence in the case. The court is not required, nor would it be proper, to give instructions applicable to some theory that might be advanced, but which theory is entirely outside of the case, as shown by the evidence.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ANTONY. (Cr. 1,187.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY — CRIMINAL APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—NEW TRIAL —STATUTES—JURY—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE OUT OF COURT.

1. Where the theory of the prosecution on a trial for homicide was that the murder had been committed in defendant's kitchen by the defendant about 1 o'clock on a particular day, and that defendant's wife had participated in it, any error in permitting a witness to state the appearance of defendant's wife when the defendant and his wife called at the house of the witness at about 3 o'clock of the day in question was harmless as to defendant, the answer being that "she looked all right."

2. On a prosecution for homicide, the admission of a trunk belonging to defendant's wife was not erroneous, it appearing that the trunk was used by both; and especially where the offer did not so much relate to the trunk as to its contents, which consisted in part of bloodstained garments of defendant, found therein, and which were offered in evidence.

3. Where the theory of the prosecution on a trial for homicide was that the motive for the murder was robbery, and that it was participated in by defendant and his wife, the admission of evidence that, after the defendant and his wife were arrested and they were locked up. the officer entered the wife's cell and took off her shoe and found concealed in her stocking a pouch containing money, in addition to some taken from defendant, was not prejudicial to defendant; it appearing that, subsequent to the search of his wife, defendant had said that all of the money was his.

4. On a prosecution for homicide, certain diagrams of the premises where the killing occurred were introduced in evidence without objection, and were tacked to a blackboard in view of the jury. During a recess, one of the jurors left the jury box and stepped over and casually inspected the diagrams. Held no ground for new trial under Pen. Code, § 1181, subd. 2, forbidding the jury to receive evidence out of court other than that resulting from a view of the premises, as against an objection that the diagrams purported to represent not only the house in which the homicide occurred, but the surrounding premises, including an outhouse or closet in which was found some of the material objects introduced in evidence, and that there was also on the diagrams the representation of a building occupied by other parties; there being no suggestion as to what the "surrounding premises" were, or what the "building occupied by parties other than the defendant" was, and there being no question as to the other portions of the diagram having been accurately represented.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Miguel Antony was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John L. Campbell and John Brown, Jr., for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

LORIGAN, J. The appellant and one Trinidad Figeroa were jointly charged by information with the murder of one Lee Gar, at Needles, in San Bernardino county. Appellant demanded a separate trial, was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is not claimed on this appeal that the evidence was not sufficient to sustain the verdict, but it is insisted that a reversal should be had on account of certain alleged errors committed by the lower court in its rulings during the trial, and upon other grounds specially assigned.

A general statement of the facts will serve to illustrate these points as we take them up. The appellant and Trinidad Figeroa, his wife, both dissolute characters, in company with Victor Montajo and Maria Candalaria, arrived at Needles about a month prior to December 20, 1903, the date on which the murder took place. When they arrived at Needles the appellant had but five dollars, of which he gave his wife two, for the purpose of hiring a "crib" for herself and the woman Maria. About a week thereafter appellant and his wife rented a small house in what is characterized by the witnesses as the "Redlight District" of the town, and lived there together until they left Needles, on the night of the day on which the murder with which they are charged was committed. There resided at Needles a Chinaman named Lee Gar, who conducted a laundry, and whose custom it was to call at the house of defendant every Sunday for the washing. On Saturday, the day prior to the murder, Lee Gar was paid $250 in gold, which he placed in his purse with other gold coin contained therein, and it was shown that on Sunday morning, after paying out $30 from this purse, he still had a good deal of gold money in it. On this Sunday—December 20, 1903—Lee Gar took his lunch at a Chinese restaurant in the town, and about 12 o'clock left the restaurant, and was not again seen alive. About half past 12 of that day the woman Maria Candalaria went over to the house occupied by defendant and his wife to return a borrowed hatchet. Before she reached the door defendant's wife came out, took the hatchet from her, placed it on the porch, and, directing Maria to come with her, started away from the premises. Maria inquired of her why it was she did not let her in the house, to which she responded that her husband was taking a bath. At 7 o'clock in the evening an officer called at the house of defendant, inquired about Lee Gar, and was told by defendant's wife that he had not been there that day, and that she did not expect him until the next day. During his visit he observed that a piece of matting had been cut away from the kitchen floor. Late that night the defendant and his wife left Needles for San Francisco, taking with them a trunk, which was checked by the wife on her ticket, and on the afternoon of December 21st they were both taken into custody on the train at Bakersfield. About 8 o'clock on Monday morning, December 21st, the body of Lee Gar, with the throat cut, was found by searchers, shallowly buried beneath a mound of sand back of a water-closet on the premises which had been occupied by defendant. There was nothing found in his pockets except a silver watch, 25 cents in money, and a bunch of keys. In the vault of the closet was found a roll of matting tied with shoe strings. This piece was similar to that with which the kitchen floor of the house occupied by defendant was covered, and was undoubtedly cut from it. This roll when opened was found clotted with blood, and within its folds was found a razor, also covered with blood, and evidently the weapon with which the murder had been committed. Blood stains were also found in the kitchen in the vicinity of where the matting had been cut out. In the vault was also found the purse in which the deceased carried his money, but empty. In the trunk which had been checked to San Francisco were found a pair of pants, an undershirt, shoes, and other articles admitted to belong to defendant, stained with human blood. This recital does not contain all the incriminating evidence against the defendant appearing in the record, but is sufficient to present the general features of the case, to be supplemented by reference to other items, if necessary, as the points made are discussed. There is nothing in the bill of exceptions showing that any evidence was offered on behalf of defendant. Now, as to the points urged for reversal.

1. The woman Maria Candalaria was called as a witness, and testified that about 3 o'clock in the afternoon of Sunday, December 20th, the defendant and his wife called at her house. She was asked as to the appearance of defendant's wife when they arrived—how she looked. That the court permitted this inquiry, over the objection of counsel for the defendant, is urged as error. The theory of the prosecution was that the murder had been committed in the kitchen by the defendant, somewhere about 1 o'clock on this Sunday, and that his wife had participated in it, and the question was doubtless asked with a view of showing from her appearance a consciousness of guilt. But, if it be conceded that the question was improper, the defendant was not injured by it, because the witness answered that "she looked all right." The error, assuming it was such, was harmless.

2. It is insisted that the court erred in admitting in evidence the trunk which defendant's wife had checked to San Francisco. The point is that it was his wife's trunk, and that its admission had no bearing in the case. There is no merit in this claim. The evidence shows it was used by both parties, but, aside from this, the offer did not so much relate to the trunk as to its contents, which consisted in part of the blood-stained garments of defendant which were found therein, as heretofore stated, and which were offered in evidence.

3. Objections were made to inquiries as to when a certain train left Needles on the night of December 20th, and whether defendant's wife was seen at the depot on the evening of that day. This may or may not have been material, but, if it was not, it is difficult to perceive how defendant was injured by it. It is shown, without objection, that his wife was at the depot that evening, purchased a ticket, checked the trunk on it, and was in the company of the defendant when arrested at Bakersfield.

4. When the officer arrested defendant and his wife at Bakersfield, he took them to the county jail and searched them. He found on the person of defendant a canvas or buckskin sack purse containing $80 in gold and less than $5 in silver, and in the hand purse of his wife $16 or $18. After locking them up, he entered the cell occupied by the defendant's wife, took off her shoe, and found concealed in her stocking a buckskin pouch containing $60 or $70. Counsel for defendant objected to the testimony relative to the last search and the discovery of this money on the person of the wife, and insisted that it was error on the part of the court to have permitted its introduction. But when we consider the evidence in the case before the jury up to this point, we do not think the defendant was prejudiced by the testimony relative to this search, or that he has any cause to complain of it. The evidence at this stage of the case showed that the defendant and his wife had been arrested and lodged in jail at Bakersfield; that when Mr. Lane and Mr. Medlin, officers of San Bernardino county, went to the county jail at Bakersfield in Kern county to bring defendant and his wife to San Bernardino county, they brought back two bags of money which the sheriff of Kern county delivered to them, together with the prisoners. These bags were delivered to the jailer of the county jail of San Bernardino county when the defendant and his wife were surrendered to him by Lane and Medlin, and when called as a witness the jailer testified: "The money that I received from Mr. Lane and Mr. Medlin consisted of three $20 pieces, four $10's and eleven $5 pieces, and some silver, amounting altogether to $167.70. The money was in two different bags, and the amount was about equally divided between them. I had a conversation with the defendant, either the same day he came or the next day after, about this money, and he said it was his money." The theory of the prosecution was that the motive for the murder of deceased was robbery. In support of that theory the state had introduced evidence tending to show the possession by deceased, on the day he was murdered, of a large sum of money; that the purse in which he carried this money was found empty in the vicinity of where his body was buried; that defendant had but $5 when he reached Needles; that shortly after his arrival there he began to work in the roundhouse of the railroad company, and had worked there until December 15th, when he quit. It was proper to show, under these circumstances, that when arrested the next day the defendant was in possession of a large sum of money independent of the $41.40 which the tickets for himself and wife from Needles to San Francisco had cost. The jury would have a right, with this evidence before them, to determine whether it had a tendency, taken in connection with the other evidence in the case, to connect the defendant directly with the perpetration of the crime with which he was charged, and also to disclose a motive for its commission, and, in that regard, it was for the jury to determine whether the money which was in possession of the defendant on the day succeeding the killing of Lee Gar was the fruits of his murder. Having admitted the possession of this money, the testimony objected to only went to show the circumstances under which it was found. That testimony showed that part of it was in his immediate possession; part of it secreted about the person of his wife. The fact that she was in possession of a portion of it, under his statement that the aggregate amount taken into possession by the jailer at Bakersfield was his, did not affect the right of the state to prove the circumstances under which it was taken into possession by the officers. As far as defendant was concerned, having previously admitted that all of it was his, the proof of possession by his wife at the time of her arrest of a portion of it only tended to show that he had delivered it to her for secretion or custody.

5. The next error assigned is in denying defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground "that the jury received evidence out of court other than that resulting from a view of the premises," in violation of subdivision 2 of section 1181 of the Penal Code. It appears that after the noon recess of court, and on the last day of the trial, while the jury and counsel for both sides were awaiting the arrival of the judge to resume the session, one of the jurors left the jury box and stepped over and casually inspected a couple of diagrams which upon the first day of the trial had been admitted in evidence and were tacked to a blackboard in view of the jury. These diagrams purported to show the house where defendant resided when the murder was committed, and the location of certain articles of furniture therein; also the location of an adjoining house, and the location of the closet behind which the body of the deceased was found. There are no copies of the diagram in the record, but the testimony of the draftsman who made them showed what was intended to be represented upon them. These diagrams were admitted in evidence without objection, and there was no suggestion made that they did not accurately and properly show upon their face everything that they purported to represent. During the trial they were constantly referred to by the witnesses in the case, and the objects and articles shown upon them were pointed out and referred to for the benefit of the jury, without any objection thereto upon defendant's part. It is unnecessary to discuss whether, under these circumstances, the jury had not the right to examine the diagrams, because, even if they did not, it is not shown in what possible way the inspection of them by the juror, as complained of, could have injuriously affected the defendant. Counsel in his affidavit stated that the diagrams purported to represent "not only the house in which the homicide occurred, but the surrounding premises, including an outhouse or closet in which was found some of the material objects introduced in evidence; that there was also upon such diagram represented a building occupied by parties other than defendant." As far as the location of the closet is concerned, there is no question but what it was accurately indicated upon the diagram, and was frequently referred to and pointed out by witnesses during the trial, and it cannot be claimed that by looking at the diagrams the juror obtained any additional evidence relative to it. It is not suggested what the "surrounding premises" were, or what the "building occupied by parties other than the defendant" was, or how the delineation of these things upon the diagrams, and the inspection of those diagrams by the juror, could have affected the defendant. For aught that appears, it was pertinent and material to a proper presentation of the case upon the part of the prosecution that the situation of surrounding premises, and other buildings in proximity to the house occupied by defendant, should be shown on the diagrams, so that evidence produced before the jury relative to them might be clearly illustrated and understood. An examination of the bill of exceptions shows that testimony relative to premises other than those occupied by the defendant, and relative to other buildings than the house he lived in, was given in the case without objection, and was pertinent evidence. Now if, aside from these surroundings and buildings so testified to, there were other premises or buildings indicated upon the map, concerning which no testimony was given and which the inspecting juror should not have seen, it was incumbent on defendant, in support of his motion upon the ground urged, to show that from an inspection of the diagrams by the juror he received evidence of something that had not already been testified to, or that he acquired thereby some additional evidence. It was necessary to make such a showing in order to authorize the court to award a new trial upon the ground urged, and, having failed to make it, for that reason alone the motion was properly denied.

6. The last point urged by appellant is that certain objects introduced in evidence during the trial—the blood-stained clothing of defendant, the matting and razor found in the closet, etc.—were not properly before the jury for consideration, or use by the district attorney during his argument, because, when offered and received in evidence, they were not then "exhibited to the jury," within the provisions of section 1954 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There is nothing in this point, and it is made in face of the record, which shows explicitly that they were so exhibited.

We have discussed and disposed of every point made by appellant, and, finding no error in the record, the judgment and order are affirmed.

BUTLER v. GRAND LODGE A. O. U. W. OF CALIFORNIA. (Sac. 1,112.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—ASSESSMENTS—FAILURE TO PAY—SUSPENSION—REINSTATEMENT — REQUISITES — VOTE OF SOCIETY—BY-LAWS—CONSTRUCTION.

1. The by-laws of a mutual benefit association provided for suspension of a benefit certificate for nonpayment of premium, but provided for renewal within three months, "in case the member be living," on payment of all assessments pending, provided the lodge by a majority vote declared the member's certificate renewed, and that if the lodge should refuse to renew his certificate the moneys paid should be returned, after which no further application by the member should be entertained for six months. Held that, where the member's certificate was suspended for failure to pay an assessment levied, a vote of the lodge reinstating him, as well as payment of matured assessments, was essential to the renewal of his certificate.

2. Such by-laws contemplated that the vote of reinstatement should be taken during the life of the member, and, he having died prior to the next meeting of the lodge after payment of his matured assessments, failure of the lodge at such meeting to pass on his reinstatement could not avail the beneficiary.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Roxanna L. Butler against the Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen of California. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bruner & Bros. and Joseph Abrams, for appellant. William H. Jordan and D. S. Hirshberg, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to recover upon a beneficiary certificate issued by defendant corporation to Stephen W. Butler, and payable to plaintiff, his wife, upon his death.

Defendant is a corporation, fraternal in character, organized for the promotion of the welfare of its members and for the protection of their families. It has numerous subordinate lodges under its jurisdiction and control. Said Butler was at the time of his death, December 15, 1898, a master workman degree member of a subordinate lodge of defendant, known as "Sacramento Lodge, No. 80," and had been such a member for many years. There had been, in July, 1885, issued to him as such member, by defendant, the beneficiary certificate in suit. This certificate stated that as such member he was entitled to participate in the beneficiary fund of the order to the amount of $2,000, payable upon his death to his wife, the plaintiff. The certificate stated that it was issued upon the express condition that he should in every particular, while a member of the order, comply with all the laws, rules, and requirements thereof. In his application for such certificate, Butler stated that such compliance was the express condition upon which he is to be entitled to participate in such beneficiary fund. The law relating to such fund provided that, upon the death of a member in good standing, his nominee should be entitled to receive therefrom the amount due under the certificate, provided that said member had fully complied with all the laws, rules, and regulations of the order, and particularly with the conditions relative to the payment of assessments. The beneficiary fund referred to was one created and kept in existence by contributions from all the members of the order, made at such time as the said order by its laws and regulations required, and denominated "assessments," and was under the exclusive control and management of defendant grand lodge. From this fund is paid the amounts due on all beneficiary certificates. The laws of the order provided for the assessment of all the members for the purpose of paying death losses. According thereto, when an assessment was levied, it was payable on or before the 28th day of the month, and if not then paid it became delinquent. The law provided as follows, viz.:

"Section 42t. Suspension of Members for Non-Payment. The beneficiary certificate of each member who has not paid such assessment or assessments to the financier of his lodge, the only authorized officer to receive and receipt for all assessments and dues, on or before the 28th of said month, shall by the fact of such non-payment to said financier stand suspended, and no action upon the part of the lodge, or any officer thereof, shall be required as essential to such suspension."

It was further provided as follows in section 42, "u" and "w":

"(u) Renewal of Beneficiary Certificate within Three Months. Any beneficiary certificate suspended by reason of non-payment of assessments thereon may be renewed, if the member be living, at any time within a period of three months from the date of such suspension upon the following conditions and none other; that is to say:

"(1) All assessments that have been made during that time, including the pending assessments, shall be paid, and also any relief fund assessments due.

"(2) This fact shall be reported to the lodge at a stated meeting.

"(3) The lodge may, by a majority vote, declare said certificate renewed. When all these conditions have been complied with, the beneficiary certificate shall be held as renewed and in full force, and not before. Should the lodge refuse to renew said certificate, all moneys paid (as provided in subdivision 1) shall be returned to the member immediately, and no other application shall be entertained for the period of six months.

"(w) Agency of Officers. The officers of subordinate lodges shall be and are the agents of the members of the lodge to which they belong, in the transaction of all the official business required of them by this Constitution, and are not the agents of the Grand Lodge."

On November 1, 1898, defendant regularly levied and gave notice of an assessment upon all of its members. This assessment became delinquent on November 28, 1898. Butler failed to pay the same. After the same had become delinquent, namely, on December 12, 1898, as stated by appellant, plaintiff, acting for Butler, paid to the financier of said Sacramento Lodge, at his place of business, the amount of the assessment, together with the amount of a subsequent assessment which had accrued. Subsequent to such payment to said financier, and prior to the next meeting of Sacramento Lodge, namely, on December 15, 1898, Butler died. The facts of the payment to the financier and the death of Butler were reported to said lodge at its next meeting succeeding the receipt by such officer of the money, but the lodge did not at such meeting, or at any other meeting, by a majority vote, declare such certificate renewed.

The trial court found that by reason of the failure to pay the assessment on or before November 28, 1898, the beneficiary certificate of Butler became suspended, and was never reinstated in the manner provided by the laws of defendant, and that, by reason of such suspension, plaintiff was not entitled to participate in the beneficiary fund. Judgment, therefore, went for defendant, and plaintiff appeals therefrom upon the judgment roll. The findings of the trial court disclose the facts hereinbefore stated.

The laws of defendant constituted a part of the contract between Butler and defendant. The plain effect of those laws was to make the right of a member to participate, through his nominee, in the beneficiary fund, dependent upon the standing of his beneficiary certificate at the time of his death. It is admitted by appellant that under these laws Butler's failure to pay the November assessment on or before November 28, 1898, had the effect of suspending his beneficiary certificate. No action upon the part of the lodge or any officer thereof was essential to such suspension, but the failure to pay ipso facto operated as a suspension. Such was the plain provision of defendant's law. See Marshall v. Grand Lodge, 133 Cal. 686, 66 Pac. 25; Carlson v. Supreme Council, 115 Cal. 466, 474, 47 Pac. 375, 35 L. R. A. 643; Bacon on Benefit Societies, § 385. He had failed to comply with all the laws, rules, and regulations of the order, and the effect thereof was, under his contract, suspension of his certificate. While Butler was still a master workman degree member, as found by the court, he was no longer a member entitled to participate in the beneficiary fund, and could not, under the terms of this contract, become entitled to so participate, until his suspension had been set aside and his certificate had been renewed in conformity with the rules of the order. Bacon on Benefit Societies, § 385; Carlson v. Supreme Council, supra; McDonald v. Chosen Friends, 78 Cal. 49, 54, 20 Pac. 41.

The question, then, is as to whether the suspension had been so set aside and the certificate renewed, at the time of his death. The laws of the defendant prescribe the conditions essential to reinstatement and renewal in plain and unequivocal language. There must be not only payment by the delinquent of all assessments to the financier of the lodge, but, such payment having been reported to the lodge at a stated meeting, there must be a majority vote of the lodge declaring such renewal. The law of the order, which was the contract of the parties, declared that "when all these conditions have been complied with, the beneficiary certificate shall be held as renewed and in full force, and not before." The affirmative vote of the lodge declaring a renewal is expressly made as essential to a renewal, as is the payment of the assessments, and until such vote there is no renewal. It was entirely within the power of the parties to agree as to the terms and conditions of reinstatement. The question in such case is as to what the agreement of the parties was, and, where the language of the agreement is clear and unequivocal, the courts have no choice but to enforce the contract as it is written. The agreement here was that the certificate should be held as renewed only when the lodge, by a majority vote, declared it renewed, and not before. As Butler died before the first meeting of the lodge following the payment to the financier, it seems very clear that the suspension of his certificate had not been set aside at the time of his death.

It is declared by Mr. Bacon, in his work on Benefit Societies, that the view generally sustained by the authorities is that, where a suspension attaches, by operation of law, upon an event named, and the member dies before the suspension has been set aside, there can be no recovery upon his benefit certificate (section 385); and, further, that, "if a member neglects to become reinstated during his lifetime, he cannot be reinstated after his death, though the period in which he might be reinstated, if living, has not expired" (section 385b). In Carlson v. Supreme Council, supra, this court said that these views were sustained by the authorities, and held that where the sole condition of reinstatement was payment of arrearages within 60 days, and the member failed to avail himself of that right, and died before the expiration of the 60 days, he could not be reinstated after his death. In the case at bar, the member failed to make the necessary payments in time to enable the lodge to act prior to his death, upon what was, in effect, his application for reinstatement of his certificate. Such action by the lodge, as we have seen, was essential to such reinstatement, and, there having been no opportunity for the lodge to act prior to his death, he died before the suspension had been removed. It is entirely immaterial here what would have been the situation had Butler lived until the meeting of the lodge, and it had arbitrarily refused to restore him, or had arbitrarily refused to take any action in his case. Under the terms of the contract, there could not possibly be a reinstatement of the certificate prior to the stated meeting of the lodge following the payment.

The provisions of defendant's laws already quoted show very clearly that it was the express agreement of the parties that a beneficiary certificate could be reinstated and renewed only during the life of the member. The language is that it "may be renewed, if the member be living * * * upon the following conditions and none other; that is to say"—and then follows, in three separately numbered paragraphs, the enumeration of the various conditions already specified, including the report to the lodge at a stated meeting, and the declaration of renewal by the lodge by a majority vote. The phrase "if the member be living" applies with equal force to each of the specified conditions, and it was thereunder essential to the renewal of the certificate by the lodge that the member be living at the time the renewal is effected and the certificate reinstated.

As stated before, the question as to what would have been the situation had Butler lived until the first meeting of the lodge following payment to the financier is immaterial here. It may be conceded, purely for the purposes of this case, that the lodge could not then have arbitrarily refused to take action on his application or renew his certificate. As to this we express no opinion. If, however, this be so, and the time had arrived during Butler's life when the lodge could and should have taken such action as he was entitled to, under his contract, looking to a renewal of the certificate, and had failed to so do, it may be that it could be held that he had at the time of his death acquired rights which could be enforced by his beneficiary after his death. This conclusion would, however, have to be based upon the theory that his certificate was in effect reinstated before his death, and was in full force at that time. In such case, it may be that his death prior to the formal declaration that he was entitled to have been reinstated during his life could not affect the right of his beneficiary to recover. Such a case was that of Van Houten v. Pine, 38 N. J. Eq. 72. In support of their contention that the death of Butler prior to the first meeting of the lodge at which the renewal could be effected is immaterial, counsel for appellant cite several cases. Those cases generally are not applicable under the facts of this case. In Connelly v. Masonic Mutual Benefit Association, 58 Conn. 558, 20 Atl. 671, 9 L. R. A. 428, 18 Am. St. Rep. 296, the question was as to whether the deceased had been legally suspended from the Masonic lodge, good standing in which was essential to any right under a benefit certificate, and the decision of the grand master declaring the suspension illegal, and reversing the judgment of the lodge, was not rendered until after the death. It was held that the death produced no change in the rights of the plaintiff to have the suspension set aside, if it was illegal. Substantially similar in principle is the case of Marck v. Supreme Lodge (C. C.) 29 Fed. 896. Our own case of Berlin v. Eureka Lodge K. P., 132 Cal. 294, 64 Pac. 254, was a case involving the question as to what amount of sick benefits has become due Berlin under the by-laws of the lodge, and it was held the death of Berlin pending his appeal to the grand lodge from the determination of his lodge did not affect the right of his representatives to have the appeal determined upon its merits, and that if the order refused to decide the matter upon the merits they could appeal to the courts. Such cases all have reference to the determination as to the status existing at the date of death, and do not in the slightest degree support the theory that there can be a reinstatement after death. The ruling in Jackson v. N. W. Mutual Relief Association, 78 Wis. 463, 47 N. W. 733, was based upon the conclusion that the insured was reinstated prior to death. The case of Grand Lodge v. Lachmann, 199 Ill. 140, 64 N. E. 1022, was decided upon a question of waiver. We cannot assent to what is said in the opinion, purely by way of argument, as to the vote of reinstatement by the lodge. The trouble with the plaintiff's case is that, at the time of the death of her husband, his beneficiary certificate had been suspended, and there had then been no reinstatement thereof. That was the status at the time of his death. Under the contract, there could be no reinstatement after death.

It is urged that the findings show that the lodge failed to take any action whatever after the death of Butler in relation to the matter of renewal, but retained the money paid, and that this constituted a waiver of the suspension on the part of defendant. If it be conceded that the findings show that the lodge did not take any vote upon the question of renewing the certificate, we do not see that it can avail plaintiff. His death having occurred prior to such meeting, the lodge was not authorized to renew the certificate. The proceedings for a renewal had ended with the death, and the failure of the lodge to say that it would not do what it could not do, under the law and the contract, cannot be held to indicate any intention on the part of the lodge to waive any rights of the defendant, even if the lodge could have waived any of such rights. See Marshall v. Grand Lodge, supra. Nor could such failure to act prejudice plaintiff in the slightest degree. An entirely different question would have been presented if Butler had been alive at the time of the meeting.

What became of the money properly received by the financier of the lodge during the life of Butler does not appear in the findings. There is nothing therein to compel the conclusion that it was retained by the lodge, or forwarded to the grand lodge and retained by it. There is nothing in the facts specified in the findings to indicate any waiver by either the subordinate or grand lodge, and we cannot assume the existence of facts in this behalf that are not shown. The findings, as they stand, cover all the issues and fully sustain the judgment. It is found that Butler did not comply with all the laws relative to the payment of assessments, and that his beneficiary certificate was by reason thereof suspended, and never reinstated during his lifetime, or at all. The more specific findings relied on by appellant are entirely consistent with this.

LOS ANGELES RY. CO. v. DAVIES et al.
(L. A. 1,312.)

ACTION BY CORPORATION—CAPACITY OF PLAINTIFF TO SUE—OBJECTION—HOW RAISED—GENERAL DEMURRER.

1. The objection that the complaint does not show that plaintiff is a corporation goes to want of capacity to sue, and is a ground for demurrer, under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 2, when such want of capacity "appears on the face" of the complaint, and is not raised by a general demurrer that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

2. If want of capacity of plaintiff to sue as a corporation does not "appear on the face" of the complaint, so as to be subject to demurrer on that ground, under Code Civ. Proc. § 430, subd. 2, that objection can be raised only by answer pursuant to section 433.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Railway Company, a corporation, against James M. Davies and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. G. Hentig and T. M. Stewart, for appellants. Bicknell, Gibson & Trask, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to quiet title to certain land. Defendants demurred to the complaint upon the general ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, no other ground of demurrer being stated. The demurrer was overruled. Defendants then answered, denying plaintiff's title to the land, and setting up title in themselves. The court found for the plaintiff, and rendered judgment accordingly. Defendants appealed from the judgment upon the judgment roll.

The only point made by appellants for a reversal is that the complaint does not contain an averment that plaintiff is a corporation. The fact as to this contention is that, while in the title of the case, as it appears at the commencement of the complaint, the plaintiff is designated as "a corporation," there is no averment in the body of the complaint of plaintiff's corporate existence. The court found that plaintiff was a corporation.

Waiving other questions discussed by counsel, we are satisfied that the point sought to be made by appellants is not raised by the general demurrer. The point that plaintiff was not a corporation goes only to its capacity to maintain an action, and not to the sufficiency of the facts averred to constitute the alleged cause of action; and therefore it could be raised by demurrer to the complaint only under subdivision 2 of section 430 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides as a cause of demurrer "that plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue," and then only where said want of capacity "appears on the face" of the complaint. If it does not so appear, the objection must be taken by answer pursuant to section 433.

There are some authorities which appear to support appellants' contention, and the principal one cited by them is Miller v. Pine Mining Co. (Idaho) 31 Pac. 803, 35 Am. St. Rep. 290; but in the notes to the case the author of the work, after expressing his disapproval of the doctrine announced therein, cites a multitude of cases holding the other way. We will notice only the first case cited by the author—Phœnix Bank v. Donnell, 40 N. Y. 410—because it has more than once been referred to and approved by this court. In that case there was no averment in the complaint that the plaintiff was a corporation, and it is not even called a corporation in the title, and the demurrer there was upon the ground that it appeared that "plaintiff has no legal capacity to sue," and also upon the general ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (Section 144 of the New York Code [Voorheis Code 1868] is the same as section 430 of our Code [Code Civ. Proc.] and section 147 the same as our section 433.) The demurrer was overruled in the lower court, and the judgment was affirmed in the Court of Appeals. As to the first ground of demurrer the court said: "All that the argument proves is that the complaint does not show upon its face, affirmatively, that the plaintiff has capacity to sue. But to sustain the demurrer the Code requires that it should appear upon its face that it had not such capacity, which in no respect appears. For aught appearing upon the face of the complaint, the plaintiff may be a corporation entitled to sue as such. Section 147 provides that, when any of the matters enumerated in section 144 do not appear upon the face of the complaint, the objection may be taken by answer. This would seem to indicate the proper practice with sufficient clearness. If it appears upon the face of the complaint that a plaintiff suing as a corporation is not such in fact, a demurrer is the proper remedy of the defendant under section 144. If the complaint does not show that the plaintiff is not a corporation on its face, the objection that it is not such must be taken by answer, under section 147. This would seem to render further discussion of the question unnecessary." With respect to the second ground of demurrer in that case—which is the only ground in the case at bar—the court says: "The appellant's counsel insists that, if the demurrer is not sustainable upon the second ground specified in section 144, it is upon the sixth. In this, the counsel is in error. That relates only to the statement of facts constituting the cause of action. If this statement fails to show a right of action, then a demurrer on this ground may be interposed. But it has no application to the capacity of the plaintiff to sue or to the other grounds of demurrer specified."

This case was expressly approved, and the rule there stated declared to be right, by this court in Swamp Land District No. 110 v. Feck, 60 Cal. 403. In that action the plaintiff was designated in the title of the case as "Swamp and Overflowed Land Reclamation District No. 110 of the State of California," but there was no averment in the complaint that plaintiff was ever a swamp and overflowed land district, and for this omission the complaint was demurred to because it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (There was also a second cause of demurrer—that two separate causes of action had been improperly united.) The court said: "The first ground of demurrer is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The objections specified are in substance that it does not appear from the complaint that the plaintiff was ever duly created a swamp and overflowed land district. That objection, however, if well taken, would go to the legal capacity of the plaintiff to sue, and not to the sufficiency of the facts stated to constitute a cause of action. Phœnix Bank v. Donnell, 40 N. Y. 410." And the court, following the New York case, said further: "A demurrer on the ground that the plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue would be bad, because it does not appear upon the face of the complaint that the plaintiff has not. It is not a good ground of demurrer that it does not appear in the complaint that the plaintiff has the legal capacity to sue. That omission can only be taken advantage of by answer. Code Civ. Proc. § 432; Phœnix Bank v. Donnell, supra." In Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. 195, the said case of Swamp Land District v. Feck is expressly approved, and quotations made from it which refer to Phœnix Bank v. Donnell; and the same thing occurs in Wilhoit v. Cunningham, 87 Cal. 458, 25 Pac. 675.

Appellant cites, as supporting a different rule, Oroville, etc., v. Plumas Co., 37 Cal. 360, Loup v. Cal. So. R. R. Co., 63 Cal. 97, and People v. C. P. R. R. Co., 83 Cal. 393, 23 Pac. 303. In the Oroville Case the legal existence of the plaintiff as a corporation was denied in the answer, and no question as to the sufficiency of the complaint was involved. In the Loup Case the author of the leading opinion, after holding that the demurrer to the complaint ought to have been sustained for various other reasons, merely adds, as a sort of further assurance, that "in the fourth count of the complaint there is no averment of the defendant's corporate existence"; but no one of the other justices concurred in that expression. In People v. C. P. R. R. Co., 83 Cal. 393, 23 Pac. 303, the writer of the main opinion, after holding that the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained upon various grounds which are elaborately discussed, does say that "an averment of defendant's corporate existence is necessary in every count of the complaint against a corporation"—citing the Loup Case; but there is no discussion of the question, and no reference to the cases above referred to, where the question was directly before the court and expressly adjudicated, approving and restating the rule announced in Phœnix Bank v. Donnell. The sentence quoted was not necessary to the decision, and it cannot be taken as overruling those cases. Moreover, Wilhoit v. Cunningham, 87 Cal. 458, 25 Pac. 675, was the latest declaration of the court on that subject. And we are satisfied that in Swamp Land District No. 110 v. Feck, 60 Cal. 403, and in the subsequent cases approving it above cited, the rule is correctly declared.

Under the above views, it is not necessary to consider respondent's discussion of "aider by verdict" and other points made by it.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1905.)

ADMINISTRATORS—BONDS—ADDITIONAL BONDS —RELEASE OF SURETIES.

1. The liability of the sureties on an administrator's bond cannot be terminated by the filing of a void bond as a substitute for the original.

2. Where, after the filing of an administrator's bond, one of the sureties became insolvent, and another bond was filed—the order of court accepting it reciting that it had been introduced as a substitute for the former bond, but ordering merely that the new bond be accepted—such new bond was cumulative, and not a substitute for the original bond, so as to terminate the liability of the sureties on that bond.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 1543, declaring that a release of one joint debtor does not extinguish the obligation of any of the others, an order releasing a surety on an administrator's bond, upon application of the heirs at law, does not release a co-surety, though Code Civ. Proc. § 1403, authorizes the release of a surety only on his own application.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by Elisa P. Elizalde, as administratrix, against P. W. Murphy and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant A. McAllister appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Shipsey, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

HARRISON, C. Action against the sureties upon an administrator's bond. In January, 1894, Ernest Graves was appointed by the superior court of Santa Barbara county administrator of the estate of Marcos A. Elizalde, deceased, and thereupon, and under the direction of the court, he, as principal, with Meyer Greenberg and A. McAllister as sureties, executed and filed therein a joint and several bond in the sum of $20,000, for his faithful discharge of the duties of his office. August 2, 1895, upon the petition of the heirs at law of the deceased, representing to the court that Meyer Greenberg had become insolvent, the administrator, as additional security for the faithful discharge of his trust, caused to be executed and filed in said court a further undertaking purporting to be for the sum of $20,000, in which he was named as principal and J. T. Murphy and the aforesaid A. McAllister were named as sureties, which was by the court approved and ordered to be accepted; and thereupon the court ordered that Meyer Greenberg, surety upon the former bond, be released from all liability thereafter to accrue. The court finds that this undertaking was originally made and signed by McAllister for the sum of $4,000, but that before it was approved and filed it was altered and raised, without his consent or knowledge, so as to read in the sum of $20,000. November 16, 1898, J. T. Murphy, one of the sureties on this bond, died, and thereafter under an order of the court requiring the administrator to furnish additional security, he caused a further undertaking in the sum of $10,000 to be executed and filed, with himself as principal, and the defendants P. W. Murphy and Luigi Marre as sureties. Graves filed an annual account of his administration May 28, 1898, which was duly settled by the court, and subsequent thereto received and paid out certain moneys for the estate, and died insolvent July 15, 1900, without rendering any account thereof, or any further account of his administration of the estate. After his death the respondent herein was appointed as his successor in the administration of the estate, and brought the present action against the defendants, as sureties upon the aforesaid undertakings, for an accounting, and to recover the amount of money belonging to the estate which should have been in the hands of Graves at the time of his death. The court found that Graves had received of money belonging to the estate the sum of $3,011, no part of which had been paid out or accounted for by him, and rendered judgment against the defendants therefor. From this judgment the defendant McAllister has appealed, bringing the appeal here upon the judgment roll, without any bill of exceptions.

The appellant is not a party to the bond filed after the death of J. T. Murphy in 1898, and, as the court found that he did not sign or execute the bond of $20,000, filed in August, 1895, which is set forth in the complaint, his liability rests solely upon the bond filed upon the issuance of letters of administration in 1894. He contends that he is not liable upon this bond, for the reason that the bond in 1895 was taken as a substitute for this one, that for that reason there can be no liability against the parties thereto, and upon the further ground that the release of Greenberg as co-surety upon the original bond operated also to release him from all liability thereon.

The claim that the bond of 1895 was a "substitute" for the original bond of 1894 rests upon a recital in the order of the court accepting it that "it has been introduced as a substitute for the former bond," and upon the clause in the bond, "This bond to have force and effect from January 20, 1894." We have not been cited to any statutory provision authorizing the court to accept a subsequent bond of an administrator as a substitute for one previously executed, or with the effect of releasing the parties to the prior bond from all liability thereon; and in the present case the court did not direct that the bond should be a substitute for the original bond, but merely ordered "that said new bond be accepted." If, however, the bond, by reason of the alteration thereon, was void at the time this order was made, the basis for the order had no existence, and with it the order itself fell. The bond of 1895 is itself prospective in its terms and, in the absence of any words to the contrary, is to be regarded as cumulative. This consideration of its character is not impaired by the clause above quoted from the bond, but these words are more consistent with an intention on the part of the sureties to hold themselves bound for any delinquencies on the part of the administrator subsequent to the date of his appointment. The claim of the appellant is, moreover, refuted by the finding of the superior court that the allegation of the complaint that this bond was filed "as additional security" for the faithful discharge by the administrator of his trust is true.

The proposition in the appellants' brief that inasmuch as, under section 1403, Code Civ. Proc., the court is authorized to release a surety upon an administrator's bond only upon his own application therefor, and that its order in the present case releasing Greenberg, made upon the application of the heirs at law of the deceased, had the effect to release the appellant from all liability upon the bond, cannot be maintained. Section 1543 of the Civil Code declares, "A release of one of two or more joint debtors does not extinguish the obligation of any of the others." The provisions of this section are universal, and include all releases, whether resulting from operation of law, or by virtue of a statutory provision, or by the direct act of the party with whom or for whose benefit the obligation was entered into.

We are not required upon the present appeal to determine whether this order of the court had the effect to release Greenberg. If the order was without authority of the court to make it, it was nugatory. If it was within its jurisdiction, the liability of the appellant was not affected by it. Under section 1397, Code Civ. Proc., the heirs at law were authorized to ask for further security; and under section 1402, Code Civ. Proc., it was the duty of the court, whenever it came to its knowledge that the bond was insufficient, to require the administrator to file additional security. The court was therefore authorized to require an additional bond, and whether, after the representation as to his insolvency, such bond was given by the administrator voluntarily, or after an order requiring him to file it, does not affect the rights and liabilities of the appellant upon the original bond.

The judgment should be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1905.)

RAILROADS—CONSTRUCTION ALONG STREET—DAMAGES TO ABUTTING OWNER.

Damages special and peculiar to an abutting owner, authorizing recovery by him, may be caused by the construction of a railroad in a highway on his side of the street, and close to his property, though the rails are flush with the surface of the street, and the construction works no change of grade.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 18, Cent Dig. Eminent Domain, § 310.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; William S. Day, Judge.

Action by W. F. Smith against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Canfield & Starbuck, for appellant. Richards & Carrier, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover damages alleged to have been caused to certain land and premises of plaintiff by the construction and maintenance by defendant of a steam railroad along the public road or street upon which plaintiff's land abuts. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $350, and a judgment was rendered accordingly. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and brings up the evidence and rulings of the court in a bill of exceptions.

The main facts are these: Wallace avenue is a public highway in Santa Barbara county. It runs through the town of Summerland, and that part of it which lies within the town constitutes the principal street of said town. Plaintiff owns lots in the town abutting on said highway or street, and having a frontage thereon of 100 feet. The street lies on the south side of plaintiff's lots. About June, 1891, defendant constructed, and since then has maintained, along said street, a railroad track, upon which it operates a steam railroad; having been granted the right of way therefor by the board of supervisors. A part of this railroad runs along the entire frontage of plaintiff's lots, upon which he has a dwelling house and other buildings. The lots are on a level with the street, and the construction of the railroad does not change the grade of the street. The rails are flush with the surface of the street. The track in front of plaintiff's lots is constructed entirely on the north half of the street—the side next plaintiff's lots. It runs diagonally along the street at an angle to the front line of plaintiff's lots, and is nearer that line on the southwest corner of his lots than on the southeast corner. At the southwest corner the ends of the ties of the railroad are 10 feet from plaintiff's line, and on the northeast corner between 12 and 13 feet. The street is 60 feet wide. One of defendant's witnesses said: "I don't think it would be possible for a man crossing with a team up to Mr. Smith's place to hitch in front of his two western lots. Opposite the eastern lots he might, but it might not be a desirable place to hitch, though." The amount of damage found by the jury was fully sustained by the evidence, provided such damage was not damnum absque injuria. There are some other facts in the case which are commented on by counsel, but, in our opinion, they are not important.

The general principle applicable to a case like the one at bar is that, when a railroad is constructed and maintained along a highway in front of a man's land, the latter may recover damages of the railroad company for such destruction or impairment of his rights and easements in the public highway caused by the railroad as constitute damage peculiar to himself, and independent of such damage as he sustains in common with the public, but cannot recover damages for those general inconveniences which he is subjected to in common with the public. In the case at bar the contention of appellant for a reversal seems to rest on the proposition that because the rails of the track were flush with the surface of the ground, and the construction of the railroad track did not cause any change of grade, or compel respondent to go either up or down in getting from his land to the street, therefore, as a matter of law, respondent could not have suffered from its construction any damage peculiar to himself, and different from that felt or sustained by the public. But we do not think that this proposition is maintainable. We cannot say that, as a matter of law, the construction of the railroad so near the line of respondent's lots as to cause him inconvenience and obstacles spoken of by the witnesses, above mentioned, as well as other obstacles to the enjoyment of said lots that could readily be suggested, does not cause damage peculiar to respondent, and different from that suffered generally by the public. It is not a sufficient answer to say that it was necessary for appellant to build its track gradually across the street, and therefore to put part of it close to respondent's line. Whatever appellant's necessities were in the premises, if what it actually did caused special and peculiar damage to respondent, it is liable for such damage.

ADVERSE POSSESSION—"SUBSTANTIAL INCLOSURE"—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

1. In an action to quiet title, in which defendant claimed by adverse possession, evidence held to support a finding that the fence maintained by defendant during her occupancy was a "substantial inclosure," within Code Civ. Proc. § 323.

2. Breaches in an inclosure do not destroy its continuity, so as to prevent the acquisition of title by prescription, unless such breaches are permitted to remain for such length of time as to show that the occupant did not intend to continue the exclusive appropriation of the premises.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 1, Cent. Dig. Adverse Possession, § 101.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by John T. Jones against Cora S. Hodges and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. Lantz, for appellant. Walter L. King and Chas. L. Batcheller, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought against a number of defendants to quiet title to several lots in block 3 of the Malabar tract in South Pasadena, Los Angeles county. It was tried as to defendant Hodges, and relative to lot 31 of said block, and from a judgment in her favor, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

Defendant asserted title to the premises by adverse possession, based upon a claim that she had the lot protected by a substantial inclosure, and had paid all the taxes assessed upon it, for a much longer period than the statute required. The lower court found in her favor upon this plea, and whether this finding is sustained by the evidence presents the only point on appeal.

Defendant's predecessor, Mrs. Taylor, having in March, 1894, obtained a conveyance of this lot from one who claimed title to it under a tax deed, which is conceded to have been void, shortly thereafter built a fence around the premises. In March, 1897, defendant purchased the lot from Mrs. Taylor, and in June, 1898, built a small dwelling house thereon, and placed wire netting on the fence all around it. This action was commenced in April, 1901, some seven years after the original fence was constructed. It is insisted by appellant that the evidence was insufficient to show that defendant's predecessor, Mrs. Taylor, paid the taxes assessed upon the property for the years 1894 to 1897, both inclusive, or that the fence surrounding the lot, at the time of its construction and up to the time when defendant built the house on the lot and stretched the wire netting around the fence, was or remained a "substantial inclosure," within the meaning of section 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There seems to be no dispute as to the payment of taxes, or the substantiality of the fence, subsequent to these latter dates.

We think the evidence sufficiently shows the payment of taxes for the years in question by Mrs. Taylor, who then claimed the lot. While the evidence might have been more specific and definite on this point, we are not prepared to say it was not sufficient to support the finding of the court, particularly when there was no question in the case that the taxes for any of these years had not been paid, or that they were paid by any one other than Mrs. Taylor.

Now, as to whether the fence, as erected, was and remained a substantial inclosure. The evidence is indefinite as to its height, and conflicting as to the size of its posts, and the distance they were set apart. But there was evidence to warrant the court in finding that this fence was from four to five feet high, consisting of posts four by four inches in size, set five or eight feet apart, and had two rails, one by three inches, set, one near the top and the other near the bottom. It is insisted by appellant that in its original construction this fence did not constitute a substantial inclosure; that it was not sufficient to turn cattle, which is the usual test to be applied in determining whether an inclosure is substantial or not. But it cannot be said, as matter of law, that this fence was insufficient for that purpose. Whether it was or not was a question for the trial court to determine from all the evidence in the case. It is quite apparent from the record that, upon the trial, the evidence as to this fence was addressed almost exclusively towards proving the condition in which it stood during the three years subsequent to its construction; it being contended by appellant that it had become broken down and dilapidated, and suffered to remain in that condition for long intervals during that period. Very little evidence was introduced as to its stock-restraining sufficiency as originally constructed, but what little there was was in support of its effectiveness for that purpose, it being in evidence that it would turn a cow or horse unless "they would run into it in madness." There was no evidence on the part of the appellant that, as originally constructed, this fence was insufficient for that purpose; the evidence of his witnesses on that point was addressed to times when rails were temporarily off the fence, and not to its original construction.

It is claimed that in Polack v. McGrath, 32 Cal. 17-22, this court held that a fence similar to the one shown to have been erected by defendant's predecessor was not a substantial inclosure. But it appears that on the trial of that case in the lower court it was proved as a fact (which was not mentioned in that opinion) that the fence there referred to was not sufficient to turn cattle. See Polack v. McGrath, 38 Cal. 668.

As to the condition of the fence during these years in question: As we have said, the evidence in the case was mainly addressed to this point. It is quite conflicting, principally as to the extent to which the fence was out of repair, and as to the dates during which it was in such condition. In fact, as far as the evidence produced by appellant is concerned, it is very indefinite upon this latter point. It is conceded in this case that, when the small dwelling house was being built, the fence was down to permit of hauling in lumber, and the evidence as to it being out of repair can as well be applied to that period as to any prior time. There is, however, no doubt that at times during the years in question some of the rails were knocked off the fence; but the evidence satisfactorily shows that defendant and her predecessor were mindful at all times of keeping the fence in repair, and these breaches were repaired within a reasonable time after they occurred. It is true that, while the rails were off, cattle could have entered the premises, but this fact of itself would not be sufficient to break the continuity of defendant's possession. Breaches in an inclosure do not destroy its continuity, unless they are permitted to remain for such a length of time as to show that the defendant did not intend to continue the exclusive appropriation of the premises which its original construction indicated.

We are of the opinion that the evidence justified the findings of the lower court which are attacked, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

JOHNSTON et al. v. CALLAHAN. (Sac. 1,122.)

JUDGMENTS — DEFAULTS — NOTICE — RELIEF —APPEAL—MATTERS REVIEWABLE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 634, providing that findings of fact may be waived by failing to appear at the trial, and section 670, providing that the judgment roll, if the complaint is not answered, consists of the summons, with proof of service, the complaint, with a memorandum of default, and a copy of the judgment, an appeal from a default judgment must be determined on the pleadings and judgment alone, in the absence of a bill of exceptions or statement.

2. A rule of the superior court, relied upon in appellant's brief, cannot be considered, when not incorporated in the record.

3. A default judgment, reciting that it appeared to the court by satisfactory evidence that defendant was duly notified, more than five days before the trial, that the cause was set for trial on a day specified, showed a compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 594, requiring proof of five days' notice of trial of issues of fact to entitle the party to proceed with his case in the absence of the adverse party.

4. Relief from a judgment taken through mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect should be obtained by application to the lower court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, and not by an appeal on the judgment roll, when every presumption is resolved in favor of the regularity of the proceedings, unless some defect is disclosed in the record.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by James A. Johnston and another against D. T. Callahan. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur H. Barendt, for appellant. Tabor & Tabor, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal from the judgment of the superior court of Placer county. The action was for the recovery of $380.80 for goods sold and delivered, and work, labor, and services. It appears that the case was heard and judgment rendered in the absence of the defendant or his counsel, and in his appeal defendant's counsel says: "With a rush that was well-nigh indecent, and against the urgent protests of counsel for the defendant, the case was hurried to trial in the lower court, and judgment was entered against defendant. From this judgment, defendant appeals, and claims that it should be set aside: (1) Because no notice of motion to set for hearing was given, and there is no record of any such notice in the papers of the case on file in the superior court of Placer county. (2) Because no notice of the time fixed for hearing was given defendant and appellant, and there is no record of such notice in the papers in the case on file in the superior court of Placer county. (3) Because, on the assumption that an informal communication in a letter to the defendant's counsel may have been sufficient to put him on his guard, the notice therein conveyed was nevertheless too short. The defenses here offered may be technical, but are justifiable on the ground that they are the only resort against the injustice of what is commonly known as a 'snap judgment' taken by default."

There is no bill of exceptions or statement brought up with the judgment, and the appeal must be determined by what is disclosed in the judgment roll alone—that is, the pleadings and the judgment—as in this case a failure to appear on the part of defendant was a waiver of findings on his part. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 634, 670.

The complaint in the action was filed November 3, 1901, and the answer thereto April 21, 1902, and the trial was had June 2, 1902. In the judgment it is recited that: "It appearing to the court by competent and satisfactory evidence that the defendant was duly notified, more than five days prior to the 2d day of June, 1902, that the above-entitled cause was set for trial for Monday, June 2, 1902, at the hour of 10 o'clock, and that all the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint on file herein are true, and that the denials contained in the answer of defendant are untrue, it is ordered and adjudged," etc.

Appellant in the brief of his counsel copies what purports to be a rule of the superior court of Placer county in reference to giving notice to an adverse party of the trial of a cause, containing the following: "A party having a cause set for trial in the absence of the adverse party must see that the latter has reasonable notice of the time fixed." That rule of court, however, is no part of the record in this case, and cannot, therefore, be considered.

As already shown, the judgment recites that satisfactory evidence was before the court that defendant was notified, more than five days prior to the trial of the cause, that the same was set for trial on the day mentioned; and that is a compliance with the provisions of the Code on that subject. Code Civ. Proc. § 594.

If the judgment were taken against the defendant, either through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, he was furnished ample means for relief in the court below. Code Civ. Proc. § 473. It is worse than useless, however, to appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone, unless some defect is disclosed in the record, as every presumption and intendment is resolved in favor of the regularity of the proceeding in the court below.

The judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; F. H. Smith, Judge.

Action by Walter De Martini, as special administrator of the estate of Geralomo De Martini, deceased, against G. Allegretti and others. Giovanni De Martini and others intervened. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, Anna Basso, as administratrix of the estate of Luigi De Martini, deceased, and others, appeal. Affirmed.

Jos. F. Cavagnaro and Budd & Thompson, for appellants. Solinsky & Wehe, C. K. Bonestell, John O'Gara, Walter J. De Martini, and Nicol & Orr, for respondents. W. J. De Martini and John O'Gara, for interveners.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action by the administrator of the estate of Geralomo De Martini, deceased, to recover of the defendants G. Allegretti and G. B. De Martini certain money alleged to be the property of said estate in the hands of said defendants. Those two defendants, in their answer, admit the possession of the money and that they received it from the deceased, and aver their desire and readiness to pay it to whomsoever it belongs; but they say that certain other defendants named in the complaint assert ownership of said money, and they ask the court to determine to whom it should be paid. Other defendants claim to be entitled to the money by virtue of a certain written instrument hereinafter set forth, executed by the deceased on the 20th day of October, 1896, and bearing that date. There were also certain additional defendants and interveners in the case, who are heirs at law of the deceased, and who joined with plaintiff in claiming what is sought by the complaint. The court found that the money involved is the money of the estate, and rendered judgment accordingly for plaintiff. The said defendants who claim under said instrument of October 20, 1896, and who filed a cross-complaint, appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The material facts in the case are these. In May, 1895, the deceased had about $5,000 deposited in some of the savings banks of Stockton, which was not bringing much interest, and on the 23d of that month he drew the money from the banks and gave it to the defendants G. Allegretti and G. B. De Martini for the purpose of having them invest it for him so that it might produce a better income. They took the money and very successfully invested it for him in mortgages, taking the mortgages in their own names. They gave him from time to time whatever of the money he wanted. While this condition of affairs existed, the deceased, on October 20, 1896, made and delivered to them the written instrument under which appellants claim and which is as follows:

After the giving of this instrument the same condition of affairs continued until the death of the deceased, which occurred on the 19th day of February, 1902. They continued to give him whatever of the money he wanted, and had given him at the time of his death nearly $1,000. The deceased lived up in the mountain region, and the defendant Allegretti, on the witness stand, said: "Geralomo used to come down himself, and we paid money to him; and sometimes he wrote from the mountains, and we sent it up. The payments were made as set forth in our answer. Q. Was there at any time any limit placed upon the amount he should draw? A. There was no limit at all. He can draw it all." He testified further as follows: "Q. For whose use and benefit were you investing and keeping that money? A. Mr. De Martini. Q. Which De Martini? A. Geralomo De Martini." He also testified that the deceased made the instrument of October 20th to get rid of the necessity of probate proceedings. The foregoing was substantially all the evidence in the case. There was no question as to the correctness of the account rendered by said two defendants, or as to the amount of money left in their hands.

The appellants contend that by the said instrument of October 20, 1896, an interest in the money vested in appellants in præsenti, although the enjoyment was postponed until after the death of the deceased; while respondents contend that the instrument was not intended to pass, and did not pass, any present interest from the deceased to the appellants, but was only an attempt to make a disposition of the property to take effect after his death, which he could only have done by a properly executed will. Counsel on each side have argued the case with ability and learning, and have quoted and commented upon many leading authorities relating to the question; but we do not think that it would serve any useful purpose to review those authorities here. Each case cited depended upon its particular facts, and there is not much variance in the authorities as to the general principles of law applicable. It is sufficient for us to say what, in our opinion, is the legal effect of the particular facts in the case at bar with respect to the question here involved; and we think that the contention of respondent and the conclusion reached by the court below as to this question are right. The "surrounding circumstances" shown by the evidence certainly give no aid to appellants' contention; and, looking alone at the instrument in question, there is nothing to be seen in it which gives to appellants any present vested interest or estate in the property in contest. It merely gives direction to Allegretti and G. B. De Martini that, in the event of the death of the deceased, they shall then give whatever of his money they may still have in their hands to the appellants. Nothing is given them before the event of his death. This direction had no effect before his death, and it could not have effect after that event; for a disposition of property to take effect after death can be made only by an instrument executed in accordance with the statute of wills. The instrument, from beginning to end, is, on its face, clearly and entirely testamentary in character.

Appellants plead the statute of limitations. The action was commenced within two months after the death of the deceased, and we are unable to see any ground whatever for claiming that the action was barred, as to appellants, by any provision of the statute of limitations.

LAMBERT v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO.

(L. A. 1,294.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 7, 1905.)

RAILROADS—ACCIDENT AT CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DISCOVERED PERIL.

1. In an action against a railroad for injuries from a collision at a crossing, evidence held to show plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

2. Where plaintiff, who was injured at a railroad crossing, actually knew of the approach of the train when he was 450 feet from the crossing, failure of the engineer to sound the whistle or ring the bell had no causal connection with the ensuing collision.

3. Where those in charge of a locomotive saw plaintiff's team slowly approaching a crossing 150 feet away, they were not chargeable with negligence in failing to check the train, but were entitled to presume plaintiff would stop.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; W. S. Day, Judge.

Canfield & Starbuck, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was for damages. Plaintiff alleged that as he, with his wagon and two horses, was traveling on the public highway, at a point upon this highway in the town of Summerland where it crosses the defendant's railroad, the defendant negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully ran a locomotive onto plaintiff's horses and wagon, and the plaintiff, killing the horses, breaking the wagon, and injuring plaintiff himself. The defense pleaded both a general denial and contributory negligence. At the close of plaintiff's evidence, and again at the close of all the evidence, defendant moved for the dismissal of the action, or for a judgment of nonsuit, which motions were denied. From the judgment which was rendered upon the verdict of the jury in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals, and with its appeal presents a bill of exceptions.

The evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment, and defendant's motion should have been granted. As might be expected, the strongest testimony for the plaintiff is that given by himself, and from this it appears that at the time of the trial he was a farmer 67 years old, so deaf that he could not hear ordinary conversation, and his testimony was given by question and answer in writing. He had resided about a mile and a half from the town of Summerland for about 30 years. He had driven horses all his life, and at one time was a stage driver. One of his horses he had driven over this road daily for about 14 years. The other horse he had had a few months, and had driven him over the road in a buggy, but not very often. Neither had ever been frightened at the cars, and both had been near the cars. From the town of Summerland the railroad track and the main county road approach each other as one goes eastward at an acute angle, until, at a distance of about 700 feet from the post office, the highway crosses the railroad. The obstructions to the view of one traveling upon the highway are insignificant, the depot itself being the greatest of them, and one driving toward the crossing can, looking westward, easily see the track for from one-quarter to one-half a mile. To the left of the highway, and upon the side away from the track, at a point about opposite the crossing, is a road, and to the east of this road, and still opposite the crossing, the grade is such as easily to have permitted one to drive upon it, and thus avoid crossing the track. Upon the day of the accident plaintiff had stopped at the post office to secure his mail. He left the post office and started slowly toward the railroad. While driving along he was "glancing at the headlines of his newspaper * * * for a little way—for about 25 or 30 yards perhaps." When he had thus driven about 50 or 60 yards, "all of a sudden my horses became frightened and started off. I thought it was the cars, and I tried to hold them, which I was unable to do. When I had gone about 100 yards, I looked to see where the cars were. I saw them over my right shoulder. I saw the engine; didn't see the string of cars; just saw the engine. I was within about 30 or 35 yards of the crossing. I pulled on the horses with all the strength I had, but I couldn't hold them. They were soon on the track. There was no place where I could turn off—oil derricks to one side. When the engine come near to them, my horses started off on a trot. They continued to trot until the collision with the engine. The horses became frightened about 150 yards from the crossing as near as I could tell. I didn't hear no whistle or no bell. When I saw the engine, the bell was hanging still. I think I could have heard the bell if it had rung or the whistle if it had been sounded within 80 rods of the crossing. I have heard the whistle and heard the bell lots of times when I have been riding through Summerland before the accident. I could have heard the whistle or bell anywheres between the depot and the crossing." It appears from numerous eyewitnesses to the accident that the horses were "just trotting along" at a rate of from 4 to 6 miles per hour, while the speed of the train was about 20 miles an hour.

From plaintiff's own testimony, then, it appears that he became aware of the approach of the train when he was some 150 yards distant from the crossing, and that his horses proceeded to trot toward the crossing, and that he could not stop them. It further appears that he thus had 450 feet of distance to travel, with places and opportunity to have turned to the left, and thus to have avoided the accident. The only reason he could assign for not doing so is the presence of oil derricks; but it is made clearly to appear, as has been said, that there was a traveled street into which he could have turned, and that the condition of the land to the left of the highway was such that he could easily and with safety have driven his horses upon it. Besides the testimony of the plaintiff, there were three eyewitnesses to the accident called by him—Mr. Dewlaney, Mr. Hickey, and Mrs. Gibson. Mr. Dewlaney saw the plaintiff first when the latter was going east and was about 500 feet west of the crossing. Plaintiff's horses were "trotting along," and it did not occur to Mr. Dewlaney that there was any likelihood of the accident until the plaintiff had gone about 350 feet further, and was within 150 feet of the crossing; that knowing that the engine was approaching, and knowing that the plaintiff was deaf, and not having seen him look around, Mr. Dewlaney stood up, saying: "There is a man who is likely to get run into." He then watched the plaintiff from that time until the collision. The plaintiff did not change the speed at which his horses were still trotting along, "a slow gait of about five or six miles an hour," and there was nothing to indicate to Mr. Dewlaney that there was any likelihood of an accident beside the two facts that he knew the plaintiff was deaf and did not see him look around up to the time when the collision took place. When quite near the track the horses apparently became frightened, but, if the plaintiff had looked around, he would have seen the train, and would have had time to stop after Mr. Dewlaney had stood up and said the plaintiff was likely to get run into. Mr. Hickey, who was with Mr. Dewlaney, stood up and looked when Mr. Dewlaney made the remark that "there is a man who was likely to get run into," and saw the plaintiff when the latter was at a distance of about 150 feet from the crossing. He was driving along the road, at the rate of 5 or 6 miles an hour, and his horses were trotting. The train was making a good deal of noise, but Mr. Hickey, as well as Mr. Dewlaney, knew that the plaintiff was deaf, and plaintiff appeared to Mr. Hickey not to know that the train was approaching. Mrs. Gibson was picking flowers with her grandchild when she heard the rumble of the train. She looked up and was startled to see the plaintiff and the engine close together, just passing east of her. The collision took place almost immediately. Although she did not estimate the rate of speed of the plaintiff's horses, and could not say whether she could have seen any attempt on his part to stop them after he had passed by, she observed, as the plaintiff passed her, that the horses were "trotting along at an ordinary rate"—not running away, but "just trotting along as horses will," and that "they did not show any signs of fright or increase their speed materially as the engine came near." Nor did she see the plaintiff make any attempt to stop them. There was nothing to prevent the plaintiff from seeing a quarter of a mile westerly up the track, or from seeing the engine, which was so close when Mrs. Gibson looked up that she saw at once that the accident was inevitable, if he did not "cross the track before the engine could catch him." If, therefore, we are to accept plaintiff's testimony alone, then it appears that for 450 feet before reaching the crossing he knew that the train was approaching, and that he did not turn his horses, which were trotting at a speed of only 5 or 6 miles an hour, aside to a place of safety, as he could easily have done. If we are, however, to take the testimony of his own witnesses, then, himself a very deaf man, he deliberately drove his team upon the crossing, without looking to see whether or not a train was approaching, at a slow pace, in broad daylight, when the track was visible to him for more than a quarter of a mile. That such conduct constitutes contributory negligence, as a matter of law, is settled beyond peradventure. Flemming v. W. P. R. R. Co., 49 Cal. 253; Glascock v. C. P. R. R. Co., 73 Cal. 137, 14 Pac. 518; Hager v. S. P. Co., 98 Cal. 309, 33 Pac. 119; Herbert v. S. P. Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651; Green v. S. P. Co., 132 Cal. 254, 64 Pac. 255.

There is much testimony in the case to the effect that the bell was rung and the whistle blown; but, putting that aside and assuming that such was not the fact, yet as the only purpose was to give warning, and as plaintiff by his own testimony knew of the approach of the train when he was 450 feet from the crossing, the negligence of the defendant—if such there was—in failing to sound the bell or whistle, has no causal connection with the accident itself. Puckhaber v. Southern Pacific Co., 132 Cal. 363, 64 Pac. 480. So, too, as to the failure of the engineer to stop the train. The fireman testifies that he first saw the plaintiff when the plaintiff was about 150 feet and the engine about three times that distance from the crossing; that plaintiff was driving along at an ordinary rate of speed, about 4 miles an hour. The horses were trotting, and did not show any signs of fright, and the fireman had no idea that plaintiff was going to try and cross the track until the plaintiff was about 10 feet from the main track. As soon as he realized that plaintiff was endeavoring to cross the track, the fireman called to the engineer, and every effort was made to avoid the collision. Under this state of the evidence, there can, of course, be no effort to invoke the doctrine termed the "last chance doctrine," to the effect that in cases of contributory negligence he who has the last clear opportunity to avoid inflicting an injury is responsible, if in the exercise of ordinary care he fails to do so; for there was nothing in the approach of the plaintiff, according to the testimony of the fireman and of plaintiff's witnesses, to call for the stopping of the train. The fireman did not know that the plaintiff was deaf, and was not bound to assume that the driver of a team so approaching a crossing in broad daylight, with an unobstructed view—the team merely trotting along—would not check his horses in a place of safety.

For these reasons the judgment appealed from is reversed.

In re McDOUGALD'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,290.)*

ESTATES — ADMINISTRATION — MORTGAGES — CLASSIFICATION BEFORE FORECLOSURE—PAROL AGREEMENTS — VALIDITY — CONSIDERATION—ADMINISTRATORS—CREDITS — TAXES — DIVIDENDS.

1. Where an administratrix held a claim secured by mortgage against the estate, and failed to list her mortgage interest, which exceeded the value of the property mortgaged, for taxation, but permitted the land to be taxed as though no mortgage existed thereon, she was not entitled to a credit for taxes paid by her as administratrix on the real estate described in the mortgage.

2. Where a mortgage provided for 10 per cent. interest, a parol agreement by which the mortgagee agreed to accept 7 per cent. if the mortgagor would pay the taxes on the property, including the interest of both mortgagor and mortgagee, was valid so far as executed, under Civ. Code, § 1698, providing that a contract in writing may be altered by a written contract, or by an executed oral agreement.

3. Where a mortgagor died leaving an insolvent estate, together with a debt secured by mortgage providing for 10 per cent. interest, such interest was reduced to 7 per cent. by Code Civ. Proc. § 1494, providing that if the estate be insolvent no greater rate of interest shall be allowed on any claim after the first publication of notice to creditors than is allowed on judgments obtained in the superior court, so that a parol agreement by the mortgagor to pay taxes on the interest of both the mortgagor and mortgagee in the property mortgaged, in consideration of the mortgagee's agreement to reduce the rate of interest to 7 per cent., was unenforceable as against the mortgagor's estate for want of consideration.

4. Code Civ. Proc. § 1648, provides that if there is any claim not due, or any contingent or disputed claim against a decedent's estate, the amount thereof, or such part as the holder would be entitled to if the claim were due, established, or absolute, must be paid into court and there remain to be paid over to the party when he becomes entitled thereto, or, if he fails to establish his claim, to be paid over or distributed as the circumstances of the estate require. Held, that a matured mortgage indebtedness against an estate before foreclosure was not a contingent claim within such section, and that the court was not authorized thereunder to take testimony to ascertain the probable deficiency which would arise on foreclosure.

5. Code Civ. Proc. § 1644, provides that the preference given in section 1643 to a mortgage against a decedent's estate extends only to the "proceeds" of the property mortgaged, and that, if such proceeds are insufficient to pay the mortgage, the part remaining unsatisfied must be classed with other demands against the estate. Held, that the word "proceeds" as so used did not include the rents of the property mortgaged accruing before sale, where the rents, issues, or profits of the property were not included in the mortgage.

6. Code Civ. Proc. § 1643, divides debts of a decedent's estate into classes, the fourth describing mortgages against deceased in the order of their date, and the fifth all other demands against the estate. Section 1644 provides that the preference to a mortgage only extends to the proceeds of the property mortgaged, and, if such proceeds are insufficient to pay the mortgage, the part remaining unsatisfied must be classified with other demands against the estate; and section 1645 declares that, if the estate is insufficient to pay all the debts of any one class, each creditor must be paid a dividend in proportion to his claims, and no creditor of any one class shall receive any payment until all those of the preceding class are fully paid. Held that, where there had been no sale of property mortgaged by a decedent, the holder of the mortgage was entitled to have the claim thereunder classed as a claim of the fifth class, and to be allowed a dividend estimated on the full amount, without any deduction for the probable proceeds of a future sale of the mortgaged property.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Judicial accounting of Carrie B. McDougald, as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband. From an order settling her second account as administratrix, and from an order providing for the payment of a claim held by her, secured by mortgage against the estate, she appeals. Modified.

Budd & Thompson, for appellant. Buck & Middlecoff, Minor & Washington, J. B. Webster, and C. H. Fairall, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This case presents two appeals by Carrie B. McDougald from the order settling her second account as administratrix of the estate, one taken by her as administratrix, the other as the holder of a claim secured by mortgage. The entire assets of the estate consist of the real estate covered by the mortgage held by Carrie B. McDougald, $6,822.95 received by her after her appointment as rentals of said real estate, and $500 received on a life insurance policy.

1. The principal point urged by the administratrix in her representative capacity is the action of the court in rejecting the item of taxes. In her account she claimed credit for $2,129.67 paid as taxes on the real estate described in her mortgage. The court rejected this item, and charged the amount as a part of the balance on hand out of which dividends were to be paid. We think this action of the court was correct. It appears that she did not list her mortgage interest for assessment, but allowed the land to be taxed in the same manner as if there was no mortgage thereon. As holder of the mortgage interest, it was her duty to list it for taxation, and the taxes consequently levied on that interest would be her individual debt, and not the debt of the estate. The debt being greater than the value of the land, there could have been no excess on which the estate would have been taxed. The mortgage debt would therefore have covered it all. She cannot be allowed to do indirectly what she could not do directly, especially when, in her trust capacity as administratrix, she was held to the utmost good faith in dealing with the estate. Equity will regard that done which ought to have been done, and the matter must be adjusted by requiring her to bear the burden of the taxes which she should have paid, as fully as she would have borne it had she listed her mortgage interest for taxation, as she ought.

In this connection, she offered to prove a parol agreement between the deceased and Parker, the original mortgagee, at the time of the execution of the mortgage, to the effect that, if the deceased would each year pay the taxes on the entire estate in the property, including the interest of both mortgagor and mortgagee, the mortgagee would remit 3 per cent. on the 10 per cent. interest provided in the note, and would accept a payment of 7 per cent. as a full payment of the interest on the debt; that this arrangement was carried out during the lifetime of the deceased; that when she procured the mortgage to be assigned to her she immediately transferred it to the Stockton Savings Bank as collateral security for a debt she personally owed to the bank; and that thereafter she, as administratrix, and said bank had continued to act under the same arrangement in regard to taxes and interest. This was objected to on the ground that it was an oral agreement purporting to change the terms of the note and mortgage, and the objection was sustained. Doubtless, as an executory agreement to bind the parties in the future, and so far as it was unperformed, it was invalid. But it would have been valid if it had been in writing (Hewitt v. Dean, 91 Cal. 5, 27 Pac. 423), and, so far as it had been performed, we see no reason why it was not valid as an executed parol agreement. Civ. Code, § 1698. The validity of such agreements arises from the fact that, apart from the loan of the money, there is a lawful and valuable consideration for the promise of the mortgagee to rebate the interest. The advancing of the necessary money for the benefit of the mortgagee, and the services of the mortgagor in attending at the office of the tax collector, making the payment, and procuring the receipt therefor, all of which, in the absence of such agreement, the mortgagee must do and the mortgagor is under no obligation to perform, constitute a sufficient consideration for the agreement to rebate the interest, and make the written executory agreement, or the executed oral agreement, lawful. In substance, it is but a part payment of the interest. But although the objection made may not have been well taken, the evidence was properly excluded for other reasons. The note on its face bore 10 per cent. interest. The estate being insolvent, as the court found, the holder of the mortgage claim could not charge or receive more than 7 per cent. interest thereon. Code Civ. Proc. § 1494. The reduction of the rate of interest from 10 per cent. to 7 per cent. was therefore already accomplished in this case by the law, and the estate received, and could receive, no benefit whatever from the arrangement. There being no reciprocal benefits, the administratrix as mortgagee cannot be allowed to profit personally by the arrangement. There was no error in this ruling.

2. Objection is made to the action of the court in refusing to allow the credit for $2,943.72, credited as interest on the mortgage debt held by her. This item was disallowed, and was charged to her as administratrix as a part of the balance to be distributed as dividends. The court held that the rents of the mortgaged property were not a part of the "proceeds" of the property, as that term is used in section 1644, Code Civ. Proc., but were general assets of the estate, and that the mortgage debt of the administratrix was not entitled to a preference over the general debts in the distribution of such rents. It further held that the mortgage claim could not be classed with the unsecured claims, so as to be entitled to a dividend out of the general assets estimated upon its full amount, but that as to that claim the dividends should be estimated only upon the excess of the claim over the value of the mortgaged property. Accordingly, testimony was taken, the value of the land determined, the excess of the claim was found to be $7,491.76, and upon this sum the court allowed a "contingent" dividend of $412.32, to be paid to her only in the event that she should thereafter become entitled thereto. We presume that by this the court meant that this sum should be paid to her only in the event that, upon a foreclosure sale, there should be a deficiency judgment for the amount stated as the excess of the debt over the value of the property mortgaged.

We find no statutory authority for the action of the court in endeavoring to ascertain the probable deficiency, and directing that a contingent dividend thereon be retained until the actual deficiency should be determined. It was evidently based on the following part of section 1648, Code Civ. Proc.: "If there is any claim not due, or any contingent or disputed claim against the estate, the amount thereof, or such part of the same as the holder would be entitled to if the claim were due, established, or absolute, must be paid into the court, and there remain, to be paid over to the party when he becomes entitled thereto; or, if he fails to establish his claim, to be paid over or distributed as the circumstances of the estate require." The claim on the mortgage debt was due, and the amount was not disputed. If we concede that it was contingent to the extent that the amount of the "proceeds" of the property mortgaged was not ascertained, and could not be determined until there was a sale thereof, and hence that the balance that would remain after the application of such proceeds thereon was uncertain and indeterminable, still there is nothing in the statute that warrants the taking of testimony by the court to ascertain the probable deficiency, or the determination by the court of the probable deficiency in any manner. The section quoted contemplates that an amount shall be paid into court, for the benefit of such contingent claim, equal to the amount that would be payable thereon if the whole of it were established as absolute. This would require a contingent dividend on the whole claim. We do not think this is the sort of a contingent claim referred to in that section.

Section 1643, Code Civ. Proc., divides the debts of the estate into five classes, to be paid in the order there given. We are here concerned only with the fourth and fifth classes. The fourth class is described as "judgments rendered against the deceased in his lifetime, and mortgages in the order of their date," and the fifth class as "all other demands against the estate." Section 1644 provides that: "The preference given in the preceding section to a mortgage only extends to the proceeds of the property mortgaged. If the proceeds of such property is insufficient to pay the mortgage, the part remaining unsatisfied must be classed with other demands against the estate." Section 1645 declares that: "If the estate is insufficient to pay all the debts of any one class, each creditor must be paid a dividend in proportion to his claims; and no creditor of any one class shall receive any payment until all those of the preceding class are fully paid." The word "proceeds" as here used does not include the rents of the property accruing before the sale, at least where the rents, issues, or profits of the property are not included in the mortgage. The court, therefore, properly held that the rents were general assets of the estate, on which the mortgage was not a lien and in which it was entitled to no preference. The preference given to mortgage debts by section 1643 is by section 1644 clearly limited to the proceeds arising from the property mortgaged, either upon a foreclosure sale, or a sale by the administrator under section 1569.

We think, however, that in calculating the dividend to be paid out of the general assets, where there has been no sale of the property mortgaged, the mortgage debt must be classed as a claim of the fifth class, and allowed a dividend estimated upon the full amount of the claim, without any deduction for the probable proceeds of a future sale. As the preference of the mortgage debt is limited to the proceeds of the property, it follows that, where there are no proceeds in question, there can be no preference, and the mortgage debt, in such circumstances, ranks as an unsecured claim, and stands in the fifth class as to the general assets. The second clause of section 1644 manifestly can have no application whatever until there has been a sale. It does not have the effect of a declaration that prior to a sale the mortgage debt cannot participate in any dividend of the general assets. The effect of the three sections, properly construed, is that with respect to the proceeds of the mortgaged property the mortgage debt shall have the preference and be first paid, and that, where there are no proceeds before the court upon which such preference can operate, the claim has no preference at all, and must be classed, with other demands against the estate, as a debt of the fifth class. Otherwise it would either be unclassified entirely, or, being still classed as one of the fourth class, it would be entitled to preference by virtue of section 1645. It must belong to one or the other of these classes, and the most reasonable interpretation of the Code is to give it rank, as to general assets, as a claim of the fifth class, and entitled to share to its full amount in the dividend.

The conclusion is that the court erred in establishing a dividend only upon the supposed deficiency, and in allowing it as a contingent dividend. It was entitled to an absolute dividend to the extent of its proportion, estimated upon the whole amount of the claim, in the same manner as the other debts.

The order is affirmed as to all parts thereof, except the order declaring and allowing a dividend upon the money adjudged to be on hand. The part of the order declaring the dividend on the claims is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to the court below to estimate and order payment of a dividend upon the mortgage debt, or any part thereof then remaining unpaid, as a claim of the fifth class.

ADMINISTRATORS — SECURED CLAIMS — PRESENTATION—DESCRIPTION OF MORTGAGE—ALLOWANCE — INTERMEDIATE ACCOUNT — RES JUDICATA.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1497, providing that, if a claim against an estate is founded on a bond, bill, note, or any other instrument, a copy of the instrument must accompany the claim, where a note secured by mortgage given by deceased was assigned to the administratrix, the filing of a copy of the note with the claim was sufficient without a copy of the assignment.

2. Where a claim secured by mortgage covering all the mortgagor's real estate, filed against the mortgagor's estate, stated that the note was secured by a mortgage on real estate of the deceased, described in the inventory on file, to which reference was made for further particulars, and the date of the execution and acknowledgment of the mortgage was given, with the volume and page of the record, to which reference was also made, the claim sufficiently described the mortgage within Code Civ. Proc. § 1497, requiring that it should be sufficient to describe the mortgage or lien and refer to the date, volume, and page of its record.

3. Where a secured claim due the administratrix was indorsed by the judge of the superior court, "Allowed and approved the 14th day of March, 1899, for $23,652.30 and interest," the words "allowed and approved" must be construed to refer to the claim on which they were indorsed, and constituted a sufficient allowance of the claim as a secured claim.

4. Code Civ. Proc. § 1628, provides that within 30 days after the time for presenting claims every administrator shall render a full account of his administration, exhibiting all debts presented and allowed during the period embraced in the account. Sections 1635 and 1636 provide that, when an account is presented for settlement after due notice, any creditor or person interested may contest the same, and may object to any item not passed upon on the settlement of any previous account; and section 1637 declares that the settlement of an account and the allowance thereof by the court is conclusive against all persons in any way interested in the estate. Held, that where an account of an administratrix containing an allowance to her of a secured claim against the estate was approved after notice, without objection, such allowance could not be attacked by creditors on the settlement of the administratrix's final account, on the ground that the claim had been purchased by the administratrix in violation of Code Civ. Proc. § 1617.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Judicial accounting of Carrie B. McDougald, as administratrix of the estate of her husband. From an order allowing a claim of the administratrix against the estate, Louise E. Boggs, as executrix, a creditor of the deceased, appeals. Affirmed.

See 77 Pac. 443.

Louttit & Louttit and Buck & Middlecoff, for appellant. Budd & Thompson, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by Louise E. Boggs, as executrix of a creditor of deceased, from that part of the order settling the final account of Carrie B. McDougald, as administratrix of the estate, declaring that said administratrix holds a valid claim against the estate, secured by mortgage, and is entitled to a contingent dividend, out of the moneys on hand, upon the excess of the claim over the value of the mortgaged property.

The deceased died on November 17, 1898, and his widow, Carrie B. McDougald, was appointed and qualified as administratrix of his estate on December 10, 1898. The real estate was appraised at $24,000. It was mortgaged to R. B. Parker upon a mortgage executed in 1890 to secure a note of $22,000, due five years after date, upon which the principal and a considerable amount of interest remained unpaid at his death. When Mrs. McDougald qualified as administratrix the mortgage debt was about to become outlawed, and the holder of the mortgage threatened a foreclosure suit. There was no money belonging to the estate, and no means apparent from which money could be obtained. In order to prevent a foreclosure and save the property to the estate, she purchased and obtained an assignment of the mortgage and of the debt thereby secured, paying the price out of her own moneys. It is not claimed that she obtained any discount. At that time the debt had not been presented or allowed as a claim against the estate. After the assignment to her she presented it as a secured claim, and it was allowed by the judge of the superior court by indorsing thereon and signing the following statement: "Allowed and approved the 14th day of March, 1899, for $23,652.30 and interest." Thereafter she presented for settlement her first account current as administratrix of the estate, including therein a "list of claims presented and allowed," in which her claim was described as follows: "Claimant Carrie B. McDougald; amount $23,652.30 and int., date of allowance March 14, 1899." After due notice and hearing, the court made an order allowing, approving, and settling this account as rendered.

It is objected that this claim was never properly presented, because a copy of the assignment to Carrie B. McDougald is not set out therein. Section 1497, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, if a claim is founded on a "bond, bill, note, or any other instrument," a copy of the instrument must accompany the claim. A copy of the note given by the deceased and secured by the mortgage was attached to the claim. This is all that was necessary to comply with the above provision of the Code. The claim was not founded on the assignment, but on the debt of the deceased as evidenced by the note.

The same section provides that, if a claim is secured by a recorded mortgage, "it shall be sufficient to describe the mortgage or lien, and refer to the date, volume, and the page of its record." The objection is made that this claim did not properly describe the mortgage, but we think it is untenable. It was stated in the claim that the note was secured by a mortgage upon the real property of the deceased, described in the inventory on file, to which reference was made for further particulars. The date of its execution and acknowledgment was given, with the volume and page of the record where it was recorded, to which reference was also made. The mortgage covered all the real property belonging to the deceased at the time of his death, and included all the real property described in the inventory. We think this was a sufficient description of the mortgage to comply with the statute. There could be no mistake as to the particular mortgage intended to be relied upon, and the only purpose of the required description is to identify the mortgage.

It is also claimed that the allowance, in the form in which it was made, was equivalent to a rejection of the claim as a secured claim. The language of the indorsement does not properly bear this construction. It was allowed for the full amount stated on the face of the claim, and therefore there can be no implication that there was a rejection of any part of the claim as to the amount. The allowance did not contain any limitation or reservation whatever. The words "allowed and approved" must be taken to refer to the claim on which they were indorsed, and, as it purported on its face to be a secured claim, it must be deemed to have been allowed as a secured claim.

The principal objection to the claim is that it was purchased by the administratrix after her appointment and qualification; that this was a violation of section 1617 of the Code of Civil Procedure, declaring that "no administrator or executor shall purchase any claim against the estate he represents"; and that a sound public policy demands that she shall not be allowed to enforce the claim thus procured. It is probable that the court has some discretion with regard to questions of public policy, and there is a serious question whether such policy should be enforced with respect to a purchase of the character here presented. Its effect was to preserve to the estate for the time being the only property it possessed, with the result that the estate received the rentals which constitute the fund over which the present contest is waged. If she had not purchased the mortgage debt, but had allowed the prior holder to foreclose the mortgage, there would be no money on hand over which to maintain the contest. It does not seem just to allow the general creditors to dispute the lawfulness of a purchase which procured for them the fund in which they claim to participate, and which, if the purchase had not been made, would never have existed. But we do not find it necessary to decide this question, for we are of the opinion that the general creditors are concluded by the allowance of the claim and the subsequent order of the court settling the first account. Within 30 days after the expiration of the time for presenting claims, every executor or administrator must render a full account and report of his administration, and every account must exhibit all debts which have been presented and allowed during the period embraced in the account. Code Civ. Proc. § 1628. When an account is presented for settlement after due notice, as in this case, any creditor or person interested may contest the same, and may object to any item of charge or credit, or to any claim allowed and not passed upon on the settlement of any previous account, and may thereupon have his objection settled and determined. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1635, 1636. The settlement of an account and the allowance thereof by the court are conclusive against all persons in any way interested in the estate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1637. One whose claim has been rejected, and who is prosecuting a suit upon it against the estate, is a person interested who may make such a contest, and who is concluded by the settlement of a previous account. The first account of the administratrix set forth her claim as one of the allowed claims against the estate. This was sufficient to notify all persons interested that the validity of this claim would be determined and established by the settlement of the account as rendered. No objection or contest was made; the account was settled, allowed, and approved as rendered, and thereupon this claim, with the others mentioned in the list, passed into the class of claims "passed upon on the settlement of a former account" (section 1636), and was conclusively established against all persons in any way interested, and its validity was not thereafter subject to attack upon the hearing of any subsequent account. A judgment or order of a court having jurisdiction is conclusive of all matters involved which might have been disputed at the hearing, although no objection was in fact made. This rule applies to the settling of accounts, the same as to any other proceeding. Estate of Grant, 131 Cal. 426, 63 Pac. 731; Estate of Bell, 142 Cal. 102, 75 Pac. 679.

There is nothing in the point that the description of the claim, as set forth in the account, did not refer to the mortgage security, nor disclose on its face the fact that the claim had been purchased by the administratrix after her appointment and qualification. The statement in the list of claims set forth in the account described the claim with such certainty that there could be no mistake concerning its identity. The claim itself was on file at the time, and it stated all the particulars as to the mortgage lien, the property covered thereby, and the precise date of the assignment. Any one interested could therefore easily obtain all necessary information upon these points from the papers on file. The statement in the account was sufficient to point out the particular claim of the administratrix as one of the allowed claims. This is all that was necessary. It is not the purpose of the law regulating the administering of estates to require in the statement of matters contained in an account as much nicety or precision or as great detail as is required in pleadings in civil actions. The settlement of the account is to be considered as an adjudication of the validity of all claims exhibited therein with sufficient certainty to identify them with accuracy, including all the incidents thereto, shown in the statement of the claim as filed, which are necessary to establish their rank. It is not necessary that the statement of claims contained in the account should aver that the claim belonged to any particular class, or that it should state the facts which show the class to which it belonged. Its class is to be determined from the nature of the claim as presented and allowed.

We find no error in the record of which the appellant can complain. Carrie B. McDougald has taken appeals from the same order, both in her representative capacity and as a creditor. The decision of the present appeal will be without prejudice to the appeals taken by Mrs. McDougald.

The parts of the order appealed from by Louise E. Boggs, executrix, are affirmed, so far as her appeal is concerned.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 4, 1905.)

WATERS — DIVERSION — INJUNCTION — PARTY PLAINTIFF—STATUTE—COVENANTS—CONSTRUCTION.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 367, providing that an action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, does not prevent a water company, incorporated to furnish a limited amount of water flowing from a certain tract of land for its stockholders only under a contract with the owner of the land (who had covenanted with the stockholders as her grantees to cause a given quantity of water to be conveyed to the several grantees' lands), from maintaining in its own name a suit to restrain a diversion of the water by subsequent owners of the land from which the water was to be furnished, in view of section 369, providing that a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another may sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted, and Civ. Code, § 809, providing that the owner of an estate in a dominant tenement or the occupant of such tenement may maintain an action for the enforcement of an easement attached thereto.

2. Under the direct provisions of Civ. Code, § 806, the extent of a servitude is determined by the terms of the grant; and hence, under an express covenant that a certain quantity of water should flow perpetually from the grantor's lands to the grantees' lands, and that the covenant should bind the grantor's heirs, successors in interest, and assigns of the water-bearing lands, no question arises as to whether the covenant runs with the land and binds subsequent owners of the water-bearing lands.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by the Los Robles Water Company against Adele Stoneman and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Stephens & Stephens, for appellant. Lynn Helm, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to restrain defendants from taking water from certain pipes, for a mandatory injunction compelling them to deliver water, and for damages. The demurrer of defendants to the amended complaint was sustained, and judgment entered in their favor. Plaintiff prosecutes this appeal, for the purpose of reviewing the ruling on the demurrer.

The facts alleged must, for the purposes of this decision, be deemed to be true. They are in substance as follows: In the year 1891, Mrs. Mary O. H. Stoneman was the owner of two tracts of land in Los Angeles county—the first being the Los Robles Rancho, consisting of 165 acres; the second being the Los Robles Park tract. The first tract was farming or orchard land, and the second tract was higher and water-bearing land. While she was so the owner she concluded to subdivide and sell the first tract, and, to aid her in so doing, to grant certain appurtenant water rights with each subdivision sold, the water to be supplied from the second tract, upon which there were more than 16½ miner's inches of water rising in and flowing thereon, which could be conducted to the first tract by means of pipes. She accordingly subdivided the first tract into lots of about 10 acres each, and sold 140 acres during the year 1891 to different purchasers, to each of whom she granted, as appurtenant to the lot conveyed, a constant flow of water equal to one inch, miner's measurement, to each ten acres, and in like proportion for larger or smaller tracks, to be taken from the said water rising in the second tract. Deeds were made by the grantor to the respective purchasers, conveying the land and water appurtenant thereto, and, after a description of the subdivision conveyed, the deeds each provided that the grantor, on or before the 1st day of February, 1892, would convey to the purchasers one acre of land for reservoir purposes; that a reservoir should be constructed upon the acre of land by the grantees; that the water for the grantees should be delivered into the one reservoir when completed. The deed, in each case, further provided that if a majority of the consumers of water should elect to incorporate for the purpose of managing and controlling the storage and distribution of the waters of said reservoir, and should so notify the consumers of water, all such consumers and grantees should be held to have agreed to incorporate for the purposes of managing and controlling the distribution of said 16½ inches of water, and should convey to the corporation their several water rights and receive certificates of stock therefor. The deeds so made by Mrs. Stoneman each contained the following covenant: "The party of the first part, for herself, her heirs, successors in interest, and assigns, further agrees to cause said * * * water to flow perpetually to said party of the second part into said reservoir to be constructed as aforesaid, his heirs and assigns, forever. * * * And the party of the first part covenants that sixteen and one-half (16½) miner's inches of water shall be forever conducted to the said reservoir from its immediate sources—either springs, tunnels or other excavations—in and by substantial pipes in all respects sufficient for such purpose, to be forever maintained throughout in good, serviceable condition by the party of the first part, her successors in interest, heirs, and assigns, and that the water shall be forever preserved pure and free from any and all contamination, which obligation shall forever apply, and bind her heirs, successors in interest, and assigns of said water-bearing land."

After the conveyance was made, the parties to whom the lots and appurtenant water rights were conveyed consented to, and did, incorporate; the plaintiff being the corporation so formed. After the incorporation of plaintiff, the parties who had purchased the several tracts of land, and Mrs. Stoneman, their grantor, signed, executed, acknowledged, and delivered to plaintiff a conveyance which contained a general recital of the facts, and recited the conveyance of the one acre to plaintiff for a reservoir site, and further recited that "whereas, they (the grantors) have severally acquired interests in waters, to wit, 16 569-1000 inches, each inch equivalent to a continuous flow of one-fifteenth of a cubic foot per second, rising above said reservoir on the elevated lands now or formerly of Mrs. Mary O. H. Stoneman on the Los Robles Rancho, * * * which said waters are appurtenant to those lands described in said above-mentioned maps as lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18." Then, after other recitals, the conveyance states that the grantors "severally hereby grant, bargain, sell, and convey unto the party of the second part, each, all of their several interests in and to said waters and in and to all rights of way and main distributing pipe lines used and held in connection with said reservoir site and said waters, with power upon the party of the second part: * * * To manage and control the waterworks and pipes in connection with said reservoir, and for the distribution of said waters. Said waters to be taken, held, and owned by the party of the second part in trust for the several owners of said lots of land, the parties of the first part, and for distribution among them in proportion to their several interests in said waters. To distribute said waters to the several owners of said lands and their grantees."

Thereupon the plaintiff issued shares of stock to the several purchasers in proportion to the amount of water owned by each appurtenant to his land, who have ever since owned and claimed the said stock, and recognized the title of plaintiff to the water and rights conveyed to it by said deed. The plaintiff thereupon went into possession, and continuously thereafter, until interrupted by defendants, for a period of more than five years, continued in the peaceable possession of said waters and property, claiming the same adversely to all the world, and distributing the same to its said stockholders as per their agreements and rights. At the time of the conveyance to plaintiff, Mrs. Stoneman still owned 25 acres of orchard land of the first tract and had shares of stock issued to her on the basis of 2½ inches of water.

The plaintiff was really created and came into being, for the purposes and as part of the scheme of Mrs. Stoneman, in connection with the sale of the lots to the several purchasers. It was the agent or instrument to whom the reservoir site was conveyed, and through whom all the parties, including Mrs. Stoneman, were to receive the water after Mrs. Stoneman had delivered it to the reservoir. On May 19, 1897, Mrs. Stoneman conveyed the second tract, or water-bearing lands, and the 25 acres of the first tract, or orchard lands, to defendant Purcell. In May, 1898, defendant Purcell conveyed the second tract to Adele Stoneman, both deeds being made without consideration. The 25 acres of the first tract, so conveyed by Mrs. Stoneman to Purcell, has received its share of water and has been irrigated by plaintiff under the general plan and system.

Prior to the execution of the deed to plaintiff Mrs. Stoneman had constructed a pipe line from the second tract down to the reservoir, and caused said 16½ inches of water to be delivered to plaintiff in its said reservoir, as she had covenanted to do. All this had been done, and the several conveyances made to the purchasers of the lots in the first tract, before the conveyances were made to defendants, and they took with full knowledge of the rights of all parties to said waters. Upon the execution of the conveyance to defendants, they entered into possession of the second tract of land, and of the pipe line leading therefrom, and diverted from the pipe line into which the waters had been delivered to plaintiff about two inches of the 16½ inches of water, and ever since have diverted, and claim the right to take and divert for their own use, about two inches of said waters, which under the deeds and contract should flow into said pipe and into plaintiff's reservoir. Although requested, defendants refused and continue to refuse to turn the said two inches of water into the pipe line, or to permit plaintiff to do so, and they will, unless restrained, continue to divert said water from said pipe line and from said reservoir to the great injury of plaintiff. The court below held that plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and that it had no beneficial interest in the subject-matter of the action.

Defendants' counsel argues, in support of the ruling, that the plaintiff by the conveyance to it did not acquire "any interest in said waters sufficient to enable it to bring an action for their diversion or any interference therewith." We may assume, for the purposes of this discussion, that the defendants, taking without consideration, and with full knowledge of the rights of all parties, are in no better position than Mrs. Stoneman would be if she had not made the conveyance to defendants and had diverted the water as these defendants have done. After receiving the money of the parties to whom she conveyed lots, in consideration of her agreement to deliver 16½ inches of water to plaintiff for them, and after inducing them to incorporate and expend their money in building a reservoir and a system of pipes for the distribution of the water, and after conveying the water to plaintiff, she will not be allowed to divert the water, and say that the plaintiff has not sufficient legal title to maintain the action. She joined in the conveyance of the legal title to plaintiff. She will not now be allowed to say that plaintiff has no interest in receiving what was legally conveyed to it. Plaintiff is, as all corporations are, the artificial person, representing the shareholders. It acts for the shareholders, and its property is the property of those who hold the certificates of stock. It cannot live in houses, wear clothes, ride in carriages, or eat the fruit produced on the lands; but it can, under our laws, sue and be sued and protect the property rightfully conveyed to it. The purchasers of the lots from Mrs. Stoneman agreed among themselves and with her to create plaintiff. They did this so as to have a common reservoir and a common system of pipes, instead of having many reservoirs and many pipe lines. Mrs. Stoneman joined in the conveyance, and conveyed the reservoir site as an inducement to the parties to purchase her land. It is true that the water made appurtenant to each lot or parcel of land is still appurtenant to such lot or parcel, and that the owner of the lot or parcel would be the one injured by a diversion of the water or any part of the water to which such lot is entitled. But for this reason it will not be held that each separate owner of the 18 lots must bring a separate action. It might, in such case, be very difficult to show just how much water was diverted from, and how much injury was done to, each owner of the lot. It is not difficult to hold that plaintiff is entitled to the two inches of water that defendants' grantor conveyed to it. If we should hold that Mrs. Stoneman or her successors must deliver the amount of water she agreed to deliver to the artificial person to whom she agreed to deliver it, the parties entitled to it can determine their several rights, without allowing defendants to cause vexation and delay because the plaintiff does not claim the water for itself. It is the duty of a party making a lawful contract to live up to it. It is not the business of such party to raise the question as to the person or persons to be benefited by the result of the contract being performed. If the plaintiffs were an independent artificial person, having no relation with the parties by and through whom it was created, and held no property belonging to any of the parties to the transaction leading up to its incorporation, the question would be quite different. But it was created for the very purpose of carrying out the agreements of the parties. In such case a court of equity will reach out beyond the form and shadow, and grasp the substance. It will endeavor to aid the parties in carrying out their contract, and in enforcing their respective rights under them, rather than to lend its assistance to defeat such contracts by imaginary obstacles. In this case a judgment in favor of plaintiff would protect the defendants from further suits by the owners of the lots as to the same matter. This is all that defendants are entitled to, or that they have a right to expect. The statute provides that an action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. Code Civ. Proc. § 367. It also provides that a person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another, may sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. Code Civ. Proc. § 369. The contract in this case was made by Mrs. Stoneman with plaintiff, for the benefit of the parties to whom Mrs. Stoneman conveyed the several lots. It provided that plaintiff should "distribute said water to the several owners of said lands and their grantees."

In speaking of the meaning and object of the Code in requiring that an action shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, this court said, in Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 657, 40 Pac. 10: "It is to save the defendant against whom a judgment may be obtained from further harassment or vexation at the hands of other claimants to the same demand. It is to prevent a claimant from making a simulated transfer, and thus defeating any just counterclaim or set-off which defendant would have to the demand if pressed by the real owner. But where the plaintiff shows such a title as that a judgment upon it, satisfied by defendant, will protect him from future annoyance or loss, and where, as against the party suing, defendant can urge any defense he could make against the real owner, then there is an end of the defendant's concern, and with it of his right to object; for, so far as he is interested, the action is being prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest." It is evident that by the above test the judgment in this case will protect defendants, or bar them, as the case may be. The several parties to whom the water was conveyed joined in the agreements, and required that the water be delivered to the plaintiff in the reservoir, "to be taken, held and owned" by the plaintiff for the several owners of the lots. Nor was the conveyance to plaintiff void as an express trust in real estate. The conveyance states that the waters are to be held and owned in trust for the several owners of the lots, but this would be true if it had not been so stated in the deed. The corporation, as matter of law, would hold the water and all other property in trust for its stockholders. The stock, which carries the right to the use of the water, is transferable, and the land is alienable. The property is not tied up and withheld from the channels of trade, and hence the kind of conveyance here is not among the evils prohibited by the provision of the Code upon express trusts as to real estate. The water, when delivered into the plaintiff's reservoir from the lands of the grantor, may be regarded as personal property. We know of no law prohibiting the plaintiff from holding the title to such property in trust for the purposes of distribution. In fact, the statement that the property is held in trust is in substance but a statement as to the relations between the plaintiff and its stockholders.

It is not necessary, in this case, to decide the question as to whether or not the covenants run with the land and are binding upon the present owners. Mrs. Stoneman, while she owned the water-bearing lands, conveyed the 16½ inches of water as an incumbrance or charge upon the land. She expressly covenanted that the water should flow perpetually, and that the covenant in each case should "bind her heirs, successors in interest, and assigns of said water-bearing lands." The extent of a servitude is determined by the terms of a grant or the nature of the enjoyment by which it is acquired. Civ. Code, § 806. The owner of an estate in a dominant tenement, or the occupant of such tenement, may maintain an action for the enforcement of an easement attached thereto. Civ. Code, § 809. If the covenant had been to furnish the water to a third party, or to do something independent of the grantor and grantee, and not connected with the thing transferred, then it would be different; but, in this case, to say that the covenant was for the benefit of the reservoir, or for the benefit of a third party, would be to ignore the plain, common-sense, practical view of the covenant and contract made by the parties.

We advise that the judgment be reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

NOBLE v. GARDEN et al. (Sac. 1,304.)*

GIFTS CAUSA MORTIS—STATUTE—WILLS.

1. Where assignments of certificates of stock in a building and loan association were filled out by direction of the owner with the intention to make a gift thereof to the assignees, and the secretary of the association was given possession of the certificates by the owner, and told to hold them until the owner's impending death, and then deliver them to the assignees, the transaction was not a gift causa mortis, under Civ. Code, art. 3, § 1146 et seq., providing that a verbal gift is not valid unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee, if capable of delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 24, Cent. Dig. Gifts, §§ 122–132, 134.]

2. The transaction was not a testamentary disposition of the property under the Code defining the several kinds of wills that may be made.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank K. Smith, Judge.

Action by Arthur M. Noble, as administrator of the estate of Deborah H. Lee, deceased, against Clara D. L. Garden and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Plummer & Dunlap (Woods & Levinsky and Sheldon G. Kellogg, of counsel), for appellant. Nicol & Orr and Budd & Thompson, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to obtain a decree that 29 shares of the capital stock of the San Joaquin Valley Building & Loan Association is the property of the estate of Deborah H. Lee, deceased. Findings were filed, upon which judgment was entered for defendants. This appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The question is as to whether or not the title to the property in controversy passed by a gift causa mortis during the last illness of deceased. The facts are substantially as follows: In October, 1892, deceased was ill, suffering from a paralytic stroke, and under the care of a nurse and physician. She sent for Arthur M. Noble, told him that she had about $15,000 in money, and wanted his advice as to what was best "for her to do so as to produce her some income, and still have control of it while she lived." Noble advised her to take stock in the San Joaquin Valley Building & Loan Association, a corporation, of which he was secretary; that the stock would pay dividends, and that she could draw the principal, or any part of it, at any time she pleased. She said to Noble, "Suppose I am sick a long time, and want to use more money, how can I get the money?" Noble explained to her that the money would be represented by the different certificates in different denominations, and that she could surrender any certificate at any time and get the money. She replied: "I want to be sure that this does not go out of my control. I have bills to pay and expenses to meet, and I want money available for that purpose." Noble told her that it would be under the conditions desired by her; that the by-laws of the association provide that the money represented by the certificates can be withdrawn at any time, but that she would lose the interest since the last dividend was paid, in case she desired the money before a dividend became due. Deceased told Noble to issue the certificates in her name, and they were so issued; 19 in all. She also gave Noble a list of persons to whom she wanted the certificates assigned. Noble prepared the certificates and assignments as requested, and delivered them to deceased, who kept them a few days, and again sent for Noble, and gave him the certificates, with the remark: "I want you to take these certificates, and keep them in your safe, and when anything happens to me, if I should pass away, whatever is left from these certificates, deliver them to the people to whom they have been assigned." Among the certificates were Nos. 467, 468, and 481, being those in controversy; 481 being for 25 shares of the capital stock, and 467 and 468 for 10 shares each. On the back of certificate 481 was the following writing: "For valuable consideration I do hereby transfer and set over unto Clara D. L. Garden 25 shares of the stock of the San Joaquin Valley Building and Loan Association standing in my name as per the books of the corporation. Certificate No. 481, issued October 17, 1902. Witness my hand this 17th day of October, 1902"—the same being duly signed by deceased, and witnessed. The certificate also contained the clause: "No transfer shall be valid unless the passbook of the shareholder transferring is also surrendered, and the association is not bound except for the value of the shares as shown by the passbook, of even number with the certificate." The assignments of Nos. 467 and 468 were in the same form, except one of these was assigned to Helen L. Garden and the other to David L. Garden. The passbook was delivered to Noble, and thereafter remained in his possession. In the early part of February, 1903, Noble took all the certificates, and went to see deceased, who was still bedridden, and rapidly failing. He then, at her request, paid her the accrued dividends on the entire stock, $159, and she surrendered and had canceled two of the certificates, one for $100 and the other for $1,000, and received the money therefor. She handed the remaining certificates back to Noble, and asked him to keep them safely for her and in case of her death to deliver them to the persons to whom they were respectively assigned. On March 12, 1903, deceased died, without having revoked said assignments, or any of them. The certificates were then in the safe in the possession of Noble, who afterwards delivered them to the parties named in the respective assignments.

Gifts donatio mortis causa had their origin in the civil law, and were adopted with slight modifications into the common law. Ward v. Turner, 2 Ves. Sr. 431. Justinian defines a donatio mortis causa as "that which is made to meet the case of death, as where anything is given upon condition that, if any fatal accident befalls the donor, the person to whom it is given shall have it as his own; but, if the donor should survive, or if he should repent of having made the gift, or if the person to whom it has been given should die before the donor, then the donor shall receive back the thing given." It was much doubted by the early jurists whether such disposition of property should be considered as a gift or as a legacy. In some respects it is similar to a legacy. A legacy is always given in view of the possible death of the donor, and so must a gift causa mortis be given; but in the former case the donor need not be sick and in present peril of death, while in case of the latter it must be given in anticipation of a speedy death from a present sickness or impending peril. In either case the absolute title to the property does not become vested in the donee, and in either case the gift or legacy may be revoked at any time before the death of the donor. Thornton on Gifts, § 20, and cases cited. It is there said: "But in a gift causa mortis a written instrument is not necessary. It may be, and usually is, made by parol; and the possession of the thing given must be absolutely delivered to the donee before the death of the donor and the donee. * * * The most characteristic mark of distinction between a legacy and such a gift is the change of possession. From the nature of the donatio, it is apparent that the infallible test which must distinguish it from a testamentary gift is delivery, a change of dominion in præsenti. Without this there is really nothing to distinguish it from an ordinary testamentary bequest." In the early case of Ward v. Turner, supra, it was held that an actual delivery is indispensable to vest the property, if the subject-matter is capable of delivery. The Lord Chancellor traces the rule in its early stages, and concludes: "Therefore, from the authority of Swinburne and all these cases the consequence is that by the civil law, as received and allowed in England, tradition or delivery is necessary to make a good donation mortis causa." In Keniston v. Sceva, 54 N. H. 36, the court said: "The essential requisites of a valid gift causa mortis are well known and perfectly understood. They have in no respect changed since they were established and declared by the civil law, except in this particular: that under the civil law delivery of the property was not absolutely essential to the validity of the gift—an element which, in our law, cannot be dispensed with. Sanders' Justinian, 228, 229; 1 Williams on Executors and Administrators, pt. 2, B 2, c. 2, § 4, p. 544; 1 Story's Equity Jur. § 607a; Smith v. Kittridge, 21 Vt. 244." In Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 2 Sup. Ct. 415, 27 L. Ed. 500, the question is elaborately discussed, and the authorities collected. The Supreme Court of the United States there said: "If the gift does not take effect as an executed and complete transfer to the donee of possession and title, either legal or equitable, during the life of the donor, it is a testamentary disposition, good only if made and proved as a will. * * * But there must be delivery of possession. The contract must have been executed. The thing given must be put into the hands of the donee, or placed within his power by delivery of the means of obtaining it. * * * Without delivery the transaction is not valid as an executed gift; and without consideration it is not valid as a contract to be executed. The decision in Wight v. Wight was founded on a supposed distinction between a gift inter vivos and a donatio mortis causa. But there appears to be no such distinction. A delivery of possession is indispensable in either case. * * * A delivery which does not confer upon the donee the present right to reduce the fund into possession, by enforcing the obligation according to its terms, will not suffice. A delivery in terms which confers upon the donee power to control the fund only after the death of the donor, when by the instrument itself it is presently payable, is testamentary in character, and not good as a gift." This court has laid down the same rule in the late case of Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 170, 71 Pac. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19, where it is said: "A gift vests the donee with the absolute property in the thing given, and it is no longer subject to the control of the donor. If, on the other hand, the thing given remains under the control of the donor, or (except in case of a gift causa mortis) is subject to his revocation, his gift is not complete. There is no difference, however, in this particular between a gift inter vivos and a gift causa mortis. In either case it is not complete unless there is an actual or symbolic delivery to the donee of the thing to be given." Our Code, in article 3 (Civ. Code, § 1146 et seq.), provides certain rules as to gifts inter vivos and causa mortis, and that "a verbal gift is not valid unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing given, nor, if it is capable of delivery, unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee." See, further, Anderson's Dic. of the Law, tit. "Donatio Mortis Causa"; Thornton on Gifts, § 21 et seq.; Harris v. Clark, 3 N. Y. 93, 51 Am. Dec. 352; Bedell v. Carll, 33 N. Y. 585; Ruiz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 497, 45 Pac. 867; Calkins v. Equitable B. & L. Ass'n, 126 Cal. 534, 59 Pac. 30.

We do not think there was any delivery of the certificates of shares of stock made in the lifetime of the deceased. She retained control and dominion of them, and expressly stated to Noble that she wanted to be sure that the property did not go out of her control. He told her it should not. As her agent he kept the certificates, and brought them to her when she had two of them canceled, and received $1,100 for them. She expressed to Noble her intention when she said: "If I should pass away, whatever is left from these certificates deliver them to the people to whom they have been assigned." The title certainly did not vest in the parties to whom the assignments were made, because it was expressly stated that it should remain in deceased. If the title remained in deceased, the transaction shows only an intention to make a gift. By the terms, understanding, and intention of deceased, the gift was not to take effect until her death. In such case the disposal is testamentary, and not a gift. Hart v. Ketchum, 121 Cal. 429, 53 Pac. 931. However much we may desire to carry out the intentions of deceased, we cannot do so in this case, because the effect would be to hold valid an oral testamentary disposition of her property. The Code has provided the kinds of wills that may be made and the essential requisite of each kind. The oral directions to Noble by deceased did not constitute any one of the kinds of wills authorized by the Codes.

It follows that the judgment should be reversed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HARRISON, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

GAY v. GAY. (L. A. 1,596.)

DIVORCE — ALIMONY PENDING APPEAL — GOOD FAITH AND MERIT OF APPEAL—DETERMINATION — MOTIONS — RES JUDICATA—ALLOWANCE TO WIFE FOR EXPENSES ALREADY INCURRED.

1. The court has power to require a husband to pay alimony to the wife pending her appeal from a judgment granting him a divorce.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Divorce, §§ 625, 641.]

2. The granting of alimony pending a wife's appeal from a judgment granting the husband a divorce is within the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be interfered with unless clearly abused.

3. The question whether a wife's appeal from a judgment granting the husband a divorce is meritorious, so as to justify the allowance of alimony pending the appeal, is to be determined from the entire showing made on the hearing, so that the court may consider the wife's affidavit and the bill of exceptions served on the motion for a new trial.

4. Where, on motion by a wife for alimony pending her appeal from a judgment granting a divorce to her husband, she filed an affidavit stating that the appeal was taken in good faith and on the advice of counsel that she had good grounds for appeal, and also filed notice of intention to move for a new trial, and served a bill of exceptions for use on this motion, there was a sufficient showing that the appeal was in good faith and meritorious to justify the trial court in granting the wife alimony pending the appeal.

5. On appeal from an order granting a wife alimony pending appeal from a judgment granting her husband a divorce, the Supreme Court will, in determining whether the appeal was taken in good faith, take judicial notice of mandamus proceedings before it by appellant to compel the trial judge to settle a bill of exceptions.

6. Where, after a judgment of divorce in favor of the husband, the wife's motion for alimony pending an appeal which she alleged she intended to take was denied, this order was not res judicata preventing the granting of the motion on its renewal after an appeal had been perfected.

7. In an action for divorce an allowance may be granted the wife for the payment of expenses already incurred by her, if such an allowance is necessary to enable her to further prosecute or defend her case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 17, Cent. Dig. Divorce, § 616.]

8. On suit by a wife for divorce she was granted $250 per month as alimony pendente lite, and on judgment granting the husband a divorce on his cross-complaint this order was revoked. On application by the wife for alimony pending appeal, the court granted her $100 per month, the order also reciting that, as she had received no alimony for three months, the payments should date from three months before the order and the husband immediately pay her $300. Held, that it was a reasonable inference from the order that the allowance of $300 was made in order to enable the wife to further carry on her case.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge.

Action by Lucile D. Gay against John H. Gay, in which defendant was granted a divorce on his cross-complaint. From an order granting plaintiff alimony pending her appeal from the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Boone and Oscar A. Trippet, for appellant. Valentine & Newby and Victor E. Shaw, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order, made after judgment rendered in favor of defendant, requiring him to pay plaintiff certain amounts of money for her maintenance pending her appeal in the action to this court. The action was commenced by plaintiff to obtain a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. Defendant answered denying the allegations of the complaint, and filed a cross-complaint asking that he be granted a divorce from plaintiff upon similar grounds. Pending the trial of the cause the court made an order requiring defendant to pay plaintiff $250 per month for her maintenance, and, the cause having been subsequently tried, judgment was entered denying plaintiff's application for a divorce, and an interlocutory judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, declaring him entitled to a divorce upon his cross-complaint, and in such interlocutory judgment, among other things, it was decreed that the order theretofore made requiring defendant to pay alimony of $250 per month to plaintiff be vacated and set aside. This judgment was entered October 29, 1903. On January 8, 1904, plaintiff applied to the lower court for an order requiring defendant to pay for her maintenance pending an appeal in the action, which she represented she intended to take, but which had not actually been taken. This motion was denied, without prejudice to its renewal. Thereafter plaintiff filed and served her notice of appeal from the judgment, together with an undertaking on appeal, and on January 16, 1904, renewed her application for an order for maintenance pending the appeal. Upon the hearing, in addition to other evidence presented upon the motion, was the affidavit of plaintiff, which, aside from showing her indigent circumstances, stated (which was not denied) that she had on the 3d of December, 1903, filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial in said action; that within the time allowed by law and the extension granted by the court, and on January 11, 1904, she had served her bill of exceptions and filed affidavits to be used on motion for a new trial, but that said bill of exceptions had not then been settled, and said motion for a new trial had not been then heard; that she had appealed from the judgment and interlocutory decree in good faith, and intended to prosecute the same with diligence in this court; and that she was advised by her attorneys that she had good and sufficient grounds for such appeal. Thereafter the court made an order directing the defendant to pay plaintiff for her maintenance, pending the appeal, $100 on February 15, 1904, and $100 a month on the 15th of each succeeding month until further order of the court, and then further recited and provided that, "it appearing to the court that plaintiff has received no alimony from the defendant since the 15th day of October, 1903, under the order of this court dated December 11, 1902, or otherwise, it is ordered that said payments of $100 a month shall date from the 15th day of November, 1903, and the said defendant is ordered to pay to the said plaintiff for her support and maintenance the sum of $300 on or before the 1st day of February, 1904, being the amounts due under the terms of this order for the period from November 15, 1903, to February, 1904." This order was made January 29, 1904, and this appeal is taken from the whole thereof.

The right of the court, pending an appeal, to require the husband to pay the wife such an amount as may be necessary for her support during that period, is beyond question. Bohnert v. Bohnert, 91 Cal. 431, 27 Pac. 732, and cases cited therein. Whether alimony pending such appeal shall be granted is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the court, and its action relative to an application therefor will not be disturbed by this court, save when it appears that such discretion has been clearly abused. We find nothing in the record which would warrant us in disturbing the order upon any of the grounds suggested by appellant, the most pertinent of which will be referred to.

It is insisted that the record does not disclose that the appeal from the judgment was taken in good faith, or that it has any merit. We think it does. Counsel is mistaken in his view that this question of good faith, or merit, is to be determined solely from an inspection of the judgment roll. It is to be determined from the showing made upon the hearing in the lower court, and upon which the order was based. The affidavit of respondent states that her appeal was taken in good faith, and upon the advice of her attorney that she had good grounds for appeal from the judgment. Her appeal from the judgment is not necessarily to be heard upon the judgment roll alone. Her affidavit shows that she had filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial, and in support of it had prepared and served a bill of exceptions and filed affidavits. Upon the appeal from the judgment she will be entitled to use the bill of exceptions settled for use on the motion for a new trial, if she so desires. Wall v. Mines, 128 Cal. 136, 60 Pac. 682; Vinson v. Los Angeles Pacific Railroad Company, 141 Cal. 153, 74 Pac. 757. The lower court had a right to take all these matters into consideration in determining the question of good faith and merit. The respondent was not required to demonstrate that her appeal will be successful; she was only required to show to the satisfaction of the lower court that the appeal was taken in the belief, and upon the advice of her attorneys, that she had good grounds to expect a reversal upon all the record which she would be entitled to present to this court upon such appeal. The fact that the judge of the lower court before whom the case was tried, and who was therefore fully advised of all the proceedings therein, awarded her alimony, is some evidence that he believed there was merit in her appeal, and that it was being taken in good faith. If he believed otherwise, he would have denied the motion. In Bohnert v. Bohnert, supra, there was not as strong a showing, either as to good faith or a meritorious appeal, as appears in the case at bar, and yet in that case it was held that the record disclosed nothing to justify this court in disturbing the discretion in awarding alimony, pending the appeal, exercised by the trial court in that case, and, in our judgment, there is less warrant for doing so in the case at bar.

And, in passing, it may be said that this court will take judicial notice of proceedings had before us in this case which show that respondent has endeavored, in the apparent good faith with which the lower court found she was actuated in taking her appeal, to have her bill of exceptions settled to be used for all purposes for which it would be available to her, even to the extent of applying for and obtaining a writ of mandate from this court compelling the judge of the lower court who tried the case, and before whom the matter of settling the bill was pending, and who had refused to do so, to proceed to settle it. Gay v. Torrance, 143 Cal. 14, 76 Pac. 717. And other proceedings in this court bearing generally upon the same subject: Gay v. Torrance, 143 Cal. 169, 76 Pac. 973; Gay v. Torrance (Cal.) 78 Pac. 540.

It is contended, that the court was precluded from making the order appealed from because of the order of January 8, 1904, denying the application for alimony previously made; that the matter was res adjudicata. The doctrine of res adjudicata has no application to motions in a pending action, nor is it of moment that in denying the former application the court did so without prejudice to a renewal of the motion "in case a motion for a new trial is made and denied by this court." The court did not thereby preclude itself from entertaining a motion, subsequently made, before the disposition of the motion for a new trial, if it thought proper to do so. A renewal of the motion, supported by no additional evidence, might have afforded sufficient reason for the refusal of the court to again entertain it. But where a motion is renewed, based upon new evidence, it is within the discretion of the court to entertain it. When the application, which was denied on January 8, 1904, was made, no appeal from the judgment had been perfected by plaintiff. The subsequent motion, upon which the order in question is based, was made after such appeal was perfected, and the bill of exceptions on motion for a new trial served and the affidavits filed. This latter motion was made under a new state of facts, which in the judgment of the court warranted it in again entertaining the motion, and it had the discretion to do so. Johnson v. Brown, 115 Cal. 697, 47 Pac. 686.

It is further insisted by appellant that the court erred in making an allowance of $300 to respondent; that such an allowance was in the nature of a reimbursement for the cost of her past support; and that, under the provisions of section 137 of the Civil Code, the court was only authorized to make an allowance for future support. We are cited to Loveren v. Loveren, 100 Cal. 494, 35

Pac. 87, as supporting this view. The appeal in that case, however, involved the validity of an order of the lower court directing the defendant, on motion for that purpose, to repay plaintiff certain costs and expenses of the action, which she had incurred and paid. The order was reversed by this court, but the reversal was based upon the fact that the expenses for which she sought reimbursement had been actually paid with means derived from her separate estate or upon her own credit. But, in disposing of the matter, the court further said: "Such an allowance can only be granted as to expenses necessary to be incurred in the future prosecution or defense of the action, and cannot be made for the payment of past expenses, except where such payment is necessary to be made in order to enable the wife to further prosecute or defend her case."

If, then, it be conceded that, by parity of reasoning, the rule laid down in Loveren v. Loveren with reference to reimbursement for costs and expenses of the wife in an action of divorce should apply to an application by the wife for support and maintenance, still, in the case cited, the rule that payments for past expenses shall not be allowed is not absolute, but is subject to the qualification that such an order may be made whenever it appears that such payment is necessary to enable the wife to further prosecute or defend her case. And the same qualification to the rule should apply to applications by the wife for support. If it should appear to the court that it was necessary, in order to insure the support of the wife upon the amount to be paid to her periodically in the future, that existing wants or expenses incurred by her should be provided for, the court, within the qualification announced above, would have the right to do so.

And we think it is a fair and reasonable inference to be deduced from the terms of the order in question that the court deemed it necessary to make provision for the payment immediately (within three days after the order) of a lump sum of $300, in order that the respondent might be placed in a situation so that in the future she would be enabled to live upon the allowance provided to be paid her. This application was made in the same court and before the same judge who had tried the main cause, and who was familiar with all the facts and circumstances relative to the parties, and he, no doubt, took into consideration the fact that the court had previously judicially decided that $250 per month was a reasonable amount to be paid respondent for her support; that this order had been expressly vacated in the judgment; that in the interim between the entry of the judgment and the making of the present order the respondent was in indigent circumstances, and depending upon the charity of her relatives; that, necessarily, being without means, she must have been restricted in supplying herself with many things suitable to her condition in life—apparel and such incidentals as were necessary to her comfortable support—or that, if these things were supplied, they must have been obtained upon credit asked and extended on the faith of a subsequent allowance to be made by the court to meet them; that under this state of circumstances it would be only proper for the court to make an immediate allowance in gross, adequate to meet present actual wants arising therefrom, or to wipe out her indebtedness and restore her credit, or for both purposes. By doing this, in the first instance, the court realized that it would relieve her from embarrassment through existing wants or present indebtedness, obviate the necessity of devoting any part of the future allowance to pay such indebtedness, and so enable her to live in the future upon the allowances provided for that purpose, and, in addition to this, to provide her with means for her support from the date of the order (January 29th) to February 15th, when payment of her future monthly allowance was, by its terms, then to commence. While it is true that the terms of the order recite that respondent had received no alimony since October (which was a payment under the old order up to November 15, 1903), and that payment of $100 per month should date from November 15th, we are satisfied that this was but a recital of a reason, and the specification of a monthly amount which the court deemed should be taken as the basis for making the substantive part of the order awarding a gross amount to provide for her present wants and necessities, in order to insure her proper support in the future from the payment of the future allowances. When we take into consideration that the defendant is the owner of property of the value of $400,000, and in receipt of a monthly income of $550, the allowance to respondent of $100 per month is quite reasonable, and was doubtless placed at that figure because the court, having provided for her relief from present embarrassment by the award of $300, considered that, so relieved, she would in the future be able to support herself on her moderate monthly allowance.

Some point is made upon the rulings of the court relative to the admission and rejection of evidence upon the hearing of the motion, which we think untenable and requiring no discussion.

We find nothing in the record which would warrant a reversal of the order, and it is therefore affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.; SHAW, J.

MIDDLETON v. ARASTRAVILLE MIN. CO. et al. (Sac. 1,093.)

CORPORATIONS — MORTGAGE — VALIDITY—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION — RATIFICATION — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY — MECHANICS' LIENS—PRIORITIES.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 305, providing that corporate powers must be exercised by a board of directors "to be elected" from among the holders of the stock of the corporation, a mortgage executed by a corporation's president and secretary, in pursuance of a resolution of its board of directors who were named in the articles of incorporation as its board of directors for the first year is valid.

2. The "stock and transfer book," which, under Civ. Code, § 378, is required to be kept by corporations, is the criterion, under section 312, for determining the amount of stock held by any person, and for which he is entitled to cast a vote for any purpose at a stockholders' meeting; and hence the statement by the secretary, in his record of a stockholders' meeting, of the amount of stock held by a stockholder, made under section 377, requiring a record to be kept by corporations of every act done or ordered to be done, and of who were present and who absent at any meeting, must yield to the evidence derived from the "stock and transfer book."

3. The testimony of a stockholder as to the number of shares held by him at the time of an annual meeting of stockholders of a corporation, though subject to be overcome by the production of the stockbook required by Civ. Code, § 378, to be kept by corporations, must, in the absence of evidence therefrom, prevail over the unsupported recital of the secretary of the corporation in his minutes of the meeting made under section 377, requiring a record to be kept by corporations of every act done or ordered to be done, and who were present and who absent at any meeting.

4. In a mortgage foreclosure suit against a corporation, evidence examined, and held sufficient to show ratification by the stockholders of the mortgage on which the foreclosure was based.

5. The stockholders of a corporation do not hold a fiduciary relation to each other by which one is precluded from voting at a stockholders' meeting on a question in which he has an individual interest adverse to any of the other stockholders.

6. Under St. 1897, p. 96, c. 92, providing for attaching the certificate of the secretary to mortgages on the property of a corporation, the evidence of a ratification by the stockholders is not required to be attached to a mortgage of a corporation to give it validity, the ratification being complete on the adoption of a resolution therefor.

7. Where a mortgagee of a mining corporation's property was the general manager of the corporation while certain persons performed labor on the mining ground, and such labor was performed with the knowledge of such mortgagee, or even at his request, the lien of his mortgage, which was a matter of public record long prior to the time when the services were rendered, was not postponed to the liens acquired by virtue of such labor.

Commissioner's Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by Jonathan Middleton against the Arastraville Mining Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants other than the mining company appeal. Affirmed.

J. B. Curtin, J. P. O'Brien, and Chas. E. Dedrick, for appellants. F. W. Street, for respondent.

HARRISON, C. Action for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon certain mining property, executed to the plaintiff by the defendant corporation. The other defendants claim an interest in the property by virtue of certain mechanics' liens for labor performed upon the mining ground subsequent to the execution and recordation of the mortgage. The corporation suffered default, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the satisfaction of his claim, and for the satisfaction of the claims of the defendants out of the surplus. The latter have appealed from that portion of the judgment which postpones their liens to that of the plaintiff, and urge in support of their appeal that there was no valid execution of the plaintiff's mortgage; that its execution was not ratified by the holders of two-thirds of the capital stock of the corporation; and that the plaintiff is estopped from claiming a priority for his lien over their liens.

These propositions involve a consideration of the following facts: After the Secretary of State had issued his certificate that the articles of incorporation had been duly filed, the incorporators therein named adopted a code of by-laws, and on April 7, 1897, the persons named in the articles as directors for the first year organized as a board, and elected a president and secretary, and thereafter, on the same day, passed a resolution authorizing the president and secretary to enter into an agreement with the plaintiff herein for the purchase of certain mining property, including that described in the mortgage, upon certain specified terms. On April 12th the plaintiff herein executed to the corporation a conveyance of the said property, and as a part of the consideration therefor the president and secretary executed to him certain promissory notes of the corporation. May 25, 1897, the board of directors authorized an execution to him of a mortgage upon its mining property to secure the said promissory notes, and on the next day the mortgage described in the complaint herein was executed. The annual meeting of the stockholders was held July 20, 1897, and at that meeting a resolution was adopted approving and confirming the act of the directors in purchasing the said property and executing the said promissory notes and mortgage. During the years 1899 and 1900 the plaintiff was the manager of the defendant corporation, and the appellant Tonkins was the superintendent of its mining properties, and during that period the appellants other than Tonkins performed labor upon the said mining ground, with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, and afterwards filed in the recorder's office notices of their claim of mechanics' liens therefor. The appellant Tonkins, as said superintendent, performed labor and expended money on said mine for the corporation, and in September, 1900, in an action therefor against it, caused an attachment to be levied upon the property, and, subsequent to the commencement of the present action, obtained judgment against the corporation for the amount of his claim.

1. The objection to the sufficiency of the execution of the mortgage must be overruled. It was executed by the president and secretary of the corporation in pursuance of a resolution of the board of directors expressly authorizing them to execute it. The contention of the appellant that as, under section 305, Civ. Code, the corporate powers of the corporation are to be exercised by a board of directors "elected" from the stockholders, and as the directors in office at the time the mortgage was executed were merely the persons who had been named as such in the articles of incorporation, and had not been "elected," they could not confer any valid authority to execute the mortgage, would set at naught many of the provisions of the Code. By section 292, Civ. Code, upon the issuance by the Secretary of State of his certificate that proper articles of incorporation have been duly filed, the corporation is brought into existence with all the corporate rights and powers that are given by statute. The corporation can exercise these powers only through its board of directors, but it is not to be supposed that the Legislature intended that it should be an inert and lifeless body during the interim between its coming into existence and the time of holding its first annual meeting. The provision of section 290, Civ. Code, that the articles of incorporation must set forth the number of directors and the names and residences of those who are appointed for the first year, taken in connection with the provision of section 302, Civ. Code, that the directors are to be elected annually, and, in the absence of any by-law in reference thereto, that such election must be held on the first Tuesday in June, necessarily implies that in the interim between the organization of the corporation and the first election of directors the corporate powers and authority of the corporation may be exercised by the directors named in the articles of incorporation.

2. The objection that the mortgage was not ratified by the stockholders in the manner required by law is based upon the record made by the secretary of the proceedings had at the annual meeting in reference to such ratification. In this record he stated that there were present at the meeting the holders of 25,062 shares of the capital stock of the corporation, and that the resolution for ratifying the act of the directors was unanimously adopted. In this record it is also stated that the secretary announced to the meeting that 44,065 shares of the capital stock of the corporation had been issued, and it is urged by the appellants that it is thereby shown that the resolution did not receive the approval of the holders of two-thirds of the outstanding stock. The plaintiff, however, against the objection of the defendants, was allowed by the court to introduce other evidence, some of which was taken from the stockbook and stock journal kept by the corporation, and some of which was his own testimony, against the secretary's record of the annual meeting, both as to the amount of the outstanding stock and the amount represented at the meeting. From this evidence it appeared that only 41,365 shares had been issued, and that there were present at the meeting the holders of 31,775 shares; that is, 6,713 more shares than was stated in the record kept by the secretary. In the records of the meeting the secretary had stated that the plaintiff was present, and represented 11,515 shares. The plaintiff, however, testified at the trial that at that time he owned and held 18,828 shares of the capital stock that had been issued to him. It thus appears that by the unanimous vote of those present at the annual meeting the holders of more than two-thirds of the outstanding stock ratified the act of the directors. The court did not err in receiving this evidence. There is no principle of law or provision of statute under which the records of a private corporation kept by its secretary are to be regarded as conclusive evidence of the facts therein stated. See Thompson on Corp. §§ 7739, 7740. The record which section 377, Civ. Code, requires to be kept by the corporation of "every act done or ordered to be done" and of "who were present and who absent" at any meeting may be regarded as prima facie evidence thereof as between the members or stockholders of the corporation, but the secretary's record of the statement of a fact made to the meeting by himself or by any other, which is derived from some outside source, is not even prima facie evidence of that fact. The "stock and transfer book," which, under section 378, Civ. Code, the corporation is required to keep, is the source from which is to be ascertained the amount of outstanding stock, as well as the names of the several stockholders and the amount held by each, and is the criterion under section 312, Civ. Code, for determining the amount of stock held by any person, and for which he is entitled to cast a vote for any purpose at a stockholders' meeting. The statement by the secretary in his record of a stockholders' meeting of the amount of stock held by a stockholder must yield to the evidence derived from this book. The testimony of the plaintiff as to the number of shares held by him at the time of the annual meeting was a matter peculiarly within his knowledge, and, though subject to be overcome by the production of the stockbook, must, in the absence of evidence therefrom, prevail over the unsupported recital of the secretary in his minutes of that meeting. The court therefore did not err in holding that the evidence was sufficient to establish the ratification by the stockholders of the mortgage executed to the plaintiff.

The suggestion in the appellants' brief that by reason of his interest the plaintiff is disqualified from voting in favor of ratifying the act of the directors is without merit. The stockholders of a corporation do not hold a fiduciary relation to each other by which one is precluded from voting at a stockholders' meeting upon any question in which he has an individual interest adverse to any of the other stockholders.

3. The resolution adopted by the stockholders at their annual meeting was a sufficient ratification of this mortgage. The original purchase of the mining ground had been made under the express authorization of the entire body of stockholders at that time; and at the annual meeting the fact of its purchase was announced, and that in settlement therefor six promissory notes of the corporation for $1,000 each, secured by a lien upon the company's property, had been given to the grantor towards the payment of the purchase price. The stockholders were thus informed that the directors had created a lien upon the mining ground of the corporation, and also of the extent of that lien, and their action in unanimously approving and confirming this act of the directors, without seeking to be informed of the character of the lien, had the effect to ratify the creation of any lien placed upon the mining ground by the directors which would be a reasonable form of security for the promissory notes. The statute (St. 1897, p. 96, c. 92) does not require the evidence of this ratification to be attached to the mortgage. The ratification became complete upon the adoption of the resolution by the stockholders. The provision in the statute for attaching to the mortgage the secretary's certificate of its adoption is for the convenience of proof, and the prima facie character of such certificate as evidence yields to the production of the original record of its adoption.

4. The fact that the plaintiff was the general manager of the corporation during the time that the appellants performed their labor upon the mining ground, and that such labor was performed with his knowledge, or even at his request, did not have the effect to postpone the lien of his mortgage to the liens which they acquired by virtue of such labor. His mortgage had been executed and was a matter of public record long prior to the time when the others rendered their services, and they are held to have entered upon that service with notice that whatever rights they might acquire by reason thereof would be subject to the prior lien of his mortgage.

GRANNIS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY & COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 4,078.)

DIVORCE—FINAL DECREE—TIME OF ENTRY—NECESSITY OF INTERLOCUTORY DECREE—JUDGMENTS—MODIFICATION OF AMENDMENT—POWER OF COURT.

1. After proceedings to vacate or modify a judgment on motion for new trial, or on appeal, or under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, authorizing relief from judgments taken through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, etc., are ended, and the time therefor has expired, the superior court has no power to vacate or modify its judgments in a matter of substance, on account of judicial error in the decision, although such error is patent on the face of the record, but its power thereafter is limited to the correction of mere clerical misprisions on the record, or to the excision of such parts of the record as are void for want of jurisdiction or power.

2. As a general rule, a judgment rendered by a court which has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, however erroneous, is not void.

3. The provisions of the Code must be construed with a view to effect its objects, and when the language used is not entirely clear the court may, in aid of interpretation, consider the spirit, intention, and purpose of a law, and may look into contemporaneous and prior legislation on the same subject, and the external and historical facts and conditions which led to the enactment of the provisions under review.

4. St. 1897, p. 34, c. 36, amending Civ. Code, § 61, provided that a marriage contracted by a divorced person during the life of the former spouse and within one year after divorce should be void. The Supreme Court decided that marriages contracted without the state under the conditions specified in the section were valid. The Legislature in 1903 (St. 1903, pp. 75, 76, 176, cc. 67, 158) again amended section 61, and added two new sections, numbered 131 and 132, to the Civil Code. Section 61 as last amended provides that in no case can a marriage of either of the parties contracted during the life of the other and within one year after the entry of an interlocutory decree of divorce be valid. Section 131 requires the court, if it determines that a divorce ought to be granted, to enter an interlocutory judgment, from which an appeal may be taken within six months. Section 132 provides that after a year from the entry of the interlocutory judgment the court may enter final judgment, unless appeal has been taken from the interlocutory judgment, or motion for new trial made, in which case final judgment shall not be entered until such motion or appeal has been disposed of. Held, that the purpose of this legislation was to prevent collusive divorces and hasty remarriages, and complications arising from such remarriages prior to the final disposition of the cause on motion for a new trial or appeal, and to effect this purpose a final judgment entered prior to the expiration of a year from the date of the interlocutory judgment, or without any interlocutory judgment, would be absolutely void, regardless of any considerations of waiver, consent, or acquiescence of the parties.

5. The right to divorce is statutory and subject to regulation by the Legislature, which may impose restrictions or delays in regard to the time for beginning the action, or the method and order of procedure after the same is begun; and hence the legislation of 1903 (St. 1903, pp. 75, 76, c. 67), adding to the Civil Code sections 131, 132, prohibiting the granting of absolute divorces until the expiration of a year from the entry of an interlocutory decree, is constitutional.

6. Where a judgment was, in so far as it purported to grant an immediate divorce, void as being entered without any interlocutory judgment, as required by Civ. Code, §§ 131, 132, it was within the power of the superior court at any time, on motion of either party, or of its own motion, to vacate so much of the decree as awarded an absolute divorce, leaving the remainder of it, determining that the party was entitled to a divorce, unmodified and unaffected.

In Bank.

Petition by James G. Grannis for a writ of prohibition against the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco and Hon. John Hunt, judge thereof. Denied. See 77 Pac. 647.

Galpin & Bolton, for petitioner. A. P. Van Duzer, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding in prohibition to prevent the superior court of San Francisco from acting upon a motion pending before it to modify a judgment.

On June 25, 1903, an action for divorce, in which Amelia B. Grannis was plaintiff and James G. Grannis was defendant, was regularly tried by the superior court, and on July 1, 1903, said court rendered and entered its judgment in said action purporting to grant an absolute and immediate divorce to the plaintiff. The decree as entered was signed by the judge, and the decree proper was preceded by a recital that it appeared to the court "that all the allegations contained in the plaintiff's complaint are true," except certain facts not material. There were other recitals which were equivalent to special findings as to the amount of the community property and as to the children, which are immaterial to the consideration of the present case. The portion of the entry constituting the judgment of divorce was as follows: "It is now, therefore, ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows, to wit: That the marriage between the plaintiff, Amelia B. Grannis, and the defendant, James G. Grannis, be dissolved, and the same is hereby dissolved, and said parties are, and each of them is, freed and absolutely released from the bonds of matrimony existing between them, and all the obligations thereof." Other provisions of the decree disposed of the property and the custody of the children.

Proceedings on appeal and motion for new trial having terminated without effect, the plaintiff on August 31, 1904, more than a year after the judgment, served on the defendant notice of a motion to set aside the portion of the decree above quoted, on the ground that it was void, it being, in form and effect, a final judgment of divorce instead of the interlocutory judgment prescribed by the act of 1903. In pursuance of this notice, plaintiff, on September 2, 1904, presented the motion to the court, and the court, against the defendant's objections, declared its intention to determine said motion, and to make an order, to quote its own language, "that so much of said decree as awards to the said plaintiff an absolute decree is hereby vacated and set aside; but said decree, in so far as it may determine that the plaintiff is entitled to a divorce, shall be in no way modified or affected by this order." The object of the present proceeding is to prevent the superior court from making the order, or from further proceeding in pursuance of the motion.

The contention of the petitioner is that the judgment entered by the court on July 1, 1903, was, both in form and effect, a judgment of absolute divorce, and that, as proceedings for new trial and on appeal have ended, and more than six months had elapsed at the time proceedings on the motion were begun, the superior court has no power to modify or vacate it.

After proceedings to vacate or modify a judgment on motion for new trial, or on appeal, or under section 473, Code Civ. Proc., are ended, and the time therefor has expired, the superior court has no power or authority to vacate or modify its judgment, in a matter of substance, on account of judicial error in the decision, no matter how apparent such error may be on the face of the record. Its power thereafter is limited to the correction of mere clerical misprisions on the record, or to the excision of such parts of the record as appear to be, or can be shown to be, void for lack of jurisdiction or power. Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 15, 20, 27 Pac. 22; Jacks v. Baldez, 97 Cal. 91, 31 Pac. 899; Norton v. A. T. & S. F. R. R. Co., 97 Cal. 390, 30 Pac. 585, 32 Pac. 452, 33 Am. St. Rep. 198. The modification proposed to be made herein is not the correction of a clerical error, but goes to the substance and effect of the judgment.

Under these circumstances the superior court has no power to make the order in question unless the judgment proposed to be so modified is absolutely void as a final judgment. When the judgment was rendered the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter in general and of the parties. The general rule is that, under such circumstances, a judgment, however erroneous, is not void. It must be conceded that the court cannot make this order unless, by the legislation of 1903 (St. 1903, pp. 75, 76, 176, cc. 67, 158), amending section 61 of the Civil Code and adding thereto sections 131 and 132, the court is divested of power to enter a final judgment granting a divorce until it has first entered an interlocutory judgment declaring a party entitled to a divorce, and an interval of one year has passed thereafter before such final judgment.

The provisions of the Code must be construed with a view to effect its objects (Civ. Code, § 4), and when the language used is not entirely clear the court may, to determine the meaning, and in aid of the interpretation, consider the spirit, intention, and purpose of a law, and to ascertain such object and purpose may look into contemporaneous and prior legislation on the same subject, and the external and historical facts and condition which led to its enactment. 26 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 601, 602, 603, 623–4, 632.

The institution of marriage is an important feature of civilization, and its preservation is essential to the maintenance of organized society. As was said in Deyoe v. Sup. Court, 140 Cal. 482, 74 Pac. 30, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73: "In every civilized country marriage is recognized as the most important relation in life, and one in which the state is vitally interested. * * * The well-recognized public policy relating to marriage is to foster and protect it, to make it a permanent and public institution, to encourage parties to live together, and to prevent separation and illicit unions." Owing to the strength of human passions and the weakness of human nature, the regulation and preservation of the institution of marriage, and the prevention of the abuse of the right of divorce, have always been one of the most difficult problems of government. It has been considered essential to the promotion of happiness and the good order of society to provide that for certain offenses against marital rights the innocent party could, under fixed restrictions, have the marriage dissolved by judicial decree. But it has been found that this right is often abused; that by collusion and fraud, by fabricated testimony, or by the exaggeration of trifling offenses, divorces are obtained which should not have been granted; that when the procedure is easy and speedy slight causes are magnified and made the pretext for hasty divorces, and that too frequently actions for divorce are not prompted by the necessity of relief from marriage bonds which, by the fault of the other party, have become the cause of misery and suffering, but are inspired by a desire to become free from the old obligations in order to make a new alliance. It has also been found that in some cases difficult complications occur arising from divorced persons contracting a subsequent marriage before the judgment of divorce became final by the expiration of the time within which an appeal could be taken. To prevent or mitigate these evils, it has always been the legislative policy to make many restrictions in the procedure in divorce cases which are not applicable in ordinary actions.

In continuation of this policy the Legislature in 1897 amended section 61 of the Civil Code so as to provide that a marriage contracted by a divorced person during the life of the former spouse, and within one year after the time of the judgment of divorce, should be illegal and void. St. 1897, p. 34, c. 36. Immediately it was contended that this law was of no effect beyond the confines of the state, and that marriages solemnized during the year after the divorce, within another state or territory, which were valid by the laws of such state or territory, must be recognized as valid in this state. Numerous attempts thus to evade the law were made, and much difference of opinion existed as to the legality of such marriages, until finally, in August, 1902, it was decided by this court that such marriages were valid in this state, and the question was thus settled. Estate of Wood, 137 Cal. 130, 69 Pac. 900. Thereupon the act of 1897 became practically a dead letter. All who wished to enter into another marriage within the year easily accomplished their purpose and evaded the law by a short journey beyond the borders of the state.

At its next ensuing session the Legislature passed the acts making a second amendment to section 61, and adding the new sections, as above mentioned. By the last amendment to section 61 it was provided, with respect to a second marriage to a different person during the life of a former spouse, that "in no case can a marriage of either of the parties during the life of the other be valid in this state, if contracted within one year after the entry of an interlocutory decree in a proceeding for a divorce." The new sections 131 and 132 are as follows:

"Sec. 131. In actions for divorce the court must file its decision and conclusions of law as in other cases, and if it determines that no divorce shall be granted, final judgment must thereupon be entered accordingly. If it determines that the divorce ought to be granted an interlocutory judgment must be entered, declaring that the party in whose favor the court decides is entitled to a divorce, and from such interlocutory judgment an appeal may be taken within six months after its entry, in the same manner and with like effect as if the judgment were final.

"Sec. 132. When one year has expired after the entry of such interlocutory judgment, the court on motion of either party, or upon its own motion, may enter the final judgment granting the divorce, and such final judgment shall restore them to the status of single persons, and permit either to marry after the entry thereof; and such other and further relief as may be necessary to complete the disposition of the action, but if any appeal is taken from the interlocutory judgment or motion for a new trial made, final judgment shall not be entered until such motion or appeal has been finally disposed of, nor then, if the motion has been granted or judgment reversed. The death of either party after the entry of the interlocutory judgment does not impair the power of the court to enter final judgment as hereinbefore provided; but such entry shall not validate any marriage contracted by either party before the entry of such final judgment, nor constitute any defense of any criminal prosecution made against either."

The manifest purpose of these several amendments was to avoid the effect of the decision in Estate of Wood, supra, by going a step further than the law of 1897. That law simply prohibited a remarriage within one year, and made such marriage illegal and void if made within this state, but it did not affect the procedure in an action for a divorce, nor the validity or effect of a judgment therein. The law of 1903 acts upon the proceeding and upon the judgment, and secures the same period of delay as the former act, by providing for a delay in the entry of final judgment dissolving the marriage for at least one year after the trial and interlocutory judgment in the action. It thus presents the same obstacle to speedy divorces, the same opportunity for reflection and reconciliation, and the same check to collusion and fraud, and in the meantime it effectually prevents a subsequent marriage with another person by the simple provision that the former marriage, during the interval, shall remain undissolved. The ultimate object, of course, was to reach and mitigate the same evils to which the act of 1897 was directed.

For a time after this act took effect there was some difference of opinion among the judges of the superior courts with respect to its validity, several of them holding it unconstitutional, and granting what purported to be immediate final judgments of divorce in disregard of its provisions. The question was settled in favor of the validity of the law by this court in Deyoe v. Sup. Court, supra. In the meantime, however, a number of so-called final judgments had been entered, among them the one here involved.

It is obvious that the entire purpose of this legislation will be practically defeated if the law receives a construction which will enable the courts at the request, or with the consent, express or implied, of the parties, or either of them, to give final judgment immediately upon the trial, and without a previous interlocutory judgment. In order to reach this conclusion the law must be held to be merely directory in this respect, and the disregard of it a mere error not affecting its validity except upon appeal or in some form of direct attack. The departure from the prescribed order of proceeding, with the consent or acquiescence of the parties, must be considered as an irregularity which is waived, and the giving of an immediate final judgment held an error which, whether expressly waived or not, can be effectively cured, and the judgment placed beyond attack, by the mere failure to appeal. Persons seeking or submitting to a divorce for the purpose of entering into another marriage, or in collusion for any improper purpose, will request, consent to, or acquiesce in an immediate final judgment, many cases will occur in which it will seem a harmless deviation from the strict course of procedure, the matter will seem unimportant, and the desire or request of the parties or the seeming necessities of exceptional cases will prevail, and final judgments will be immediately given. It will soon become customary. The evil-disposed persons against whom alone the law is directed will be the ones who will avail themselves of this opportunity to evade its true intent and purpose.

In view of these considerations we think that, if it is reasonably possible, the terms of the act should receive a construction calculated to make its object and purpose secure, and which will make it impossible for either party to contract another lawful marriage within a year from the time of the trial and interlocutory judgment. The language is clearly susceptible of this construction, and the object and purpose to be accomplished make it necessary to reject any other construction. It declares that "if it [the court] determines that the divorce ought to be granted an interlocutory judgment must be entered" (section 131); and further, that "when one year has expired after the entry of such interlocutory judgment the court * * * may enter the final judgment granting the divorce, and such final judgment shall restore them to the status of single persons;" and that if an appeal is taken from the interlocutory judgment, or a motion for a new trial is made, "final judgment shall not be entered until such appeal or motion has been finally disposed of" (section 132); and by section 61 a subsequent marriage is made void if contracted within the year after the interlocutory judgment. These provisions, interpreted in the light of the previous legislation and decisions and the purpose to be accomplished by the law, are clearly to be understood as a limitation on the power of the court in the matter, and as intended to forbid the entry of a final judgment until after the prescribed period. The law can only be made effectual for the accomplishment of its object by holding that any final judgment purporting to grant the divorce is absolutely void if thus prematurely entered.

This conclusion receives additional support from a consideration of the nature of a proceeding for a divorce and of the recognized public policy on the subject. The parties to such an action have not the right to control procedure as in other actions. The court is not bound by admissions in the pleadings, nor by the stipulations of the parties, nor is its inquiry as to the facts limited by the pleadings. 7 Ency. of L. & Pr., 88, 121. Nor can a divorce be granted solely upon the testimony or admissions of the parties. Civ. Code, § 130; 9 Am. & Eng. Ency. of L. 845. The state is interested in the matter. In Deyoe v. Sup. Court it is said: "While an action to obtain a decree dissolving the relation of husband and wife is nominally an action between two parties, the state, because of its interest in maintaining the same unless good cause for its dissolution exists, is an interested party. It has been said by eminent writers upon the subject that such an action is really a triangular proceeding in which the husband and wife and the state are parties." Page 482 of 140 Cal., page 28 of 74 Pac. (98 Am. St. Rep. 73). See, also, McBlain v. McBlain, 77 Cal. 507, 20 Pac. 6; Warner v. Warner, 100 Cal. 11, 34 Pac. 523; Hatton v. Hatton, 136 Cal. 356, 68 Pac. 1016; Newman v. Freitas, 129 Cal. 292, 61 Pac. 907, 50 L. R. A. 548; 1 Nelson Div. §§ 1, 7, pp. 2, 17. The rule in actions affecting property, that the parties interested may control the disposition of the interests involved, and that the judgment of the court will be made to conform to such dispositions, when ascertained, has no application to divorce cases. Hence it follows that in such cases there can be no effectual waiver by the parties of any restriction established by law for the benefit of the public, or for the protection of the interest which the state has in the preservation and permanence of the marriage relation. The provision forbidding the granting of a divorce solely upon the admission, stipulation, or testimony of the parties goes to the sufficiency of the proof, which is not ordinarily disclosed upon the record. A disregard of this provision cannot be made to appear of record except upon appeal, and for this reason it cannot be made the subject of inquiry upon any collateral attack. But on appeal, where such disregard appears, it is always held to be an act beyond the power of the court to do, or of the parties to sanction, and absolutely void. The restriction now under consideration is of such a nature that a disregard of it must always be apparent upon the face of the record, and consequently the lack of power in the court will appear in every case upon an inspection of the record alone.

The rule invoked by the petitioner, taken in connection with the construction we have given to the act, would put the premature entry of final judgment of divorces in the class of errors which can always be reached on collateral attack. Tallman v. McCarty, 11 Wis. 406, cited and relied on by petitioner, states it as favorably to him as any case that can be found. The law of Wisconsin provided that in partition suits there should be an interlocutory judgment declaring the interests of the parties, that commissioners to make partition were then to be appointed, and upon the confirmation of their report the court was authorized to render a final judgment of partition. Commissioners were appointed and final judgment rendered in accordance with their report, but there had been no interlocutory judgment. On collateral attack in that case the court held the judgment valid, and said: "No order which a court is empowered under any circumstances, in the course of a proceeding over which it had jurisdiction, to make, can be treated as a nullity merely because it was made improvidently, or in a manner not warranted by law or the previous state of the case. The only question in such a case is, had the court or tribunal the power, under any circumstances, to make the order or perform the act? If this be answered in the affirmative, then its decision upon those circumstances becomes final and conclusive, until reversed by a direct proceeding for that purpose." (The italics are our own.) It is to be observed that no question of public policy was there involved, and that the public had no particular interest in the decision of the case, nor was there anything in the statute governing the procedure in that case which could be construed as a restriction upon the ordinary powers of the court. In a partition suit the parties could agree as to their respective interests, could waive an interlocutory judgment and consent to the immediate appointment of commissioners, or even to an immediate final judgment, without any preliminary proceedings at all, without in any respect contravening public policy, or transgressing restrictions made to protect the interests of society. The law in question in this case, as we have construed it, was intended as a limitation upon the power of the court with respect to the subject-matter, so that the court shall not be competent to grant a final divorce at any time during the year succeeding the interlocutory judgment, and so as to require that the interlocutory judgment be first entered. The parties could not waive these proceedings, nor invest power in the court by their consent or acquiescence. The purpose of the statute is to provide that in any event and under all circumstances there shall be an interval of one year after the party is declared to be entitled to a divorce before it can become absolute. The question above stated cannot here be affirmatively answered. There can be no state of facts which will give the court power to enter final judgment immediately. Hence, upon the face of the record and as a matter of law, the final judgment in question is, as a final judgment, without actual or possible authority, and is therefore necessarily void.

The cases holding judgments valid on collateral attack, although they may be necessarily founded upon an erroneous view of the law, are none of them cases in which the law which the court mistook was the law which vested the jurisdiction or power over the subject-matter in the court. So far as they are cases involving jurisdiction of this class at all they are confined to instances where the jurisdiction over the subject-matter is by law made to depend on the preliminary determination of a question of fact. In that event a determination of the court rendering the judgment that the facts which give the jurisdiction exist is conclusive in all collateral inquiries. Farmers' & M. Bank v. Board, 97 Cal. 328, 32 Pac. 312; In re Grove St., 61 Cal. 438; Cahill v. Superior Court (Cal.) 78 Pac. 467. But where the question upon which the jurisdiction depends is one of law purely, the jurisdiction over the subject-matter is always open to collateral inquiry. In re Grove St., supra; Arroyo D. & W. Co. v. Superior Court, 92 Cal. 52, 28 Pac. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 91; Cahill v. Court, supra. Mr. Freeman says: "When a tribunal has not jurisdiction over the subject-matter, no averment can supply the defect; no amount of proof can alter the case. As power over the subject-matter is given by law, nothing but an additional grant from the legislative authority can extend that power over a class of cases formerly excepted." 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 120. And also: "If a court grants relief which under no circumstances it has any authority to grant, its judgment is to that extent void." Id. § 120c.

It is contended that the law, if thus construed, would be unconstitutional. The Constitution, it is said, confers upon the superior court full jurisdiction of actions for divorce, and the effect of this law would be to arrest the exercise of this jurisdiction, and suspend further action for one year; and if it can do this for one year it must have power to suspend its action indefinitely, or absolutely, and for an unlimited time, and if such power exists the Legislature may thus practically destroy or divest the jurisdiction given by the Constitution. If it were necessary to the validity of this act to hold that the Legislature has power to suspend absolutely the functions of the superior court, the argument might have weight. We do not consider it necessary. It is sufficient to hold that the Legislature has power to make reasonable regulations as to the proceedings by which the jurisdiction in such cases is exercised, and to prescribe the terms and conditions on which a divorce may be granted, and that in view of the subject-matter of the act and the object in view a provision for the postponement of final judgment for one year, and a suspension of the power of the court to enter such judgment in the meantime, is not an unreasonable regulation of the procedure, and is within the legislative power to prescribe, as a condition necessary to the existence of the right to a divorce. The right to a divorce is subject to the legislative will and exists only by legislative grant. The change in the method made by this law affects only the procedure and the right of the parties to an immediate divorce, and does not take jurisdiction from the court. The right to a divorce not being inherent or constitutional, but statutory, the Legislature could repeal the law, and thus effectually prevent the granting of any divorces, or it could suspend the right for any number of years after the beginning of the action, without affecting the jurisdiction of the court. The Legislature has complete control of the subject, and may impose whatever restrictions or delays it pleases, either in regard to the time for beginning the action, or the method and order of procedure after the action is begun. The grant of jurisdiction means only that such limited rights of divorce as the Legislature provides are cognizable in the superior court under such system of procedure and subject to such restrictions as may from time to time be established.

The judgment in question, being wholly void as a final judgment granting an immediate divorce, it was within the power of the superior court, at any time, on motion of either party, or of its own motion, to declare it null, in so far as it purported to be of such effect. People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 675, 77 Pac. 651; People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 453, 37 Pac. 414.

It is urged that "the greater contains the less" (Civ. Code, § 3536), and hence that, as the judgment in question necessarily determines that the plaintiff is entitled to a divorce, it is therefore valid to that extent as an interlocutory judgment under the statute, and that the court should not vacate it, but should regard it as valid to that extent, and, the year having expired, should now enter a final judgment. Cases are cited to the effect that a judgment for too much, or in excess of the power of the court, is not wholly void, but is void only in so far as it is beyond the jurisdiction. Anderson v. Parker, 6 Cal. 201; Ex parte Rosenheim, 83 Cal. 388, 23 Pac. 372; People v. Brown, 113 Cal. 35, 45 Pac. 181. For the purposes of this decision this may be conceded. There are strong reasons in support of the proposition. If the order proposed to be entered by the superior court in pursuance of the motion was as far reaching as the motion, and purported to set aside the judgment for all purposes, it would be necessary to decide the question. It does not go so far. It purports only to vacate "so much of the decree as awards to the said plaintiff an absolute divorce," and expressly declares that, "in so far as it may determine that the plaintiff is entitled to a divorce," the judgment is neither to be modified nor affected by the order. The proposed order is therefore strictly within the power of the superior court, and the writ of prohibition should not be issued.

The petition is denied.

CLAUDIUS v. MELVIN, Judge. (S. F. 4,073.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 8, 1905.)

DIVORCE—INTERLOCUTORY AND FINAL DECREES—VALIDITY—"YEAR"—NUNC PRO TUNC ENTRY—COMPUTATION OF TIME—STATUTE—REFUSAL OF FINAL DECREE—MANDAMUS.

1. Where an interlocutory decree of divorce is ordered entered nunc pro tunc, the year which must elapse before final judgment can be given begins to run from the time of the actual entry of the interlocutory judgment.

2. A decree declaring that "it appears that all the allegations of the complaint are sustained; that the matter so alleged and proved in behalf of plaintiff is sufficient in law to entitle the plaintiff to the relief as prayed for in the complaint"—sufficiently declares "that the party in whose favor the court decides is entitled to a divorce," within Civ. Code, § 131, providing that if the court decides that a divorce ought to be granted it shall enter such an interlocutory decree.

3. Where a decree of divorce embraced both an interlocutory and final judgment, and they were simultaneously entered, but the part purporting to grant an immediate divorce was void because at that time the year from the entry of the interlocutory judgment had not expired, the validity of the interlocutory judgment was not affected thereby.

4. Where a valid interlocutory decree of divorce had been entered, and the time had passed for its vacation on appeal, by motion for new trial or otherwise, an order of the trial court purporting to set aside such interlocutory decree was without jurisdiction, and therefore void.

5. After a valid interlocutory decree of divorce has been entered a year, the trial court may be compelled by mandamus to make and cause to be entered a final decree on refusal of an application therefor.

In Bank. Original proceeding by P. Claudius against Henry A. Melvin, judge of the superior court of Alameda county, for writ of mandamus. Granted.

Asa V. Mendenhall and A. E. Bolton, amicus curiæ, for petitioner. T. W. Harris and A. P. Van Duzer, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an original proceeding in this court to obtain a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, as judge of the superior court, to make and cause to be entered a final judgment of divorce in an action in the superior court of Alameda county wherein P. Claudius is plaintiff and Gesine Claudius is defendant.

The case is submitted to us upon a demurrer to the petition. The facts are as follows: The action for divorce was commenced on August 14, 1903. The defendant was duly served with summons, and on August 27, 1903, her default was duly entered for failure to appear or answer. The matter was then referred to a referee for the taking of testimony, and on September 4, 1903, the court, upon the referee's report, made what is styled a final decree granting the divorce. The petition for mandate does not allege that this decree was entered, but as both parties in their briefs say it was entered at the time it was made, and argue the case on that hypothesis, we will consider the petition as amended in this particular. Thereafter, on September 15, 1904, on motion of plaintiff, the court made an order purporting to set aside said final decree on the ground that it was void, and further ordered that an interlocutory decree, declaring the plaintiff entitled to the divorce prayed for, be entered nunc pro tunc as of date September 4, 1903, and the same was entered accordingly. On September 21, 1904, plaintiff applied for a final decree, which was refused by the court on the ground that the formal interlocutory decree, though entered nunc pro tunc as of September 4, 1903, was not in fact entered until September 15, 1904; that one year had not passed since the date of actual entry, and that it was the time of the actual entry of the interlocutory decree, and not the theoretical entry thereof, which fixed the time after which the final decree could be entered. It is this final decree which the plaintiff seeks to procure by the mandate.

We think the defendant is correct in the position that the year which must elapse before final judgment can be given begins to run from the time of the actual entry of the interlocutory judgment, and not from any theoretical nunc pro tunc date of entry.

We are of the opinion, however, that plaintiff for other reasons is entitled to the mandate. In the case of Grannis v. Superior Court, 79 Pac. 891 (decided this day), we held that a final decree, entered immediately after the trial or hearing, is absolutely void in so far as it purports to be final. It was not necessary in that case to determine whether or not a decree which purported to be a final judgment and was void as such could, nevertheless, stand as a valid interlocutory decree, if in form it was sufficient therefor. In this case the question is squarely presented.

The decree entered on September 4, 1903, declared that "it appears that all the allegations of the complaint are sustained by competent testimony; that said matter, so alleged and proved in behalf of plaintiff, is sufficient in law to entitle said plaintiff to the relief as prayed for in said complaint." Thereupon followed the usual form of judgment of divorce. Section 131, Civ. Code, provides that if the court decides that the divorce ought to be granted it shall enter an interlocutory judgment declaring "that the party in whose favor the court decides is entitled to a divorce." This the part of the decree above quoted substantially does. It was therefore sufficient in form for a valid interlocutory judgment. The entire decree embraced both an interlocutory and a final judgment and they were simultaneously entered. The part purporting to grant an immediate divorce was void because at that time the year from the entry of the interlocutory judgment had not expired. It is a well-settled proposition that a judgment may be in part valid and in part void. Unless the two portions are so inseparably connected that the one part cannot be declared void without vitiating the other, the rule is that the portion which is not in excess of jurisdiction may stand and the remainder be considered null. Where a part of a judgment is valid it may be to that extent enforced, although another provision of the same judgment may be in excess of the power of the court, and for that reason void. People v. Brown, 113 Cal. 36, 45 Pac. 181; Ex parte Rosenheim, 83 Cal. 392, 23 Pac. 372; Anderson v. Parker, 6 Cal. 201. The judgment entered on September 4, 1903, therefore constituted a valid interlocutory judgment declaring the plaintiff entitled to a divorce. As such it was subject to be vacated on appeal, or on motion for new trial, or by proceedings under section 473, Code Civ. Proc. The time for all these proceedings having expired, and no such proceeding to vacate it having been instituted, the court thereupon lost all power by any proceeding in the case to modify or vacate the judgment, in so far as it constituted an interlocutory judgment. All that the court could do at the time it made the order purporting to set aside the whole judgment was to vacate the part purporting to be a decree of immediate divorce. In People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 675, 77 Pac. 651, speaking of a valid judgment under similar circumstances, the court said: "Under such circumstances the judgment is entirely beyond the reach of the court that rendered it, except in a separate action, and any order of the court purporting to vacate it is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore void. Such an order occupies no better position than a judgment that is void upon its face, and, like such a judgment, is assailable wherever and whenever it may be produced, and whether the attack upon it be direct or collateral"—citing People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414, and Moore v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 495, 25 Pac. 22. It follows that the order of the court made on September 15, 1904, purporting to set aside the whole of the judgment of September 4, 1903, was itself wholly void in so far as it attempted to affect the part of said judgment declaring the plaintiff entitled to a divorce, and the interlocutory judgment remained unaffected.

The entry of an interlocutory decree nunc pro tunc was unnecessary, the order to enter it was without authority, and that part of the proceedings was entirely nugatory and may be disregarded. A year had elapsed between the time of the actual entry of the first judgment, which stands as a sufficient interlocutory judgment, and the application of the plaintiff for a final judgment. He was therefore at that time entitled to a judgment granting the divorce, and the defendant should have complied with his request to make and enter the same.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. SAN FRANCISCO SAV. UNION et al. (L. A. 1,296.)

EMINENT DOMAIN — CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—VALUATION OF PROPERTY—SEPARATION OF EASEMENT AND FEE—MINERAL AND OIL LANDS—EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY—MOTIONS TO STRIKE.

1. Where there is no substantial difference between the value of the fee and the value of the easement to be taken by condemnation proceedings, the value of the fee may be proven and assessed as damages; but where it can be shown as a fact that the fee, burdened with the easement, is of some substantial value to the owner, as where the underlying estate is valuable for the minerals it contains, this value is reserved to the owner, and must be taken into consideration in determining the damages to be awarded for the imposition of the easement upon the land.

2. A railroad acquires by condemnation proceedings the permanent and exclusive control of the surface of the land, but acquires no title to minerals or oils beneath the surface, and no right to appropriate them; but such right remains in the owner of the fee subject only to the obligation of supporting the railroad's easement.

3. Where an easement over oil land is condemned to be used as a right of way for a railroad, the railroad must pay the full value of the fee as oil land, if the reservation to the owner of the fee of oil rights is rendered of no value because of the railroad's appropriation of the surface; but the railroad may show, if possible, that a beneficial ownership in the oils underlying the right of way is reserved to the owner of the fee, and, if it makes such showing, the value of the beneficial ownership must be taken into consideration as something separate from the value of the easement, and the value of the easement alone be assessed as damages.

4. In proceedings to condemn a right of way over oil fields, an expert may testify as to matters which would influence him from the standpoint of a contemplating buyer in determining the market value of the land in an oil-bearing territory, the number of wells which could be economically placed on the amount of land taken, and ordinary losses therefrom, and the general relation of outlay to income; and such testimony is not objectionable as conjectural and speculative.

5. But further testimony of the witness that he would take into consideration what "he could pay for it and have sufficient margin for speculation during at least five years" is incompetent on the issue of market value.

6. A motion to strike out testimony was properly denied, where part of the testimony subject to the motion was proper, although another part was improper.

7. In proceedings to condemn a right of way over oil-bearing lands, it is permissible to show, on the issue of value, a progressive decrease in the productiveness of the field within which the land in question is situated.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; William S. Day, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against the San Francisco Savings Union and another. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Canfield & Starbuck, for appellant. Richards & Carrier, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought to condemn a right of way for a relocated railroad of plaintiff in the county of Santa Barbara. The strip sought to be condemned consisted of about two-thirds of an acre of land belonging to the defendant corporation. This strip lay along the southern boundary of a larger tract, several acres in extent, belonging to the same owner, and located within the exterior limits of the Summerland oil field, or district, in which the oil flows naturally from higher or shallower to lower or deeper wells. The defendant Becker has an interest in both pieces of property under a contract with the defendant corporation. The case was tried before a jury, and, all issues having been waived except as to the value of the property taken, the evidence in the case was limited solely to that question, and, being submitted to the jury, a verdict was rendered in favor of defendants. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and from the order denying it appeals.

The main point on this appeal relates to the proper measure of value which should be applied in a suit to condemn land of the character involved here, namely oil land—whether an easement acquired over a strip of oil-bearing land, part of a larger tract of the same character owned by the same person, is equivalent to taking the fee, and must be paid for as of the value of the fee, or may it, when applied to such land, be an interest different in law from the fee, having a substantially different value, and to prove which the defendant should be permitted to introduce evidence? The lower court held, as a matter of law, that in condemning a right of way over this strip of land, part of a larger tract of oil-bearing land, there could be no difference in value between the easement and the fee, and, not only, over plaintiff's objections, permitted defendants to address their evidence solely to the value of the fee, but instructed the jury that defendants were entitled to have an award to that extent. It was insisted by the plaintiff upon the trial that it sought, and under the law was entitled to condemn, only an easement in the property, and endeavored, by cross-examination of defendants' witnesses and by witnesses produced upon its own part, to show that there was, in fact, a substantial difference in value between the fee in this land and the easement it sought to condemn for a right of way across it. The court refused to permit them to make this showing, and under all these rulings the question whether the court was correct as to the measure of value it applied, is presented.

While it is no doubt true that under the law of this state a railroad company is only entitled to acquire by condemnation proceedings an easement over the land, and that the fee thereof remains in the owner, yet in most condemnation cases by railroad companies this distinction, as far as it enters into a determination of the damages to be assessed for the right of way acquired thereby, has no practical application. Usually in such cases there is no substantial difference in value between the easement and the fee of which the law will take notice. Hence, in ordinary cases, where condemnation for a right of way for railroad purposes is sought, evidence is permitted to show, as the damages sustained, the full value of the land taken, upon the theory that the easement will be perpetual; that the right of way acquired, though technically an easement, will be permanent in its nature, and the possibility of abandonment by nonuser so remote and improbable as not to be taken into consideration; that the exercise of the right will require practically the exclusive use of the surface; and that any interest which might be reserved to the owner in the fee would only be a nominal one and of no value. Under such circumstances, as there can be no substantial determinative value in the fee apart from the easement, the law will not consider them separately, but will require the condemning corporation to pay the value of the fee as the measure of damages sustained. To illustrate: Where a right of way is condemned over agricultural land or over building lots, this is in effect to take the entire value of the land. In either case the underlying ground upon which the easement is imposed can be of no value to the owner. The sole value of such lands consists of the use to which the owner could devote the surface —to cultivation or building—and, when he is deprived of that use, the entire value of the land is taken from him, and hence, for all beneficial purposes to the owner, there can be no difference in value between the easement and the fee. They are substantially identical in value. And to illustrate further: If the whole of a tract of mineral land is to be condemned, whether such mineral has a fixed situs, such as gold, iron, or coal, or the land overlies minerals of a fugitive and wandering nature, such as petroleum oil or natural gas, which may be drawn from it, the same rule for determining the easement taken would apply. As these minerals can only be reached from the surface, when all the surface is taken from him, the owner is deprived of the entire value of his land. A reserved ownership in the minerals would be merely nominal, and of no advantage or benefit to him. So that, in all these cases which we have instanced, it would be idle to endeavor to distinguish, in assessing damages, between the value of the easement and the value of the fee, because, in the nature of things, there is no real difference between them. When the easement is taken, the fee is substantially taken, and for all practical purposes in measuring damages the value of the fee is the only available and proper standard.

But, while it is the rule that, where there is practically no substantial difference between the value of the fee and the value of the easement, the court may properly permit the value of the fee to be proven and assessed by the jury as the damages, yet in theory the distinction between the two remains, and in all cases, where it can be shown as a fact that the fee, burdened with the easement, is of some substantial value to the owner, this value is reserved to him, and must be taken into consideration in determining the damages to be awarded for the imposition of an easement upon the land. In condemning for a right of way, no more land and no greater interest in it can be taken by the railroad company than the public use requires, which is ordinarily the surface of the land. While it is true, as we have pointed out, that under some circumstances, in assessing damages, the value of the fee of the land taken is awarded, yet this is because in the nature of things there can be no difference in value between them. When, however, such a difference does exist, the rule is different, and the value of the easement taken, as distinguished from the value of the fee, is alone to be ascertained by the jury, and the owner compensated therefor. And this difference in value may, and usually does, exist to a greater or less degree in all cases where the underlying estate is valuable for the minerals it contains, and when but a portion of the owner's land which contains them is burdened with the easement. Whatever minerals lie beneath the right of way are reserved to the owner, and wherever such minerals are in situ underlying this right of way, while he may not enter upon it to take them (because the nature of the easement requires exclusive possession of the surface by the company), he can drift from tunnels sunk upon his adjoining land and do so, leaving, however, sufficient support for the easement imposed. Subject to this support, the right of the owner of the land, to take out all the minerals beneath the right of way, is absolute. Under the condemnation the railroad company acquires the permanent and exclusive control of the surface of the land, but it acquires nothing more. It acquires no title to the minerals beneath the surface, and, of course, no right to dig beneath the surface for the purpose of appropriating them, and, if it should undertake to do so, could be restrained at the instance of the owner of the underlying fee. While the title to the minerals underneath the right of way is reserved exclusively to the owner of the land across which it is condemned, there is no doubt that, by being restricted from entering upon it, it may be much more difficult and expensive for him to take them out, far more so than if he could operate directly over the land which has been appropriated under the easement; and it may be that much valuable mineral would have to be left to afford surface support, or, if this were taken out, a substituted surface support would have to be provided by the owner. But evidence of all these matters would be submitted to the court and jury, and would enter as substantial factors in determining the value of the easement. They would not affect his reserved right of ownership in the fee. While our attention has not been directed to any decision of this court adopting this as the rule in this state to be applied in assessing damages for the condemnation of a right of way over mineral lands, the authorities seem to be quite uniform upon the point in other jurisdictions, as far, at least, as lands containing mineral in situ are concerned, and the rule seems to be a reasonable and just one. Some of these authorities we cite: Robbins v. St. Paul S. & T. R. R. Co., 22 Minn. 287; Hollingsworth v. Des Moines & St. L. R. R. Co., 63 Iowa, 444, 19 N. W. 325; Tyler v. Town of Hudson, 147 Mass. 609, 18 N. E. 582; Blake v. Rich, 34 N. H. 289; Phifer v. Cox, 21 Ohio St. 255, 8 Am. Rep. 58; Penn Gas Co. v. Versailles Fuel Gas Co., 131 Pa. 532, 19 Atl. 933; North Pac. & M. R. Co. v. Forbis, 15 Mont. 459, 39 Pac. 571, 48 Am. St. Rep. 692.

But the particular question presented in this case, as to the proper measure of value which should be applied where an easement is sought over oil-bearing land, seems never to have been presented for determination to any court. At least our attention is called to no decision on the subject, and counsel upon both sides have been extremely thorough in the presentation and discussion of the subject. Counsel for appellant, reasoning from analogy, insists that the same rule should apply to oil lands as to other mineral lands, while counsel for respondents claim that there is no room for such application, and that there is such a radical and essential difference, both as to the character of the minerals and the nature of their ownership, as to make the rule inapplicable. But we do not think this difference in ownership, or the character of the minerals, of such a nature as to make it impossible that an owner of adjoining land can derive any benefit from a reservation in his favor of the petroleum oils in place, or which are liable to accumulate, by reason of the physical laws governing such fluids, under the land upon which the easement is imposed. Nor can it be said that it is impossible to show, in ascertaining the value of the easement acquired, that this reserved right has no determinative value separate from the easement. These oils lie in reservoirs, and, collectively, the owners of the superincumbent land have an exclusive ownership in them. The ownership of each, it is true, is only a qualified or partial ownership—a right to reduce the oil in the common reservoir to possession by sinking wells upon the particular tract of land owned by him overlying it. But, when so being exercised, the owner of the well is not limited to any particular territorial area beneath the surface from which he may draw the oil. He may not only draw from his own land, but he is entitled to draw from the reservoir generally, and he naturally does draw, and is of right entitled to draw, to his own well the oil underlying the lands of other surface owners. This, of course, is a right common to all surface owners, and, as the reservoir is not inexhaustible, there is a liability that in the process of pumping the oil beneath the lands of proprietors higher upon the strata will be naturally diminished, if not depleted, by being either drawn out, or by gravitation carried to lower and deeper wells. But, aside from this liability to loss from beneath particular lands, the ownership in the oil beneath that land may be said to be absolute in the owner of the surface; and if his right to take it out is not lost by virtue of being deprived of a part of his surface land, or his beneficial interest is only to some extent diminished, there is no reason why a corporation condemning a right of way across it, which takes only an easement, should pay for this reserved and available interest in the fee. That this reserved interest in the oil under the right of way was of a determinative value to the defendants, as owners of the adjoining land, was what the plaintiff sought to prove. Its contention was that, as such owners, it was possible for defendants to take out, by wells sunk along the border of the adjoining land, the oil in place beneath the strip composing its right of way, and by means of such wells to intercept the flow of oil from such adjoining land beneath the easement surface; and to the extent that this might be accomplished it offered to show that this right was of value, as something distinct and apart from the value of the easement, and we perceive no reason why it should not have been permitted to do so.

It is contended, however, by the respondents, that whatever ownership the defendants may have in the oil beneath the right of way could only be made available from the surface; that ownership of the surface carries with it the only right in the oil which is of any value, and that is the right to reduce to possession the oil beneath that surface; and that if, by putting down wells on the land adjoining, they can draw out the oil from beneath the right of way, they do not acquire such oil by virtue of any ownership they have in it as taken from the land subject to the easement, but they get it by virtue of their rights in the surface of the adjoining tract through which it is drawn. We cannot accord with this line of argument. We do not think it keeps in view a proper distinction between the qualified ownership of a surface owner of land in the general oil deposits contained in the reservoir, and the like ownership which attaches to the specific quantity which from time to time may be under the surface of a particular tract of land. While, collectively, all the owners of the superincumbent land have a common interest in the oil deposit, yet the right of an owner of the surface of a particular tract of such land to reduce the oil under it to possession can only be enforced when it comes under his land. If he can then reduce it to possession by drawing it from under all his land, notwithstanding his right to operate from a portion of the surface of such land for that purpose may be prevented by the imposition of an easement upon it, he retains the same right and to the same extent as he possessed it before the easement was imposed, and there necessarily would be a difference between the value of the reserved right and the value of the easement. It is true that usually the surface taken for a right of way would be the most advantageous point from which to draw the oil from beneath it; but, in the case instanced, it would not be essentially requisite. It might entail greater difficulty, and be attendant with less practical benefit and advantage for the owner of the adjoining land, who retains this beneficial ownership in the oil underlying the right of way, to operate, in acquiring its possession, from the adjoining land, than from the overlying surface; but these are matters which would have to be taken into consideration in estimating the value of the easement.

Nor is it true, as contended, that the appropriation of the surface of the oil-bearing land of itself necessarily destroys all right of defendants in the oil underneath it, by reason of such appropriation. As we have indicated above, this does not follow if, as a fact, by virtue of owning adjoining lands, a reserved ownership in the oils beneath the surface easement is of value. Not only this, but there are certain legal rights which, while enforceable by any owner of the surface of oil-bearing lands, are equally secured to the defendants in protection of their reserved rights to the oils underlying the easement, notwithstanding the surface control has been taken from them. By the condemnation proceedings, the plaintiff could not get any interest in the land itself, but only a right of way across it. It acquired no right to the underlying oils. If it should abstract them from under this right of way, the defendants could recover their value in an action for damages for their conversion, or could maintain an action in claim and delivery for their possession, to the same extent as against any other trespasser (Hail v. Reed, 15 B. Mon. [Ky.] 479; Hughes v. U. P. Lines, 119 N. Y. 426, 23 N. E. 1042); or, if the plaintiff should attempt to sink wells on the right of way, it could be restrained in equity at the instance of defendants, on the ground of a threatened irreparable injury. As is said in Bettman v. Harness, 42 W. Va. 437, 26 S. E. 272, 36 L. R. A. 566: "Such damages subtract from the very substance of the estate and tend to its ultimate destruction. * * * Petroleum oil in place is a part of the realty, and its unlawful removal a disherison equity will enjoin." The interest reserved to the owner in the fee owning adjoining land, upon condemnation of a right of way, is in all respects the same as if he had made a grant or a lease of a portion of the surface of his oil-bearing land, reserving to himself, as the owner of adjoining land, the right to all minerals beneath the granted or leased tract, but without right to enter upon its surface to sink wells. Such a right has been held to be a valuable one as to petroleum oil, notwithstanding its fugitive and wandering nature, and an attempted invasion of such right enjoined. Westmoreland & C. N. G. Co. v. De Witt, 130 Pa. 235, 18 Atl. 724, 5 L. R. A. 731. It is true that, in making a grant or lease with such a reservation in favor of his retained land, the grantor or lessor acts upon his own volition, and the value of the reservation depends upon his judgment, which may be influenced by the location of the different tracts and the area of granted and reserved lands and other considerations. But, although the proceeding in condemnation is in invitum, these same matters can be taken into consideration in determining whether the reservation which the law makes in these minerals is of substantial benefit to the owner of the adjoining land. If this reservation is of no benefit, then, as a matter of course, the condemning party must pay for the easement whatever the value of the fee is ascertained to be. If, however, there is a beneficial ownership in the oils underlying the right of way, as these are reserved to the owner of the fee, the value of this beneficial ownership must be taken into consideration as something separate and apart from the value of the easement, and the value of the easement alone assessed against the condemning party. As in condemnation proceedings only an easement is acquired, this is all that the law requires shall be paid for. We discover no reason why the rule pertaining to the determination of the value of an easement, which is adopted with reference to mineral lands, where the minerals are in situ, should not be applied to easements over oil-bearing lands. In principle there is no distinction, though as to oil lands the practical application of the rule may be more difficult. It no doubt will always be more difficult to prove whether a reserved right in oil is valuable or not, much more so than such a right in fixed minerals; but it cannot be said to be impossible to do it. It can hardly be that, in every case where a right of way is sought to be condemned over a strip of oil-bearing land, the valuable rights which were owned by the defendant when the condemnation proceedings were inaugurated, and which the condemning party does not acquire, are entirely lost to the defendant owning adjoining land by reason of the condemnation.

This disposes of the main point in the case, but appellant presents two other questions relative to rulings of the court. It insists that the trial court should have granted its motion to strike out the testimony of the witness Rusk, called on behalf of defendant, as to the market value of the property in question, on the ground that it appeared from his cross-examination that his testimony in that respect was merely conjectural and speculative. We do not think so. The witness fully qualified himself on direct examination to give an opinion on the subject. On cross-examination he testified as to the matters which would influence him from the standpoint of a contemplating buyer in determining the market value of land in an oil-bearing territory; the number of wells which could be economically placed on the amount of land taken, and ordinary losses therefrom; and the general relation of outlay to income. On cross-examination he entered into no details, nor gave any estimates. These were matters which, it appears to us, would naturally be taken into calculation in forming a public and general estimate of the value of land of this character, and which would influence the minds of sellers and buyers with relation to it, and to which the witness could properly testify. It is true the witness, in addition, testified that he would take into consideration what "he could pay for it and have sufficient margin for speculation during at least five years," which, of course, is not a factor in determining market value; and, if the motion to strike out had been addressed to this particular testimony, it would, doubtless, have been granted. It afforded, however, no warrant for striking out all the testimony of the witness, and the motion was properly denied.

It is further claimed that the lower court erred in refusing to allow appellant to prove a progressive decrease in the productiveness of the oil field within which the land in question is situated. Upon the argument here, counsel for respondents do not discuss the right of the appellant to make such proof, but defend the ruling of the court on the ground that the question, as addressed to the particular witness, was too indefinite and vague. This was probably true. Upon a new trial, however, objection on that ground may be obviated. As a matter of right the appellant was entitled to introduce evidence upon the subject. Such evidence is admissible as bearing upon the market value of the land in question, as oil-bearing land. As it is permissible to show that the land sought to be condemned is oil-bearing land, so it is permissible to show what kind of oil-bearing land it is, and to that end to show its degree of productiveness, whether increasing or decreasing.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

RAPE—INFORMATION — DISTINCT OFFENSES — RESISTANCE — INSTRUCTIONS — WITNESSES — IMPEACHMENT—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Pen. Code, § 261, defines rape as an act of sexual intercourse accomplished with a female, not the wife of the perpetrator, (1) where the female is under the age of 16 years; (3) where the female resists, but her resistance is overcome by force or violence. Section 954 requires an indictment or information to charge but one offense, but permits the same offense to be set forth in different forms under different counts. Held, that an information for rape containing two counts, each charging a rape committed on the same day and upon the same female, but the first charging the accomplishment of the rape by force, and the second alleging merely an act of sexual intercourse with a female under the age of 16 years, is not subject to the objection of charging more than one offense, although it does not expressly state that the matters set forth are descriptive of the same offense.

2. An information for rape, alleging that defendant "on and upon * * * did violently and feloniously make an assault, and her * * * did violently and feloniously ravish and carnally know * * * she having resisted his said assault, and said resistance having been then and there overcome by force and violence" of defendant, sufficiently alleged resistance on the part of prosecutrix, overcome by force or violence, to the act of defendant in assaulting and ravishing her.

3. In rape, a charge omitting to state, as an essential to a conviction, that it was necessary to show that prosecutrix was not the wife of defendant, was not prejudicial, where in another portion of the charge the court correctly defined the offense as an act accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, etc., and there was no pretense or testimony on any side that prosecutrix was defendant's wife.

4. A witness for the defense was asked on cross-examination if he had not made a certain statement, at variance with his testimony, to a certain person. Having denied making such a statement, the person named was called in rebuttal, and testified without objection that said witness for the defense had made a statement under the conditions mentioned in the question asked of such witness. On cross-examination he testified that the statement was made in Spanish; that he understood Spanish, although he did not understand every word, and could not tell connectedly what was uttered, but his knowledge of the words used by defendant was derived from an interpreter. Held, that it was not error to refuse to strike out the rebuttal testimony on the ground that the same was hearsay, and to rule that the objection thereto went simply to the weight of the evidence.

5. The giving of a charge in a criminal case that the jury might consider the manner of a witness, his relation to the controversy, etc., is not ground for reversal.

6. The refusal to charge that "the presumption of innocence must go with you, in all your deliberations as jurors, in arriving at the verdict," was not prejudicial, where the court had already charged that defendant was presumed to be innocent until the contrary was proved, and was entitled to an acquittal in case of a reasonable doubt of guilt, and there was no intimation in the charge that the presumption of innocence could be lost sight of at any time prior to arriving at a verdict.

7. A refusal to charge was not error where the substance of the request was given elsewhere.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; N. H. Conklin, Judge.

Florencio Jailles was convicted of rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

E. E. Capps, G. H. C. Shaw, and Kelly & Shaw, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Cassius Carter, Dist. Atty., and W. R. Andrews, Dep. Dist. Atty., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Defendant was convicted of rape, and appeals from the judgment pronounced upon said conviction, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The defendant interposed a demurrer to the information upon the ground that "the said information charges more than one offense." The demurrer was overruled, and this ruling of the trial court is complained of as erroneous. The information contained two counts, each charging a rape committed by defendant on May 10, 1903, upon one Maria Tampo; the first charging that a rape was accomplished by means of force and violence, and against the resistance of the female, and the second omitting all allegations as to force and violence and resistance, and simply alleging an act of sexual intercourse with the said female, she then and there being under the age of 16 years. Section 954 of the Penal Code provides, "The indictment or information must charge but one offense, but the same offense may be set forth in different forms under different counts, and, when the offense may be committed by the use of different means, the means may be alleged in the alternative in the same count." It has been said by this court that while, under our statute, the indictment or information may charge the same offense in different forms under different counts, "this must be done in such a way as to show clearly upon the face of the indictment or information that the matters and things set forth in the different counts are descriptive of one and the same offense." People v. Garcia, 58 Cal. 102. It must be conceded that it would be preferable for the pleader endeavoring to set forth one offense in different forms under different counts to expressly state in the information that the matters and things so set forth are descriptive of one and the same offense. Such a statement would obviate all question as to the intention of the pleader. We think, however, that, despite the absence of such a statement in the information before us, it is manifest that it was sought to charge but one offense, viz., one rape committed on Maria Tampo on May 10, 1903. The nature of the allegations in the two counts shows this very clearly. The only difference between the allegations of the two counts is that force, violence, and resistance are alleged in one, without allegation as to age, while in the other is the allegation as to age, without any allegation as to force, violence, and resistance. The allegations of each show the offense of rape, committed on the same person on the same day, and indicate that the district attorney was simply endeavoring to set forth the same transaction in different ways, so as to bring the case within either subdivision 1 or subdivision 3 of section 261, Pen. Code, as the evidence on the trial might show it to have been. All these allegations might undoubtedly have been joined in one count, for there is nothing inconsistent in them, or the second count might have been entirely omitted, for testimony showing the existence of the facts alleged therein would have been sufficient to sustain a conviction under the allegations of the first count. People v. Snyder, 75 Cal. 323, 17 Pac. 208; People v. Vann, 129 Cal. 118, 121, 61 Pac. 776. The decision of this court in People v. Thompson, 28 Cal. 214, is in point here, and sustains the information. The information in People v. Garcia, 58 Cal. 102, relied on by appellant, clearly charged two separate and distinct assaults. The court there said: "In brief, according to the information, the defendant committed two separate and distinct assaults upon Lenora Philis on the 28th of June, 1881, with intent to murder her—one with a large bar of iron while she was but three feet from him, and the other with a loaded rifle gun while she was but ten feet distant. Proof of the facts alleged in the second count would not have sustained the averments of the first, nor would proof of the facts alleged in the first count have sustained the averments of the second." The case is not in point here.

2. It is urged here for the first time—the objection not having been made by demurrer—that the first count of the information does not state a public offense, in that it does not clearly charge that the prosecutrix resisted the assault of defendant to the end. It is alleged in the information that the defendant "on and upon one Maria Tampo * * * did violently and feloniously make an assault, and her, the said Maria Tampo, did violently and feloniously ravish and carnally know * * * she having resisted his said assault, and said resistance having been then and there overcome by the force and violence of said" defendant. This sufficiently alleged resistance to the act of defendant, overcome by force or violence. It is suggested that it is alleged only that she resisted "the assault," and not that she resisted the ravishing. But the only assault alleged was that committed in the accomplishment of the act of ravishing. The allegation that she resisted the assault, and "that such resistance was overcome by the force and violence of said" defendant, necessarily means that she resisted the whole thereof, to the very accomplishment of the act charged, and that the act was accomplished only by reason of the fact that her resistance was overcome by force and violence.

3. In charging the jury as to what was essential to a conviction under the first count of the information, the trial court omitted to state that it was necessary to show that the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant. In another portion of the charge the court correctly defined the offense as being an act of sexual intercourse, accomplished with a female not the wife of the perpetrator, under certain conditions. The omission noted above was not prejudicial. There was not the slightest pretense that the prosecutrix was the wife of the defendant. The defendant himself testified that he did not know her name, that he had no acquaintance with her, and that he never saw her before that night. Under the circumstances of this case, it could not be held to be prejudicial error for the court to assume in its instructions that she was not defendant's wife. See People v. Baldwin, 117 Cal. 244, 251, 49 Pac. 186.

4. The evidence very clearly establishes the fact that the prosecutrix was not the wife of defendant.

5. Adolpho Jailles, a witness for the defense, was asked on cross-examination if he had not made a certain statement, at variance with his testimony, to one Harry Hubbell and one Ambrosia Ruiz at a certain place and time, and denied having made such a statement. Hubbell was called in rebuttal, and testified, without objection, that at the time and place stated, and in the presence of said Ruiz, Jailles made said statement. On cross-examination he testified that Jailles made such statement in the Spanish language; that he understood Spanish; that he did not understand every word and sentence of Spanish; that he could not put a Spanish sentence "connectedly together," and could not tell "connectedly" what was uttered; and that his knowledge as to the exact words used by Jailles on that occasion was derived from what Ruiz, who acted as interpreter, then and there told him. The defendant thereupon moved to strike out the evidence of Hubbell as to Jailles' statement on the ground that the same was hearsay, and his motion was denied; the court saying that the objection went simply to the weight of the evidence before the jury. Taking into consideration all of the evidence of the witness upon this subject, we cannot say that the court erred in this ruling. It may be added that Ruiz, the interpreter, was subsequently sworn as a witness, and testified to the making of the statement by Jailles.

6. We find no prejudicial error in the matter of instructions to the jury. We have already discussed the question as to the effect of the omission of the court, in one portion of its charge, to state that it was necessary to show that the prosecutrix was not the wife of defendant. There was nothing in the instruction of the court as to "moral certainty" which could be construed to define that term as being simply that degree of certainty "which a person would feel justified to act upon in matters of importance to himself." The instruction as to the testimony of the defendant was the same instruction concerning which this court has over and over again said that a judgment will not be reversed because such instruction was given. No instruction was given that called the attention of the jury to any other particular witness or class of witnesses. The court simply informed the jury that, as to any witness, they might take into consideration his manner, relation to the controversy, etc. As has been often said, this is only stating to the jury facts already within their knowledge, as men of common sense. The refusal of the court to instruct that the "presumption of innocence must go with you in all your deliberations, as jurors, in arriving at your verdict" was not prejudicial. The court had already instructed "that a defendant in a criminal action is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved, and, in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to an acquittal." There was nowhere in the charge any intimation, as in cases relied upon by appellant, that this presumption of innocence could be lost sight of at any time prior to arriving at a verdict, and the jury could not have so understood, in view of the instructions given. The court refused to give a requested instruction to the effect that the prosecution was required to prove the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and that the defendant is not required to prove his innocence. The reason assigned was that the instruction was given elsewhere, as it was, in substance. It was not necessary to repeat it in a different form.

7. The showing upon motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence was not such that we can say that the trial court, in denying the motion, abused the discretion confided to it.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record, the judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MARITIME INSURANCE—CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY—ACTUAL TOTAL LOSS.

thereon just before they were to be towed to Alaska to be used for transportation on a river there, for the purpose of which transportation the owner held them, is warranted by evidence that they were so injured that they could not be repaired so as to be safely towed to Alaska.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Bahrs, Judge.

Action by the Progresso Steamship Company against the St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

SMITH, C. This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff and from an order denying defendant a new trial. The suit was brought on two policies of insurance issued by defendant to the agents of the Yukon Transportation & Commercial Company, and made payable to plaintiff at San Francisco, insuring, in the sum of $2,500 each, two river steamboats known as the Staghound and the Gamecock, about to be towed from Portland, Or., to St. Michaels, Alaska. The interest of plaintiff was that of mortgagee. Each policy, besides the words of insurance, contained the memorandum, "Warranted free from all average and salvage." The two steamboats, when out about 36 hours from Astoria, met with such damage from the seas that the towing steamer was compelled to return with them in a badly damaged condition to Astoria. Shortly after their return the assured gave notice of abandonment to the defendant, which declined to accept it on the specific grounds that the damage was partial, and that its insurance was "warranted free of all average" and against "absolute total loss only." Of the two steamers the Staghound was most injured. The subsequent history of the steamboats does not seem to be material to the case, but, as some stress is laid upon it by the appellant, it may be as well to state that the two steamboats were libeled in the admiralty court for breach of contract of transportation and personal service, and ultimately sold by the marshal with their equipments, the Gamecock for $5,596 and the Staghound for $4,497; that the Gamecock was made into a towboat at an expense of $4,000, and put to use as such on the river; and that the Staghound was broken up, and her machinery removed into the hull of a new tugboat, and her hull converted into two barges.

One of the questions mainly discussed in the brief relates to the construction of the memorandum clause of the policy, "Warranted free from all average and salvage," as to which it is claimed by the appellant that this limits the right of recovery to the case of "actual total loss" only, and excludes "the right to abandon" for "constructive total loss." In discussing this question it is rightly assumed by the counsel that, as the contract provides for performance in San Francisco, the California law must govern. This will be found in sections 2704 and 2717, Civ. Code; the former defining "actual" and the latter "constructive" total loss. But it seems that on this question the court below accepted the theory of the appellant, and found, in effect, that there was an actual total loss of the vessel as defined in subdivisions 3 and 4 of section 2704 of the Civil Code; and, if this finding be supported by the evidence, the question discussed becomes immaterial. The question, therefore, to be considered is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support this finding, and on this question we are of the opinion that the evidence was such as to justify the court in finding that the vessels could not be repaired so as to be towed to St. Michaels; and, indeed, with reference to the Gamecock, which was the least injured of the two, the witness Jones expressly so testifies. The court was therefore justified in finding that the owner of the vessels insured was deprived of their possession at the port of destination, and also in finding that they were rendered valueless to the owner for the purpose for which it held the same; that is to say for transporting freight and passengers on the Yukon river in Alaska. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider other questions discussed in the briefs.

We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

STIMSON et al. v. DUNHAM, CARRIGAN, HAYDEN CO. et al. (L. A. 1,445.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—CLAIMS OF SUBCONTRACTORS—COSTS AND ATTORNEY'S FEES—INTERPLEADER—INTEREST.

1. Where owners were served with subcontractors' notices, which, under the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1193, entitled them to withhold the whole amount due the principal contractor to pay the claims of the subcontractors, they were entitled to bring all interested parties into court so that their rights to the fund could be determined in one suit.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1193, authorizing the contractor to recover upon a lien only such amount as may be due him after deducting all claims of other parties for work done and materials furnished, a contractor to whom nothing is due after such deduction is not entitled to recover upon the lien filed by him.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1195, requiring the court in proceedings to enforce mechanics' liens to allow costs and attorney's fees, a contractor who does not establish his lien because the fund due him is exhausted in the payment of subcontractors is not entitled to them.

4. Under Civ. Code, § 3287, authorizing the recovery of interest on liquidated damages, except during such time as the debtor is prevented by law from paying the debt, an owner, who, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1193, is prevented from paying the contractor because of the service of claims of subcontractors on him, is not liable for interest.

5. A contractor's demand for extras does not draw interest until the amount thereof is ascertained by judgment of the court.

Action by William H. Stimson and others against the Dunham, Carrigan, Hayden Company, John N. Gardiner, and others. From the judgment rendered, and from an order denying a motion to annul the conclusions of law and to modify the judgment, defendant John N. Gardiner appeals. Affirmed.

Valentine & Newby, for appellant. John D. Pope, for respondents.

COOPER, C. Appeal from judgment and from an order denying appellant's motion to annul conclusions of law and to modify judgment.

The complaint alleges: That plaintiffs' testate, in September, 1900, entered into certain contracts with appellant, by the terms of which appellant was to furnish material and perform the labor in putting in certain pipes, pump, and fittings in the basement of the Stimson Block and Douglass Building in the city of Los Angeles for the sum of $1,968. That appellant in due time entered upon the performance of said contracts, and completed them on the ——— day of June, 1901. That the defendants (except appellant, the contractor), more than 40 in all, claim to have furnished portions of the material or labor in the performance of the contracts, and many of them have served written notices upon plaintiffs that appellant was indebted to them for materials or labor furnished or done in performance of said contracts of appellant, and have notified plaintiffs to withhold money sufficient to pay their demands; the total amount of money claimed in said notices exceeding the contract price of said improvements. That plaintiffs have no means of knowing whether the demands of said parties so furnishing labor and materials are just, or the respective amounts, but are desirous of making payment of the contract price and amount due to the materialmen, laborers, and parties entitled thereto, as the court may direct. That appellant claims that there is a sum due him for extra materials and labor furnished and done in the performance of the said contract, but plaintiffs do not know and cannot state whether there is anything due, or how much is due for extras, but that the amount due under the contracts and for extras is insufficient to pay all the claims for material furnished and labor done in the performance of said contracts. Plaintiffs pray that the court may determine and adjudge the amount in which they are indebted to appellant upon said contracts and for extras thereunder, and that, upon the amount being ascertained, they be permitted to pay such amount into court and be discharged; that defendants be required to set forth their respective claims for adjudication, so that the money due by plaintiff may be paid as the law may award; and that defendants, and each of them, be restrained from filing any liens upon plaintiffs' premises pending the hearing.

The materialmen and laborers appear to be satisfied with the decision, as they have not appealed. This opinion will therefore be confined to the question raised by the appellant, Gardiner. His demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. Plaintiffs had made their contracts in compliance with the law, and desired to live up to them. They were willing to pay the amount due appellant for extras as soon as the matter could be judicially determined. They had been served with notices intercepting the payment of the entire amount due, but they could not, at their own risk, determine the amount or justness of the claim of each of some 40 laborers and materialmen. In such case they could not be held beyond the contract price and charged with additional costs and expenses created or incurred by appellant. Code Civ. Proc. § 1193; Rosenkranz v. Wagner, 62 Cal. 154; Turner v. Strenzel, 70 Cal. 30, 11 Pac. 389; Brill v. De Turk, 130 Cal. 244, 62 Pac. 462. Plaintiffs were required by the Code, after having been served with notices, to withhold sufficient moneys to pay all such claims and attorney's fees to each claimant to the extent of $100. Therefore plaintiffs, having the money on hand with which to pay all amounts due by them, and desiring to pay it to the proper parties, had the right to come into court and bring in all interested parties so that the one decree might settle all rights. Any party entitled to a lien would, no doubt, have had the right to insist that the amount for which plaintiffs were liable should have been paid into court, and upon plaintiffs' failure to do so would have been permitted to proceed with the enforcement of his lien in the regular course. The court would not, in a case like this, compel a lienholder to allow his lien to become barred without being secured by the deposit of the amount due by the owner or otherwise. In this case, however, the plaintiffs asked to be permitted to pay the amount into court as soon as it could be ascertained as to the sum due for extras. No question was raised in the court below as to the payment of the money into court, and no one was enjoined from filing a lien.

Appellant filed an answer and cross-complaint. He did not deny the allegation in the complaint that the amount due on the contracts and for extra work was insufficient to pay all the claims of the laborers and materialmen other than himself, but he alleged that the value of the extra materials and labor was the sum of $1,901.20. The court found the amount due on the contract price to be $1,968, and the amount due for extras $645.20 (neither of which findings are questioned); making the total amount due $2,613.20. It also found that there was due and owing by appellant to laborers $722.37, and to materialmen $2,654.61, the names and amounts being inserted in the decree (neither of which findings are questioned); making the total amount due from appellant and unpaid for labor and materials the sum of $3,376.98. This was in excess of the amount due by plaintiffs, and the decree provided that the laborers be paid in full, and the balance to the materialmen on a pro rata distribution of .6817+.

The court denied the demand of appellant for a foreclosure of his lien, for attorney's fees, for interest, and for costs. It is claimed that the court erred in all these respects. The appellant, as contractor, was entitled "to recover upon a lien filed by him only such amount as may be due him according to the terms of his contract, after deducting all claims of other parties for work done and materials furnished." Code Civ. Proc. § 1193. As there was nothing due him after making such deductions, he was not entitled to recover upon the lien filed by him. The Code provides that the court must allow, as part of the costs, the money paid for filing and recording the lien and reasonable attorney's fees, "to be allowed to each claimant whose lien is established." Code Civ. Proc. § 1195. As appellant did not establish a lien, he does not come within the provisions of the statute as to costs and attorney's fees. If, for the purposes of this case, it be conceded that appellant can raise the question, we hold that plaintiffs were not liable for interest. They were prevented by the express mandate of the statute from paying the amount for which they were liable, under the contracts, after the notices of the laborers and materialmen had been served upon them. Civ. Code, § 3287; Easterbrook v. Farquharson, 110 Cal. 316, 42 Pac. 811. And the demand for extras did not draw interest until the amount was ascertained by the judgment of the court. Macomber v. Bigelow, 126 Cal. 14, 58 Pac. 312, and cases cited.

It follows that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; GRAY, C.

BIRD v. POTTER. (L. A. 1,591.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—MUTUALITY OF REMEDY—TENDER — STATUTE—ADEQUATE CONSIDERATION—FINDING — SUFFICIENCY—APPEAL —QUESTIONS FOR REVIEW—SEARCH OF RECORD—RIGHTS OF COURT.

1. Under the direct provisions of Civ. Code, § 3388, a party who has signed a written contract may be compelled specifically to perform it, though the other party has not signed it, where the party who has not signed it has performed or offers to perform it on his part, and the case is otherwise proper for specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Specific Performance, § 93.]

2. In an action for specific performance of a contract for the sale of a lot, a finding, supported by the evidence, that no agreement was made by plaintiff and defendant concerning the building of a house for plaintiff, and that there was no definite or certain promise made by plaintiff to the defendant, or to any one for him, concerning the building of the house, is conclusive on appeal.

3. Where alleged errors of law occurring at the trial are relied on, but the questions and rulings complained of are pointed out in no other way than by reference to folios, and an examination of such folios discloses the references to have been mistakenly made, the Supreme Court is not obliged to search the record to find the questions and rulings.

4. In an action to compel specific performance of a contract for the sale of a lot, it appeared that the contract recited the receipt from the plaintiff of $5 as part of the price of the lot. It also recited, "Full purchase price to be $450," and that the deposit was taken subject to the approval of the owner. The court found that at the time of the execution of the contract $450 was the reasonable value of the lot, and that the contract "was and now is" fair and just. It was admitted that plaintiff paid the defendant $5, and tendered him $445, which he declined. The judgment directed a deed to be executed and delivered to plaintiff on payment of $445, and interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of the tender by plaintiff. Held, that a contention that no finding was made on the issue that defendant never received any adequate consideration for the alleged agreement was untenable.

Action by Samuel M. Bird against Thomas McDaniels Potter. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. S. Rollins, for appellant. Geo. L. Keefer, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to enforce specific performance of a written contract for the sale of real estate. The court filed findings, upon which judgment was entered for plaintiff. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and now prosecutes this appeal from the order denying his motion. He claims that the evidence is insufficient to justify the judgment and decision, and that certain errors of law occurred during the trial, to his prejudice.

The contract upon which the action depends is as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., May 16, 1902. Received of Samuel M. Bird five dollars as deposit and part of the purchase price of lot twenty-one, block 'D' of the Potter's Woodlawn Tract. Full purchase price to be $450.00. This deposit is taken subject to the approval of the owner. W. I. Hollingsworth & Co. Thomas McD. Potter."

The name of the owner, Thomas McD. Potter, was signed to the contract after it had been first signed by his agent, W. I. Hollingsworth & Co. The $5 was paid by plaintiff at the time the writing was given to him.

It is claimed by appellant that he never received an adequate consideration for the contract; that it was not binding upon plaintiff, because he did not agree to pay the $450 for the lot, and hence the contract, not being mutual, cannot be enforced in a court of equity. The claim is without merit. The contract is in writing, subscribed by the party to be charged, describes the land to be conveyed, and names the consideration for which defendant agreed to convey. Time is not made the essence of the contract. No demand was ever made by defendant for the balance of the purchase price, and the court finds that "on the 10th day of December, 1902, plaintiff offered to said defendant, Thomas McDaniels Potter, the sum of $445, in U. S. gold coin," and demanded of said defendant a deed for said lot, and that defendant refused to accept the said $445 or to give plaintiff a deed for said lot. This finding is supported by the evidence, and not questioned. If the amount named as the purchase price was not adequate, the defendant should have so determined in his own mind before he signed the contract, but, having signed it and stated the amount for which he would sell the lot, he must live up to it. Any other rule would make the contract worthless and mere waste paper. Defendant knew the meaning of it when he signed it, and the price for which he agreed to sell the lot. It is true that the contract was not mutual, as plaintiff did not agree to purchase, but the remedy became mutual upon the tender of the performance by plaintiff. It is not necessary to refer to the many decisions in support of the above principle, because it is the rule laid down in section 3388, Civ. Code, which reads: "A party who has signed a written contract may be compelled specifically to perform it, though the other party has not signed it, if the latter has performed, or offers to perform it on his part, and the case is otherwise proper for enforcing specific performance." In this case the plaintiff has offered to perform it on his part, and the case is certainly a proper one for enforcing specific performance. The rule is correctly stated in Hay v. Mason, 141 Cal. 723, 75 Pac. 300, where it is said: "If the option or offer to convey by defendant had been for a price named, although unilateral and signed by defendant only, it would have been binding upon him, if subsequently, and prior to its withdrawal by defendant, plaintiffs acted upon it and tendered the price to be paid. In such case the contract or offer, although not mutual when first signed by defendant, would have become so by the price being paid or tendered." That case was cited with approval, and the same rule recognized, in Nason v. Lingle, 143 Cal. 367, 77 Pac. 71.

Appellant also claims that there was an independent verbal agreement made at the time of the writing to the effect that defendant was to construct a house for plaintiff upon the lot, and that the house and lot were to be sold together. If it be conceded that such evidence of an oral contract was admissible, it is sufficient that the court found that no agreement was made by plaintiff and defendant "concerning the building of a house for plaintiff, and that there was no definite or certain promise made by plaintiff to said defendant, or to any one for him, concerning the building of said house." This finding is supported by the evidence. Other findings are questioned, and we have examined them, and find that, so far as material, they are supported by the evidence. The court found upon all the material issues.

The appellant, in his brief, under the heading "Errors of Law Occurring at the Trial and Excepted to by Defendant," says: "The errors here designated [folios 189–194] we will submit to the court for consideration upon the argument and citations heretofore made. The questions of the defendant to which objections were sustained were each, under the pleadings, competent, relevant, and material, which were the grounds of the objections made to them." The questions and rulings are in no other way pointed out, nor discussed. By turning to the transcript, we find four questions and rulings specified as error, with a reference to the folio and page where each can be found. We have looked at the folio and page referred to in each case, and do not find any one of the questions. We have not the time or the inclination to make an independent search of the record in order to find such questions and rulings. People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 309, 67 Pac. 770; People v. Cebulla, 137 Cal. 318, 70 Pac. 181.

Appellant claims "that no finding is made upon the issue that defendant never received any adequate consideration for the alleged agreement." The court found "that at that time, namely, the 16th day of May, 1902, the said sum of $450 was the reasonable value of said lot, and that the said contract was and now is fair and just." It is admitted that plaintiff paid defendant $5, and tendered him $445, which he declined. It is thus shown that defendant declined to receive "the adequate consideration" for which he agreed to sell the lot. The judgment protects defendant's rights, as it directs a deed to be executed and delivered to plaintiff upon payment "of said sum of four hundred and forty-five dollars, and interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from the 10th day of December, 1902."

It follows that the order should be affirmed.

NEVILLS v. SHORTRIDGE et al. (S. F. 2,196.)

RES JUDICATA—DISMISSAL OF ACTION.

The dismissal of an action because prematurely commenced is no bar to another action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 30, Cent. Dig. Judgment, § 1014.]

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by W. A. Nevills against Samuel M. Shortridge and another. From a judgment dismissing the action, but providing that it should not operate as a bar to a subsequent action, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John E. Richards and Van R. Paterson, for appellants. Riordan & Lande and J. H. Campbell, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Appeal by defendants from judgment on the judgment roll without a bill of exceptions. The action was brought to recover a balance alleged to be due upon two promissory notes—one for $20,000, and one for $40,000—both dated November 30, 1896, and to foreclose a mortgage given to secure the said notes. The action was commenced November 30, 1898. The answers alleged, and the court found, that the action was prematurely commenced by reason of an agreement made by plaintiff on April 30, 1898, extending the time for the payment of said notes for one year from said last-named date in consideration of the conveyance of certain property by defendants to plaintiff of the aggregate value of $31,672.79, which was credited upon the indebtedness of defendants to plaintiff. The court accordingly gave judgment for defendants that the action be dismissed because prematurely brought, and that the defendants recover their costs. The judgment provided, "Such dismissal, however, not to be a bar to another action." Defendants complain of the judgment as to the quoted clause, and claim that the court had no power to determine the effect of its judgment in any subsequent proceeding between the parties.

It is evident that, if the judgment of dismissal was not a bar to another action, as a matter of law, the provision in the judgment, if conceded to be erroneous, was but a recital of the law as to the particular case, and was harmless. It is not contended by defendants that the effect of the judgment of dismissal was a bar to the beginning of another action. To hold that an action prematurely brought shall be dismissed, and that such dismissal will bar another action, brought when the obligation matures, would be to inflict a penalty of the entire loss to the plaintiff of his demand in all cases in which the court might decide on conflicting evidence that the action was brought prematurely, although the plaintiff was honestly mistaken. Such is not the law. A plea in abatement, without disputing the justness of plaintiff's claim, objects to the place, mode, or time of asserting it, and requires pro hac vice that the judgment be given for the defendant, leaving it open to renew the suit in another place or form, or at another time. It must not only point out the plaintiff's error, but must show him how it may be corrected, or in technical language it must give the plaintiff a better writ. 1 Chitty on Pleading (16th Am. ATTORNEYS — ADMISSION TO PRACTICE — JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 277, as amended by Act Feb. 15, 1905, provides that every person admitted to practice in the district court of appeal (a court created by Const. art. 6, as amended Nov. 8, 1904), "either upon examination or upon the production of a license from another state, * * * may practice as an attorney in all the courts of this state, including the Supreme Court." Section 279, as amended, provides that a person may be admitted or licensed to practice in all the courts of this state "by the district courts of appeal." Held, that though the Supreme Court may, as a matter of comity, permit an atttorney from another state to present argument in a pending cause in that court, it does not have power to admit an attorney to practice in all the courts of the state.

Application of Samuel T. Mock to be admitted to practice as an attorney. Denied, without prejudice.

PER CURIAM. Samuel T. Mock, a citizen of the United States, has applied to this court to be admitted to practice as an attorney and counselor in all the courts of this state. He has, by the production of his license, issued by the Supreme Court of the state of Wisconsin, established the fact that he has been admitted to practice law in the highest court of a sister state, and has produced satisfactory evidence to the effect that he is in good standing at the bar of said sister state, and is a man of good moral character. He is therefore entitled to have his application granted if this court has the power to grant it.

The Legislature of this state, at its present session, has amended the section of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to the admission of attorneys from other states and countries to practice in all the courts of this state (section 279) so as to place such matter entirely in the jurisdiction of the district courts of appeal provided for by the recent amendment to the Constitution. By section 277 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended, it is provided that every person admitted to practice by a district court of appeal, "either upon examination or upon the production of a license from another state, * * * may practice as an attorney in all the courts of this state, including the Supreme Court." By section 279, as amended, it is provided that one may be admitted, on license, to practice in all the courts of this state "by any district court of appeal," and there is nothing in the law as it now exists that purports to authorize this court to make any such order of admission. It is undoubtedly true that this court has the power, as a matter of comity, to permit an attorney from any other state to present argument to this court in any pending cause; but we are of the opinion that it has not, under the law as it is now written, the power to make an order admitting one to practice in all the courts of this state, and that the applicant must make his application to a district court of appeal.

The application is therefore denied, without prejudice to the right of the applicant to apply to any district court of appeal.

REBSTOCK v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 4,144.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 20, 1905.)

PRIMARY ELECTIONS—VOTERS—QUALIFICATIONS—STATUTES — CONSTITUTIONALITY — SECRECY OF ELECTIONS — OFFENSES — INDICTMENT—STATE'S EVIDENCE—EXEMPTION FROM PROSECUTION—DEFENSES—PROHIBITION.

1. Pen. Code, § 64, declares that no person otherwise competent shall be excused from testifying as to any of the offenses against the franchise on the ground that such testimony may criminate him, but that no prosecution can afterwards be had against such witness for any offense concerning which he testified for the prosecution; and Code Civ. Proc. § 1102, declares that prohibition lies only when the threatened proceedings "are without or in excess of the jurisdiction of the tribunal sought to be prohibited." Held, that where defendant was indicted for willfully and knowingly refusing to perform his duty as an election officer, as provided by Pen. Code, § 41, he was not entitled to a writ of prohibition to restrain prosecution of such indictment on the ground that he had appeared before the grand jury under subpœna issued by the district attorney, and testified concerning such offense as a state's witness; defendant being authorized by Pen. Code, § 1020, to present such matter as a complete defense to a plea of not guilty.

2. Refusal to dismiss an indictment on the ground that defendant, having testified as a state's witness before the grand jury, was not subject to prosecution for the offense, as provided by Pen. Code, § 64, cannot be reviewed on an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain further prosecution of the indictment; the error, if any, being reviewable on appeal from any judgment which might thereafter be pronounced.

3. Const. 1900, art. 2, § 2½, empowers the Legislature to determine the conditions on which electors may participate in any primary election; and Pol. Code, § 1367, declares that a voter at a primary election must declare a bona fide present intention of supporting the nominees of such political party at the next ensuing election, and any voter may be challenged, and his right to vote may be withheld unless he make oath or affirmation as to his bona fide present intention to support the nominees of the convention to which delegates are to be so chosen for such political party or organization. Held, that such requirement and declaration were not in violation of Const. art. 2, § 5, providing that "all elections by the people shall be by ballot or by such other method as may be prescribed by law: provided, that secrecy in voting be preserved."

In Bank. Petition by Joseph Rebstock for an alternative writ of prohibition against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and William P. Lawlor, one of the judges thereof. Writ denied.

A. S. Newburgh and Burke & O'Grady, for petitioner. Chas. L. Weller, Geo. T. Wright, and John A. Hosmer, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. On October 13, 1904, an indictment was presented by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco to the superior court thereof, against petitioner, charging him with a violation of the provisions of section 41 of the Penal Code, in that he, being an election officer in Primary Election Precinct 80 of said city and county, at a primary election held therein on August 9, 1904, had willfully and knowingly neglected and refused to perform a duty incumbent on him as such officer; it being alleged that he had willfully and knowingly refused to administer an oath, or affirmation to a challenged elector at such election, as required by section 1367, Pol. Code, and had allowed such elector to vote without making the necessary oath or affirmation. The superior court, proceeding in the usual mode, has caused petitioner to be arraigned upon said indictment, has required him to plea thereto, and will proceed with his trial thereunder unless restrained by this court. Petitioner seeks a writ of prohibition restraining the superior court from proceeding further in the matter of said indictment; claiming that such court is without jurisdiction in the matter, by reason of the fact that prior to the finding of the indictment he appeared before the grand jury that found the same, in response to a subpœna issued by the district attorney under direction of the grand jury, and there, in an investigation then being conducted by such grand jury relative to irregularities in said precinct at said election, was compelled to testify and did testify for the prosecution in regard to the offense for which he has been indicted.

Section 64 of the Penal Code, which is a part of title 4 of part 1 thereof, and in which title is included said section 41, provides as follows: "No person otherwise competent as a witness shall be disqualified or excused from testifying concerning any of the offenses enumerated and prescribed in this title, on the ground that such testimony may criminate himself; but no prosecution can afterwards be had against such witness for any such offense concerning which he testified for the prosecution." Petitioner's claim that the superior court is without jurisdiction to entertain or proceed upon said indictment is based upon the provisions of this section.

Conceding, for the purposes of this proceeding, that the petition for a writ of prohibition establishes a case in which petitioner is entitled to invoke the provisions of this section as exempting him from all liability for the offense alleged in the indictment, we cannot see that a case is made that will justify a writ of prohibition restraining the superior court from proceeding under said indictment. Prohibition lies only when the threatened proceedings "are without or in excess of the jurisdiction of" the tribunal sought to be prohibited. Section 1102, Code Civ. Proc. The defendant was charged by the indictment with having, in the city and county of San Francisco, committed a public offense triable by the superior court of that city and county. Such an indictment having been presented, it was the duty of the court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, to proceed thereunder in the usual mode, with a view to a determination of the issues proposed thereby; and it was and is open to the defendant to show to the court having such jurisdiction, in response to any showing that may be made by the prosecution, any reason why, if originally guilty of the offense charged, he could not be convicted thereof. He says to this court, in this independent proceeding, in effect, that, although he may have committed the offense charged, he cannot be found guilty thereof, for the reason that he testified concerning the same, for the prosecution, before the grand jury that found the indictment. His claim in this regard may be well founded, in view of the provisions of section 64, Pen. Code; but his position, so far as the jurisdiction of the court in which the indictment is pending is concerned, is precisely the same as if he here alleged that the statute of limitations had run against the offense prior to the finding of the indictment, or that he had heretofore been acquitted of the offense, or had once been in jeopardy for such offense. His claim, if well founded in fact, is a full and complete defense to the charge against him; but it is, like the other defenses just enumerated, nothing more than a defense, and, like all other defenses, including that of a denial of the truth of the allegations of the indictment, must be presented for determination as to its sufficiency to the tribunal having jurisdiction of the proceeding, which, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, will determine as to the sufficiency of the defense, and any error committed by such court in the exercise of its jurisdiction in regard thereto can be corrected on an appeal. It must necessarily be for the court in which a charge against a person for a public offense within its jurisdiction is pending to determine as to any and all defenses offered thereto, and in so determining it cannot be held to be acting in excess of its jurisdiction. It may act erroneously, but the remedy for its error in this regard is not to be found in a writ which lies only to prohibit acts in excess of jurisdiction.

Section 1020 of the Penal Code provides that "all matters of fact tending to establish a defense, other than that specified in the third and fourth subdivisions of section one thousand and sixteen [former conviction or acquittal and once in jeopardy], may be given in evidence under a plea of not guilty." Under his plea of not guilty, defendant may therefore show the facts here alleged, just as he could show a defense under the statute of limitations, and, if improperly denied his rights in this regard, may have the error corrected on appeal.

It probably would not be contended that there was any doubt as to the correctness of what has been said, as applied to the defense of limitations. Reliance is placed here upon the language of section 64, that "no prosecution can afterwards be had against such witness," as placing any such prosecution beyond and outside of the jurisdiction of any court. We cannot construe this language as taking from the court in which a criminal proceeding is pending the jurisdiction to determine whether or not such proceeding is barred by reason of facts bringing the case within the provisions of said section 64. The precise question here presented has not been decided in any case that has come to our attention, but in the cases involving the question as to whether statutory provisions substantially similar to those of section 64 furnish all the protection guarantied by the constitutional provision to the effect that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, and a witness consequently be compelled to testify thereunder, it has been recognized, wherever the matter was suggested, that the exemption given by the statute is purely a matter of defense. Thus in the case of Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 16 Sup. Ct. 644, 40 L. Ed. 819, where the statute provided that no person so testifying "shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter or thing, concerning which he may testify," it was decided by the United States Supreme Court, by a bare majority, that the statute did furnish all the protection guarantied by the constitution; but it was recognized by both the majority and minority opinions that a person so testifying, if afterwards prosecuted, must, under such statute, prove his immunity by way of confession and avoidance. In the majority opinion—page 608, of 161 U. S., page 651 of 16 Sup. Ct. (40 L. Ed. 819)—it was said: "The same answer may be made to the suggestion that the witness is imperfectly protected by reason of the fact that he may still be prosecuted, and put to the annoyance and expense of pleading his immunity by way of confession and avoidance. This is a detriment which the law does not recognize. There is a possibility that any citizen, however innocent, may be subjected to a civil or criminal prosecution, and put to the expense of defending himself; but, unless such prosecution be malicious, he is remediless, except so far as a recovery of costs may partially indemnify him." In the minority opinion it was said —page 621 of 161 U. S., page 660 of 16 Sup. Ct. (40 L. Ed. 819)—speaking of the clause "no person shall be prosecuted": "How possibly can effect be given to this provision, if taken literally? * * * When an indictment has been found, and the accused has been called upon to plead to it, he assuredly has been prosecuted. So that all that can be said is that the witness is not protected by the provision in question from being prosecuted, but that he has been furnished with a good plea to the indictment, which will secure his acquittal. But is that true? Not unless the plea is sustained by competent evidence. His condition, then, is that he has been prosecuted; been compelled, presumably, to furnish bail, and put to the trouble and expense of employing counsel and furnishing the evidence to make good his plea."

In State v. Nowell, 58 N. H. 314, the statute discussed provided, "nor shall he be thereafter prosecuted for any offense so disclosed by him." The court, speaking of the objection that the witness might be called on to defend against a subsequent prosecution, said: "It is true that a witness who discloses may afterwards be wrongfully prosecuted for the offense disclosed, notwithstanding the statutory exemption. But the witness has, under the statute, all the protection which the common-law right, adopted by the Bill of Rights in the common-law sense, gives him. * * * The legal protection of the witness against prosecution for crime disclosed by him is, in law, equivalent to his legal innocence of the crime disclosed. So far as his constitutional right is concerned, the case is as if the express provision of the statute were that a clerk, servant, or agent testifying against his principal is not guilty of such violations of chapter 99 as he discloses. The witness, regarded in law as innocent if prosecuted for a crime which he has been compelled by the statute to disclose, will stand as well as other innocent persons; and it was not the design of the common-law maxim, affirmed by the Bill of Rights, that he should stand any better. Were the case put by the respondent to occur, improbable as it may seem, he could plead and show that he had disclosed the same offense upon a lawful accusation against his principal, and thus make a perfect answer in bar or abatement of the prosecution against himself. Having testified, there would be, as to him, no statute authorizing a prosecution. * * * The indictment would be dismissed, or a verdict ordered in his favor."

It has been held in many cases that a witness is not exempted, under the constitutional provision, in the absence of any statutory provision exempting him from prosecution for offenses concerning which he is asked to testify, from testifying concerning any offense which is, as to him, barred by the statute of limitations. See Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 598, 16 Sup. Ct. 644, 40 L. Ed. 819, and cases there cited. The reason for such ruling is that he is immune from legal punishment for any such offense, because of the running of the statute. He may be prosecuted for such offense, but the statute of limitations affords him a legal defense therefor, which is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the constitutional provision. Such doubtless would also be the rule where the witness had been pardoned as to the offense, or had been finally convicted or acquitted thereof, or had once been in jeopardy thereon. The effect of the decisions is that a statute exempting a witness from all liability to punishment for any offense in reference to which he may testify affords protection equal to that given by the constitutional provision, and that under such a statute he may be compelled to testify. Such is the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States upon a constitutional provision which is practically the same as ours (Brown v. Walker, supra), and the ruling of this court in Ex parte Cohen, 104 Cal. 524, 38 Pac. 364, 26 L. R. A. 423, 43 Am. St. Rep. 127, in considering section 32 of the purity of election law of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 26, c. 16). That section not only provided that the person testifying "shall not thereafter be liable to indictment or presentment by information, nor to prosecution or punishment for the offense with reference to which his testimony was given," but also that he "may plead or prove the giving of testimony accordingly in bar of such indictment, information, or prosecution." The section was fully as strong regarding exemption from prosecution as is section 64, Pen. Code. Of it, this court said: "The statute purports to compel him to testify in the same manner as any other person, and, as the equivalent for his constitutional protection, gives him a legislative protection of equal scope and effect, by exempting him from all liability to punishment for the offense with reference to which he testifies. The exemption is as broad as the compulsion, and the protection is equal to that given by the Constitution. * * * If, in giving such testimony, the testimony has reference to another offense committed by himself, he is within the protection of the statute, and upon any prosecution for such offense is authorized to plead or prove in bar thereof that under the compulsion of this section he gave testimony with reference to such offense." It is true that the statute there expressly provided that the witness might plead or prove the giving of testimony in bar of the indictment or information, but such provision was entirely unnecessary, in view of the express provision of section 1020, Pen. Code, heretofore cited. It also provided that the witness "shall not thereafter be liable to indictment * * * nor to prosecution," making it practically the same in this regard as section 64, Pen. Code. If the court in which the indictment is pending is, under said section 64, without jurisdiction to hear and determine as to the sufficiency of such a defense, so, also, it must have been without jurisdiction so to do in a case arising under the section considered in Ex parte Cohen, supra.

The language of section 64, Pen. Code, is certainly no stronger than that used by our law relative to jeopardy and former conviction or acquittal. The Constitution provides, in terms, that no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense (section 13 of article 1), and it is provided by section 687 of the Penal Code that "no person can be subjected to a second prosecution for a public offense for which he has once been prosecuted and convicted or acquitted." Yet, in the face of this language, it is thoroughly settled that jeopardy, former conviction, and former acquittal are available to a defendant only by way of defense; and under the provisions of sections 1017, 1020, Pen. Code, matters of fact tending to establish such defenses can be given in evidence only under the special pleas provided for in subdivisions 3 and 4 of said section 1017. If such defenses are not tendered by such special pleas, they are waived, and, despite the peremptory language of section 13, art. 1, of the Constitution, and section 687, Pen. Code, cannot operate to save the defendant from conviction and punishment. See People v. Lee Yune Chong, 94 Cal. 379, 387, 29 Pac. 776; People v. Stoll, 143 Cal. 689, 696, 77 Pac. 818. Under the provisions of section 1020, Pen. Code, the defense here invoked is available under the plea of not guilty.

The object of all such provisions as those contained in section 64, Pen. Code, is simply to provide one coming within its terms with an absolute legal defense to any prosecution that may thereafter be instituted against him for any offense concerning which he may have testified. The section simply means that the showing of the facts therein stated, when made to the court having jurisdiction of the case, shall be a full and complete defense to any prosecution thereafter instituted. So construed, it, under the decisions, satisfies the constitutional guaranty.

It is unnecessary to here determine whether the indictment should have been dismissed by the superior court upon the motion for dismissal made by petitioner upon the grounds here urged in support of the application for a writ of prohibition. If the court erred in denying the motion, its error can be rectified upon an appeal from any judgment that may hereafter be pronounced.

It is suggested that the indictment fails to state a public offense, for the reason that the oath which the defendant omitted and refused to administer is in violation of section 5, art. 2, of the Constitution of California, which provides as follows: "All elections by the people shall be by ballot or by such other method as may be prescribed by law: provided, that secrecy in voting be preserved." The oath mentioned, to be taken by a voter challenged on the ground that he has not a bona fide present intention of supporting the nominees of the party in whose nominating convention he seeks to participate, by voting for delegates thereto, is one to the effect that he has a present bona fide intention to support the nominees of such convention. Assuming that the question thus raised is one that may properly be determined in this proceeding, it is manifest that there is nothing in the point thus made. By section 2½ of the same article of the Constitution, adopted in the year 1900, the Legislature is expressly empowered to determine the tests and conditions upon which electors may participate in any primary election; and there is nothing in a provision enacted by the Legislature in pursuance of this authority, requiring one seeking to participate in such an election as a member of any particular party to openly declare his allegiance to such party, which in any degree violates the constitutional provision invoked. Such a declaration is absolutely essential to the proper working of any primary law. By his mere offer to vote for delegates to a convention of any party, the elector does, in effect, declare his intention to support the nominees of such convention, and the oath is provided for as a guaranty of the truth of the declaration already made by such offer to vote.

The alternative writ of prohibition heretofore issued is discharged, and the petition for a writ of prohibition is denied.

PEOPLE v. GRIFFITH. (Cr. 1,179.)*

(Supreme Court of California. March 1, 1905.)

CRIMINAL LAW — INSTRUCTIONS — DEFENSE OF INSANITY—EVIDENCE—ORDER OF PROOF —QUESTIONS TO EXPERTS.

1. On a prosecution for assault with intent to commit murder, the defense was alcoholic insanity at the time of the crime. There was evidence that defendant had drunk liquor on the day of the crime. One of his physicians testified that, from defendant's statements, he judged that defendant drank about a pint of whisky a day for a great many years, and hypothetical questions addressed to the physicians assumed the drinking from a pint to a pint and a half of whisky a day, together with quantities of champagne; and his wife testified that he had questioned her about his being poisoned by her, such questions being from the effects of drink. The court, at the request of defendant, charged that, while voluntary intoxication is no excuse for a criminal act committed under its influence, the jury were to consider insanity caused by it in the same way as insanity produced by any other cause. Held, that under such evidence, and in view of the instruction given, it was not error for the court to instruct that voluntary intoxication is no excuse for crime, but may be considered when the existence of a particular motive is necessary, and in determining the degree of crime, and that the jury, in weighing the evidence offered to show the excessive use of alcohol, should keep in mind the distinction between a state of ordinary drunkenness and alcoholic insanity.

2. Where the defense on a prosecution for assault with intent to commit murder was insanity, and the jury were repeatedly instructed on the doctrine of reasonable doubt, and upon insanity, proved by a preponderance of the evidence, entitling a defendant to an acquittal on any criminal charge, an instruction that if the jury entertained the conviction, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant committed an assault on prosecutrix with an intent to kill her, they should find defendant guilty of assault with a deadly weapon, was not erroneous on the ground that, the assault being admitted, the instruction commanded the jury to find defendant guilty.

3. Where, on a prosecution for assault with intent to commit crime, the only issue was whether defendant was insane at the time of the commission of the assault, the refusal of an instruction that defendant was presumed to be a man of good character was not erroneous.

4. On a prosecution for assault with intent to commit murder, an instruction stating the penalty for an assault with a deadly weapon was no ground for reversal; the instruction being correct in point of law, and the giving of the same being a mere impropriety.

5. An instruction that, when partial insanity or insane delusion or hallucination is relied on as a defense in a criminal prosecution, it must be made to appear that the crime charged was the offspring of such insanity, and not the result of sane reasoning and natural motives, was proper.

6. On a prosecution, where the defense was alcoholic insanity, witnesses for defendant testified, as experts, that he was suffering from chronic alcoholic insanity, and were cross-examined on the symptoms and hallucinations found in such cases. The state then introduced experts who testified that defendant was not a victim of alcoholic insanity, because of the absence of a certain delusion always found in such cases; and the defense then sought to ask experts, in surrebutter, as to whether the delusion in question was an essential element in the determination of alcoholic insanity. Held, that the question called for an opinion in reference to a matter which was not surrebutter.

7. The rule as to privileged communications between a physician and patient does not apply in a criminal case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 50, Cent. Dig. Witnesses, § 769.]

8. On a prosecution for assault with intent to commit murder, where the defense was insanity, a witness for the state was asked a hypothetical question, which, after setting forth the evidence as in an assumed case, concluded, "Now state whether or not, in your opinion, such a subject * * * was laboring under a delusion." Held, that the question was not improper, as asking for the opinion of the witness as to whether defendant was insane at the time of the crime.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Smith, Judge.

J. Griffith was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Earl Rogers, J. W. McKinley, John T. Jones, and Luther G. Brown, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Henry T. Gage, I. B. Dockweiler, and W. I. Foley, Special Counsel, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant was charged with the crime of assault with intent to commit murder. The jury returned a verdict finding him guilty of the lesser crime of assault with a deadly weapon. From the judgment which followed upon the entry of this verdict, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals.

The assault was committed upon the person of defendant's wife, and her narrative of the occurrence may be thus set forth: The Griffiths had been living at the Arcadia Hotel, in Santa Monica, and were about to remove to Los Angeles. Upon September 3d the defendant went from Los Angeles to Santa Monica, and proposed to his wife a walk upon the beach. They took this walk, purchasing some souvenir postal cards at a curio store; thence to the plunge bath; and thence back to the hotel, where the wife resumed the packing of her trunks, as they were to leave the hotel the following day. She had nearly packed her trunk when her husband entered. He took his overcoat from the closet and placed it in the trunk which she was packing, went into another of their apartments, and, when next he entered the room, brought with him his wife's prayer book. His wife, noticing it, said: "Never mind about the things in the top bureau. I will pack them later." Her husband handed her the prayer book, and told her to get down on her knees and swear to certain things he was about to ask her. She was very much alarmed, and she took the book, got down on her knees; and then, noticing a revolver in his hand, she pleaded with him to put the revolver away. He said, "Close your eyes, and do as I command you." When his wife saw he was determined, she asked him to let her pray, and raised her eyes and prayed. After she had ceased her prayer, he asked her three questions. He took a slip of paper out of his pocket, and read the questions from the slip, and asked her the first question—if she knew who had been responsible, or who had poisoned Mr. Briswalter. She answered no; that Mr. Briswalter had not been poisoned, but had died from blood poisoning. She undertook to narrate the circumstances of his sickness, when her husband immediately stopped her, and said, "That is enough." He then asked, "Have you ever been implicated in trying to poison me?" and she replied, "Why, papa! I have never harmed as much as a hair of your head." "The third question was, if I had ever been untrue to him. I said, 'You know I have not,' and with that I was shot. I immediately jumped up on my feet, and I said, 'Why did you shoot me?' and I backed towards the window, with one hand up against my face, and with the other I raised the window, and out I went on my back. As soon as I struck the roof below, I picked myself up as well as I could, and reached the room directly under this, got up and raised the window, and went over to the stand, and got a towel and stayed the wound—the flow of blood. In the meantime, Mr. Wright, of the Hotel Arcadia, opened the door, and Mr. Wright's back stood— I could see the face of Mr. Griffith, and I says: 'For God's sake, don't let him in! He has just shot me. He must have been crazy,' I said in an offhand way." The bullet struck the unfortunate woman upon the eyebrow, and the lead was split, part of the missile destroying the sight of her eye.

The defense was alcoholic insanity. The defendant was not a witness in his own behalf, but evidence was offered to show, and the line of defense was, that he had always been a man of oddities, and eccentricities; that for years he had been a heavy drinker, and usually a secret and solitary drinker. This excessive use of liquor, so persisted in, acting upon his mind, a trifle eccentric at all times, produced a condition which the physicians for the defense described as chronic, alcoholic, illusional insanity; that he was a man of overweening and inordinate vanity; that he entertained the delusion that his wife had been attempting his death by poison; that he entertained the delusion that his wife had been false to her marital vows; that he entertained the delusion, in connection with the poisoning, that his wife, who was of the Catholic faith, was the chosen instrument of the church for his destruction. As to the circumstances attending the shooting of Mrs. Griffith there is little or no substantial controversy, saving upon one matter—the nature of the shooting itself. Here the contention of the defense is that the defendant, even in his insanity, did not designedly cause the discharge of the pistol; that his wife was making oath, as her husband was demanding, so that there was no occasion to shoot her; that the pistol was a hair-trigger weapon; and that it was discharged accidentally, either because of the extreme nervousness of the insane man, or because his wife, in her terror and fear, grasped it and attempted to wring it from his hands. Upon the part of the prosecution it was, however, contended, and evidence was offered to show (as tending both to prove sanity and motive), that while defendant was, admittedly, an extremely vain and self-sufficient man, he was fully competent to transact, and did transact, business of magnitude and consequence; that he drank heavily, and while in his drunken fits was suspicious, jealous, and abusive of his wife; that differences had existed between them, of long standing, over religious questions, and over the wife's property rights, concerning which she had tried, and tried in vain, to compel from him a settlement; that she had threatened to leave him if he continued to drink; and that, in his wrath over all these matters, inflamed by liquor, he had brutally done the deed.

The Griffiths were people of wealth and consequence in the community. Special counsel, eminent in the law, were, as is usual in such cases, employed upon either side. The trial was a protracted one. Much expert evidence from physicians was produced upon either side, and many exceptions were reserved by the defense, all of which are here pressed upon us for consideration. We can notice only those which present matters of serious consideration. Some of the others, even if technically errors, could not, from the nature of the case, have injured in the slightest respect the defendant's rights. Nor do we consider it necessary to present the facts of the case with any more elaboration and detail than as above given. It is, perhaps, however, proper to add that it was not pretended by the defense that there was any foundation, in the slightest degree, for the charges and insinuations which the defendant brought against his wife; but, to the contrary, it was admitted that she stood wholly blameless in all those matters.

The instructions given and refused by the court upon the subject of insanity are first attacked, and at the outset it is said that the court erred in instructing the jury to the effect that voluntary intoxication is no excuse for crime, but may be considered when an actual existence of a particular motive is necessary to constitute a crime, and in determining the degree of crime, and in further instructing the jury that in weighing the evidence offered to show the excessive use of alcohol by the defendant, as bearing upon the question of his responsibility, they should keep in mind the distinction between a state of ordinary drunkenness and alcoholic insanity. It is urged that these instructions were prejudicial to the defendant, in that there was no evidence to show that at the time of the shooting the defendant was drunk or voluntarily intoxicated, or in a condition of involuntary intoxication. But there was positive evidence that the defendant had drunk liquor upon the very day of the shooting. It was in evidence from the testimony of at least one of his physicians that, from the defendant's statements, he judged that he drank about a pint of whisky a day for a great many years, and sometimes greatly exceeded this. The hypothetical questions addressed to the physicians assumed "that a man has used from a pint to a pint and a half of whisky a day, intermixed with quantities of champagne"; and in the testimony of the wife, when asked upon the cross-examination whether her husband, in times past, had not propounded similar questions to her about her infidelity and about his being poisoned. she answered that he had done so "when he was drunk." Counsel for the defense then asked this question: "And after he had been drinking and hardly recovered, sometimes? A. Well, it was principally from the effects of drink he propounded these questions." Such being the condition of the evidence, it not only cannot be said that it was error for the court to instruct upon the subject of voluntary intoxication, but, to the contrary, it was the duty of the court so to have instructed, in order that the jury might be enlightened as to the difference between such voluntary intoxication and insanity, the result of long-continued and excessive alcoholism. And finally, upon this point, it may be added that the court not only cautioned the jury to distinguish between voluntary intoxication, and insanity which may be the result of it, but charged the jury, at the request of the defendant, in this language: "While voluntary intoxication or drunkenness is no excuse for a criminal act committed under its influence, yet you are to consider insanity caused by it in the same way as insanity produced by any other cause."

Appellant detaches from its context an instruction which the court gave, to the effect that if they entertained a conviction, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant committed an assault upon the person of his wife, as charged in the information, but not with an intent to kill her or murder her, they should find the defendant guilty of assault with a deadly weapon. It is charged against this instruction that as, admittedly, such an assault had been made, it commanded the jury to find him guilty. But the vice of this is, as has been frequently pointed out by this court, in detaching the instruction and asking that it be read as though it were the only instruction given by the court upon the whole subject-matter. The jury were repeatedly and re-repeatedly instructed upon the doctrine of reasonable doubt and upon insanity proved by a preponderance of evidence, entitling a defendant to an acquittal on any criminal charge.

The court refused to give an instruction at the request of the defendant to the effect that the defendant was by law presumed to be a man of good character, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary; and, to show error, reliance is had upon People v. Gleason, 122 Cal. 370, 55 Pac. 123. In that case, however, an instruction was actually given by the judge to the effect that the people are not permitted to assail the character of a defendant until the defendant has himself put his character in issue by calling witnesses and offering evidence in its support, and, unless put in issue by the defendant, the people can in no way attack his character. This court's language in People v. Gleason was directed to that state of facts, and it was held that it constituted an unwarranted reflection upon the defendant, in suggesting to the jury that, if the prosecution had an opportunity to do so, they might possibly have shown that he was not a man of good character. In the present case no evidence as to character was introduced, and no instruction as to character was given; and, as is said further in People v. Gleason, "Instructions upon abstract rules of law, which have no application to the evidence in the case, tend to confuse rather than to enlighten the jury, and ought not to be given." While in People v. Doggett, 62 Cal. 27, it is said that a defendant's good reputation as to traits involved in the charge, if proved, should be weighed as any other fact established. The error of the court in the Gleason Case arose from the giving of an instruction not addressed to the evidence, and extremely prejudicial to the defendant. It may not be said that in this case, in the absence of any evidence, the court's refusal to give the desired instruction was error, to the prejudice of defendant, for the reason that the acts charged against the defendant were admitted, and are in the brief of the appellant expressly admitted. It is further admitted that those acts, if committed by a sane man, constituted the crime of which the defendant was convicted. The single issue, therefore, before the jury, over which contest was raised, was whether or not the defendant was sane at the time of their commission.

After having retired to deliberate upon their verdict, the jury asked to be returned to court to receive further instructions, and, when in court, asked, "What is the penalty for an assault with a deadly weapon?" In answer to this query, the court correctly instructed them as to the penalty. It has been held that an incorrect instruction upon this subject is not only erroneous in itself, but is to be regarded as prejudicial to a defendant. Blashfield's Instructions to Juries, par. 189. But upon the other hand, where the instruction upon this point is correct in point of law, this court has declared that, while it is an impropriety and irregularity, it is not such an irregularity and impropriety as should work a reversal of the case. "Nor is it one of which the defendant may justly complain, since the influence upon the jury is most favorable to him." People v. Dice, 120 Cal. 202, 52 Pac. 477; People v. Jackson, 57 Cal. 316.

The instruction to the effect that, when partial insanity or insane delusion or hallucination is relied upon, it must be made to appear that the crime charged was the product or offspring of such insanity, insane delusions, or hallucinations, and not the result of some sane reasoning and natural motives, was an instruction approved by this court in bank in People v. Hubert, 119 Cal. 216, 51 Pac. 329, 63 Am. St. Rep. 72; and, upon reconsideration, we are still of the opinion that it is not only sound in point of law, but, as addressed to the evidence in the case at bar, was pertinent and admissible.

The foregoing disposes of appellant's objections raised upon the instructions.

Upon the rulings of the court in admitting and rejecting evidence, it is urged that the court erred in refusing the defense an opportunity to present evidence in rebuttal upon the proposition of chronic alcoholic insanity. The defendant, it seems, had submitted himself for examination to certain medical men shortly after the shooting, and had declared to them his symptoms, hallucinations, or beliefs. Upon this they testified as experts that he was suffering from chronic alcoholic insanity, or, as one of the physicians phrased it, "He may not be legally insane, but he certainly is not sane." These physicians were carried through a long course of cross-examination upon the symptoms and hallucinations found in chronic alcoholic insanity, and testified fully upon these matters. The prosecution, to meet this evidence, called their physicians and medical men as experts, who gave their views as to the symptoms and hallucinations which were present in and necessarily accompanied chronic alcoholic insanity. They were asked and answered hypothetical questions addressed to the evidence in the case, and declared that, in their view, the defendant was not suffering from chronic alcoholic insanity. A great deal of this evidence was offered and received upon either side. Finally, when the prosecution rested its rebuttal, defendant attempted to recall his medical experts to disprove by them certain statements made by the experts for the prosecution, and in particular this statement: Certain of the medical experts for the prosecution had testified, in expressing their belief that the defendant was not the victim of chronic alcoholic insanity, that the existence of a delusion touching the sexual organs was always found in such cases. The question sought to be asked by the defense of their experts in surrebutter was the following: "Referring to the symptoms of chronic alcoholic insanity, state whether, in your opinion, a delusion with reference to the sexual organs of the patient is an essential element in the determination of the existence of chronic insanity in the patient." The question was objected to, and the objection sustained, upon the ground that it called for an opinion in reference to a matter which is not surrebutter. We think the ruling was correct. The defense, in making out its case of insanity, had called its experts. They had been interrogated as to the symptoms which they themselves said were necessarily present in a patient so afflicted. In rebuttal the prosecution asked their experts for their opinions under the evidence in the case; and, in the view of these experts, the defendant was not suffering from this form of insanity. Some of these experts, as reason for their belief, stated that this particular delusion was an essential delusion in chronic alcoholic insanity. If it be conceded that it was technically surrebutter to allow the defense, in turn, to show by the opinion of their recalled experts that such a delusion was not essential, nevertheless it was but touching directly upon a matter which these same witnesses had discussed indirectly in their first examinations. If the practice could be continued without being checked in the discretion of the court, it could go on to infinity. So that, even if it be regarded as technically evidence in surrebutter, the whole ground of the examination had previously been completely covered. What has here been said refers to the whole line of questions upon the same general subject-matter which were asked by the defense in surrebutter, and to which questions the court sustained the objections of the prosecution. To illustrate that the matter had been gone into upon the defendant's case in chief, it will be sufficient to quote the question put to Dr. Nichols, appellant's witness, by one of his counsel: "Q. Do you further agree with Spitzka on this proposition? The persecutory delusions of alcoholism relate to the sexual organs, to the sexual relations, and to poisoning. This fact is so constant a one that the combination of a delusion of the sexual organs with the delusion that the patient's food is poisoned, and that his wife is unfaithful to him, may be considered as nearly to demonstrate the existence of alcoholic insanity as any one group of symptoms in mental pathology can prove anything. A. That is absolutely correct."

Error is urged also in the asking of certain hypothetical questions by the prosecution, it being insisted that these questions contain elements not found in the evidence itself. It would unduly and uselessly prolong this to set forth these matters in detail, and it must suffice to say that an examination of the evidence in the case does not disclose that there was any unfairness or any hardship to appellant or to his case from the questions which were permitted. Nor do we perceive that the court erred in limiting the cross-examination of certain of the experts.

As to the alleged error in admitting the evidence of Drs. Bryant and Davisson, in that it called for a disclosure of privileged communications, not only was no such point or objection made at the trial, but the rule as to privileged communications between a party and his physician does not apply in a criminal case. People v. West, 106 Cal. 89, 39 Pac. 207. Of a hypothetical question asked of Dr. Gardner, it is said that it contained a résumé of the acts of the defendant at the time of the shooting, and concluded by asking for the opinion of the witness as to whether the defendant was laboring under an insane delusion at the time of the act. The objection is highly technical, and is not supported by the record itself. The question, after setting forth the evidence as in an assumed case, concludes: "Now, state whether or not, in your opinion, such a subject, asking such questions, and acting in such a manner, was laboring under a delusion in respect to his wife's infidelity, or was laboring under a delusion in respect to poisoning." In every case where a hypothetical question is asked, based upon the evidence, it is not to be presumed that the jury is so stupid as not to understand that it is addressed to the supposed acts, facts, and conditions of the defendant in the case; and the answer which the witness gives to such hypothetical question must have its weight with the jury as bearing upon the defendant's individual case, or else the jury, through their ignorance and density, would be unfit to sit in any cause. But we cannot perceive in this question any just ground for complaint. It is true, the facts embraced in the hypothetical question were the facts disclosed by the evidence; but the witness was not asked if, under these circumstances, the defendant was sane or insane. The interrogatory was based upon assumptions, and the question in conclusion was whether "such a subject" would be sane or insane, and not whether the defendant was sane or insane.

We have thus considered all the points which seem to call for special mention. Upon a review of the whole case, we do not perceive that the defendant had other than a fair and impartial trial. The acts which he committed were brutal and unpardonable, excepting upon the theory of insanity. The jury seems to have concluded that he was legally sane and responsible for his acts, but seems further to have entertained a reasonable doubt as to whether or not he actually and deliberately did the shooting, or whether his crime ceased with the assault, and the actual shooting was the result of misadventure. It gave him the benefit of the doubt in this instance, and so convicted him of a lesser crime; and, for the reasons above given, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

KOEHLER v. HOLT MFG. CO. (Sac. 1,329.)

JUDGMENT — RES JUDICATA — MATTERS LITIGATED—ISSUES RAISED BY PLEADINGS.

1. Where, in an action for monthly sums due under an order made by a third person whereby he directed defendant to pay out of moneys to become due from him to the third person a specified sum per month to plaintiff, the question whether the order had been revoked was litigated, the decision that it had been revoked was conclusive in a subsequent suit by plaintiff for other installments alleged to be due under the order.

2. The fact that the action originated before a justice of the peace, and that the judgment was rendered by the superior court on appeal, did not affect the conclusiveness of the matter litigated.

3. In an action in justice's court for the amounts due under an order directing defendant to pay to plaintiff a specified sum per month, the complaint alleged that there was due under the order a specified sum. This allegation was denied. Held, that the pleadings were sufficient to raise the issue whether the order had been previously revoked, and defendant, under the issue, could prove that the order had been revoked, so that there was nothing due under it.

4. A court having jurisdiction of an action has power to determine what facts are put in issue by the pleadings, when they are imperfectly stated, and, having such power, it may make an erroneous decision of the question, which cannot be questioned collaterally.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Action by J. P. Koehler against the Holt Manufacturing Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jacobs & Flack, for appellant. Louttit & Middlecoff, for respondent.

SHAW, J. On January 15, 1901, one George E. Chapman, upon a sufficient and valid consideration, made an order in writing directing the defendant, out of the moneys thereafter to become due from him to Chapman, to pay to the plaintiff, from and after the date thereof, the sum of $25 per month, to be applied upon the purchase price of a certain tract of land theretofore purchased of said Koehler by Kate Chapman, who was the wife of said George E. Chapman, and from whom he was living separate and apart. The defendants on the same day accepted the order in writing. Thereafter, until January 1, 1902, the defendant paid the sums specified in the order, in accordance therewith. On January 25, 1902, Chapman executed an instrument purporting to revoke, annul, and cancel the said order, and served it upon the defendant; directing it to make no further payments under the order. The present suit is to recover the sum of $325, alleged to be due, under the terms of the order, for the 13 months beginning May 1, 1902, and ending June 1, 1903. The defendant answered, the court made its findings and entered judgment in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The answer, among other things, alleged that theretofore, on May 26, 1902, the plaintiff began an action in a justice's court to recover the amounts due under the order for the months of January, February, March, and April of 1902; that thereafter such proceedings were had that the defendant appeared in said action after judgment was duly given in said justice's court in favor of the defendant; that plaintiff appealed therefrom to the superior court of the county of San Joaquin; and that in the superior court judgment was duly given in favor of the defendant, to the effect that the defendant was not and is not liable on account of the contracts set forth in the complaint in this action, and that the acceptance of the order set forth in the complaint in this action had been abrogated and annulled. The facts concerning the former adjudication are found by the court as alleged in the answer.

We are of the opinion that the plaintiff is estopped by the former judgment. It is true, it was not rendered in a suit to recover the same installments that are involved in this action, and consequently it is not technically a bar to the present action. But it appears by the record in the former action that it was a suit to recover the amounts due, under the terms of the accepted order, for the four months previous to the time here involved; that in defense the defendant relied upon the same revocation of January 25, 1902, upon which he relies in the case at bar; that the validity and effect of that revocation was litigated and submitted to the court in that action; and that the court decided that it was valid, that its effect was to abrogate and annul the defendant's acceptance of the order and put an end to its liability thereon, and rendered judgment accordingly. The case comes clearly within the principle that a judgment operates as an estoppel to preclude the "parties and privies from contending to the contrary of that point or matter of fact which, having been once distinctly put in issue by them, has been, on such issue joined, solemnly found against them." Outram v. Morewood, 3 East, 346; Cromwell v. County of Sac, 94 U. S. 353, 24 L. Ed. 195; Wiese v. S. F. Mus. Soc., 82 Cal. 645, 23 Pac. 212, 7 L. R. A. 577; Freeman v. Barnum, 131 Cal. 389, 63 Pac. 691, 82 Am. St. Rep. 355. If in the former suit the defense had been based exclusively on some other point than the effect of the revocation to terminate its liability—as, for instance, on the claim that the installments there sued for had been paid—there would be no bar, for the present suit is for different installments; and it would not have constituted an estoppel, for a decision that those installments had been paid would not affect the right to recover other installments. But the point involved and decided was the effect of the revocation upon the liability of the defendant, which is precisely the point involved in the defense to the present action; and, as it was solemnly decreed and adjudged against plaintiff in that action, he is now precluded from contending to the contrary of what was there decided.

The effect of the estoppel is not changed by the circumstance that the former action originated before a justice of the peace, and that the judgment relied on was given by the superior court on appeal. Wiese v. S. F. Mus. Soc., supra.

The objection that the validity of the revocation was not put in issue in the former suit is not tenable. There was, it is true, no formal answer setting up the revocation, such as might be considered necessary in a suit begun in the superior court. But the pleadings in justices' courts are not required to be in any particular form, and when the case comes before the superior court on appeal their effect and sufficiency are to be judged by the same standards as when it is before the justice of the peace. In construing them, when they come under consideration collaterally, as in the present case, the rule excluding conclusions of law, as no proper part of a pleading, does not apply. Indeed, it may be doubted if, for the purpose of exhibiting the contentions of the respective parties in cases in a justice's court, conclusions either of law or fact are not always to be given full effect in any subsequent review of the proceedings. The complaint in the former case alleged that "there is now due, owing, and unpaid from said defendant to plaintiff for said months, * * * under said written instrument, the sum of $100," and this allegation was denied. This appears sufficient to raise the issue. If the order had previously been revoked and annulled, there would not be any sum due or owing as alleged, and hence, under the liberal rule allowed in justices' courts, the defendant, upon this issue, could prove a revocation of the order.

Furthermore, it must be conceded that the court, having jurisdiction of such an action, has power to determine what facts are put in issue by the pleadings, where they are ambiguously or imperfectly stated; and, having such power, it may make an erroneous decision of the question, and such decision cannot be questioned collaterally. There can be no doubt as to the action of the superior court in the present instance. In the judgment rendered upon the appeal it made special findings, in which the order, the acceptance, and the revocation are set out in full; and, as a conclusion of law, it decided that the acceptance of the order was annulled and abrogated by the revocation. It did in fact in that case adjudge the very point here in issue, and the plaintiff is thereby estopped. The estoppel was properly pleaded, and the court found the facts upon sufficient evidence, and rightfully gave judgment in favor of the defendant. This issue is conclusive of the case, and it is unnecessary for us to consider the other points here presented.

CASTAGNETTO v. COPPERTOWN MINING & SMELTING CO. et al.

(S. F. 3,422.)

LABORER'S LIEN—NOTICE OF LIEN—SUFFICIENCY—APPEAL—ALLOWANCE OF ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. The court on appeal from a judgment without any bill of exceptions must assume that the findings are supported by the evidence.

2. A notice of a laborer's lien for work performed in a mining claim, which states the name of the reputed owner, who is found to be the owner in fact, and which states that the labor was performed at the request of a person named, who was then the superintendent of the corporation operating the mine, is sufficient within Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, requiring a notice of laborers' liens to state the name of the owner or reputed owner and the name of the person by whom he was employed.

3. A notice of a laborer's lien for work performed in a mining claim, which states that the labor was performed by the day at an agreed price of $2.75 per day between designated dates, and that the amount claimed was justly due, sufficiently gives the terms and conditions of the contract of employment.

4. A notice of a laborer's lien for work performed in a mining claim, which states that the claimant performed labor "on that certain copper mine situated," etc., and that he claims a miner's lien "upon said mining claim," sufficiently shows that the labor was performed "in a mining claim."

5. The court on appeal from a judgment foreclosing 12 separate laborers' liens cannot, in the absence of any evidence as to the amount of services, disturb an allowance of $75 for attorney's fees in each of the liens.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; John M. Corcoran, Judge.

Action by Daniel Castagnetto against the Coppertown Mining & Smelting Company and Lorenzo Costa. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Costa appeals. Modified.

Congdon & Congdon, E. B. Young, and Aylett R. Cotton, for appellant. J. J. Trabucco, R. B. Stolder, and J. S. Larew, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought by plaintiff in his own right and as assignee of several other parties to foreclose liens for labor performed in a mining claim on the premises of appellant described in the complaint. He recovered judgment for the amount of the claims, interest, and attorney's fees. A decree was accordingly entered, directing a sale of appellant's property to satisfy the judgment. From the judgment this appeal is taken by Costa, the owner of the premises.

The appeal being from the judgment without any bill of exceptions, we must presume that the findings are supported by the evidence. No question is made as to the judgment not being the legal conclusion from the facts found. The main point relied upon is that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, and this goes to the sufficiency of the notices of liens, as they are each annexed as an exhibit to the complaint, and made a part thereof. The notices are all practically in the same form, and subject to the same criticism, and the discussion of the first one—that of plaintiff's individual claim—will be sufficient. It is, so far as material here, as follows: "Know all men by these presents: That I, Daniel Castagnetto, a resident of Hunter's Valley, in the county of Mariposa, state of California, have done work and performed labor by the day at the agreed price of two 75-100 dollars per day on that certain copper mine situated in Hunter's Valley mining district, in the county of Mariposa, state of California, known as and called the Tandem Copper Mine and Mill Site; * * * that such work was done by me between the 1st day of August, A. D. 1901, and the 20th day of September, A. D. 1901, at the instance and request of A. V. Oliver, who was the superintendent of the Coppertown Mining & Smelting Co. (a corporation), which was then and there in the possession of and was operating said mine; that the name of the reputed owner of said mine and mill site is Lorenzo Costa; that thirty days have not elapsed since the last work and labor was done and performed by me on said mine; that, after deducting all just credits and offsets to my said demand, there is now justly due and owing to me thereon the full sum of one hundred and forty 25-100 dollars, for which sum I intend to claim and hold, and do hereby claim and hold, a miner's lien upon said mining claim, together with its improvements and appurtenances, under and by virtue of the statute in such case made and provided." It was signed and properly verified.

The first objection made to it is that it fails to state what the title of the Coppertown Company was, or what relation existed between the company and appellant. The statute only requires in this regard that a notice of laborers' lien shall state the name of the owner or reputed owner, if known, and also the name of the person by whom he was employed. Code Civ. Proc. § 1187. This notice states the name of the reputed owner, who is found to be the owner in fact. It states that the labor was performed at the request of Oliver, which is substantially a statement that the claimant was employed by Oliver. The statute does not require the lien claimant to state in his notice the relation that exists between the person occupying or in possession of the property and the owner. It would often be a matter beyond the knowledge of the claimant and difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain. These notices of lien are often made out on a blank form by the claimant, or some friend or person not versed in the law, and are surrounded with sufficient difficulties and obstacles by requiring that the statute be substantially complied with, without imposing terms and conditions not required by the statute. A substantial statement of the facts required by the statute is sufficient. Whether, the facts being truly stated, as required by the statute, the person in possession of the property, or the person by whom the laborer was employed, had authority to bind the owner as agent, is a matter for allegation and proof at the trial. Lumber Co. v. Gottschalk, 81 Cal. 641, 22 Pac. 860; Reed v. Norton, 90 Cal. 590, 26 Pac. 767, 27 Pac. 426.

It is next urged that the notice does not give the statement of the "terms, time given, and conditions of its contract." It states that the labor was performed by the day at the agreed price of $2.75 per day, between the 1st day of August and the 20th day of September, 1901, and that the amount is justly due and owing. This is a statement sufficient as to the claim of a laborer. He was to be paid by the day an agreed price, to labor in a certain mine described in the notice. There are no conditions or terms mentioned that are left uncertain or in doubt. Every one knows what such a contract of employment means. It was a substantial compliance with the statute. Tredinnick v. Mining Co., 72 Cal. 78, 13 Pac. 152; Blackman v. Marsicano, 61 Cal. 639.

Objection is made that the notice does not show or state that the labor was performed "in a mining claim," but "on that certain copper mine." Again we think the objection extremely technical. It appears that the plaintiff claims a "miner's lien upon said mining claim." If the labor was not performed in the mining claim, it could have been easily proven at the trial. The court found that the labor was performed in and upon the said mines. It was said by Judge Field in Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S. 649, 26 L. Ed. 875, that in one sense the terms "his mining claim" and "location" are "identical, and the two designations may be indiscriminately used to denote the same thing." The court held in Malone v. Big Flat Gravel Mining Co., 76 Cal. 585, 18 Pac. 772, that work in a blacksmith shop in making pipe and sharpening picks and drills used in mining was "work upon the mine" for which the laborer had a lien. In Hamilton v. Delhi Mining Co., 118 Cal. 150, 50 Pac. 378, the notices of liens of the laborers described the work as performed "on the plant and consolidated mines of defendant," and the liens were held good, although the point here was not discussed. In Helm v. Chapman, 66 Cal. 291, 5 Pac. 352, this court, in speaking of a lien on a mining claim, said: "The intention of the lawmakers seems to have been to give a lien upon the whole claim for labor performed on, and for material furnished for and used in any structure, or on or in the alteration or repair of any structure, or on or in the mining claim." While the courts always require a substantial compliance with the statute in regard to the statement in the notice of lien and the proceedings thereunder, yet they will not give the statute such a narrow or technical construction as to fritter away, impede, and destroy the right of the lien claimant. Ascha v. Fitch (Cal.) 46 Pac. 298; Hagman v. Williams, 88 Cal. 151, 25 Pac. 1111; Russ Lumber Co. v. Garrettson, 87 Cal. 595, 25 Pac. 747; McGinty v. Morgan, 122 Cal. 105, 54 Pac. 392. In the latter case it is said: "The statute is a remedial statute, and for the purpose of carrying it into effect the object for which it was enacted is to receive a liberal construction, and the notices which under its provisions are required to be given have regard to substance rather than to form." The above statement was repeated and quoted with approval in Macomber v. Bigelow, 126 Cal. 16, 58 Pac. 312.

Finally, it is suggested that the court erred in allowing $75 for attorney's fees in each of the 12 separate liens, making $900 in all. The fee certainly seems on its face to be large, but we cannot, upon the record before us, say that it is more than the court, in its discretion, should have allowed. See Pacific Mut. L. I. Co. v. Fisher, 106 Cal. 234, 39 Pac. 758. It is admitted that the judgment and decree should not have barred the appellant from all right at any time to redeem the said premises after sale.

The decree should be modified by inserting therein, after the sentence, "And forever barred and foreclosed of all right and equity of redemption of, in, or to said premises," the following: "From and after the delivery of the sheriff's deed after sale as hereinafter provided." As so modified, the judgment should be affirmed, the respondent to recover his costs on this appeal.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment as modified is affirmed, the respondent to recover his costs on this appeal. ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

SHAW, J. (concurring). I concur. The court below, knowing the time occupied in the trial, the difficulties presented, and the labor, knowledge, and skill required in the conduct of the case throughout, together with the facts appearing from the papers on file, could therefrom make a just estimate of the value of the services of the plaintiff's attorney. But this court, seeing only the judgment roll, cannot, from that alone, intelligently review the decision of the lower court on the subject. If it affirmatively appeared that nothing was done in the lower court except what is shown by the judgment roll, I should not doubt that the allowance was too large. But there may have been facts to justify it, the existence of which are not negatived by anything appearing on the face of the roll. If the appellant desired this court to review that part of the decision, he should have placed before us, by bill of exceptions or otherwise, not necessarily the evidence in the case, but at all events, the evidence, if any, on that question, and a statement of the facts relating to the amount and value of the services performed by the attorney which were within the knowledge of the court below, and which it must have considered in making the allowance.

STREET RAILROADS — FRANCHISES — CONSTRUCTION—ISSUANCE OF TRANSFERS—ASSIGNMENT OF RIGHTS.

1. A grant, assignment, lease, or transfer of a street railway franchise carries with it and imposes upon the grantee or assignee all the duties and obligations which rested upon the original holder of the franchise.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 44, Cent. Dig. Street Railroads, §§ 123-126.]

2. An assignee of a street railway franchise, a condition of which required the holder thereof to issue transfers to other lines in the city operated by it or its assigns, which assigned its rights in the franchise to another, and ceased operating cars under the franchise, could not be compelled to interchange transfers with its assignee from and to its remaining lines operated under other franchises.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action of mandate by D. S. Reynolds against the Pacific Electric Railway Company and another. From a judgment granting the relief sought, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Bicknell, Gibson & Trask and Dunn & Crutcher, for appellants. Emmet H. Wilson and W. B. Mathews (H. J. Goudge, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was in mandate to compel the defendants to interchange transfers upon their respective lines of street railways intersecting East Ninth street in the city of Los Angeles. Eliminating from consideration the question of the right of the petitioner to seek relief in mandate, the following are the undisputed facts presented: In 1897 the city of Los Angeles granted to one Kays and his assigns a franchise for the construction and operation of an electric street railway over and along certain streets in the city of Los Angeles, and in particular over a portion of Ninth street between Santa Fé avenue and Spring street. Many conditions and burdens went with the franchise — paving and macadamizing the roadway between the tracks and for two feet on each side, establishing and maintaining grades, flumes, and culverts, furnishing transportation to school children at half fare, carrying policemen, firemen, and city officials free of charge; and (we here quote from section 6 of the ordinance): "Sec. 6. Provided, further, that said grantee and his assigns will issue to and receive from the present line of street railway located on Mateo street and Santa Fé avenue, and all other lines of street railways in said city operated by said grantee or his assigns, transfers good for continuous single trips thereon in said city." Thereafter the defendant the Los Angeles Railway Company acquired the Ninth street franchise by assignment, and until January, 1904, the Los Angeles Railway Company operated a street railway upon Ninth street. It likewise operated other lines of street railway, and during all of the time it owned the Ninth street franchise, it issued transfers from the Ninth Street Line to its other lines, and, conversely, transfers from its other lines to the Ninth Street Line. The Los Angeles Railway Company in turn duly sold, assigned, and transferred to the Pacific Electric Railway Company the franchise upon East Ninth street, and the latter company has ever since been the owner and holder of this franchise. In January, 1904, the Los Angeles Railway Company ceased to operate any cars upon Ninth street, and "since said date has not had, and does not now have, any right, power, or authority to operate any car or cars over that portion of East Ninth street referred to in said petition, or any part thereof, and since said 1st day of January, 1904, has not had, and does not now have, any power or authority to issue transfers to passengers, entitling them to ride upon the Pacific Electric Railway Company's cars on said East Ninth street, except under and by virtue of the terms of the franchise, and in particular by virtue of the terms of section 6 thereof." "The operation of the cars and car lines of the said Los Angeles Railway Company is not nominal only, and the said cars and car lines alleged in the said amended petition to be operated by the said Los Angeles Railway Company are not operated and controlled by the said Pacific Electric Railway Company, but are actually operated and controlled by the said Los Angeles Railway Company." The quotations are from the findings. The Pacific Electric Railway Company has never issued transfers to passengers entitling them to ride upon the cars of the Los Angeles Railway Company, nor has the Los Angeles Railway Company ever issued transfers from its cars entitling passengers to ride upon the cars of the Pacific Electric Railway Company running upon East Ninth street. The court concluded that by force of the provisions of section 6 of the ordinance, above quoted, it became the duty of the defendant companies to interchange transfers, and issued its mandate accordingly.

The plain and obvious meaning of section 6 is that the person or corporation owning and enjoying the franchise to operate cars upon East Ninth street shall be bound to the performance of certain obligations by reason of that ownership and enjoyment, and amongst these obligations is the one that he shall give and receive transfers to the Ninth Street Line, and from the Ninth Street Line from and to such other intersecting lines of street cars as he may operate. It is a well-settled rule that a grant, assignment, lease, or transfer of a franchise such as this carries with it and imposes upon the grantee or assignee all the duties and obligations which rested upon the original holder of the franchise. It is the simple proposition that he who enjoys the privileges shall suffer the burdens. But the construction which is sought by the respondent to be placed upon this franchise would impose upon every intermediate assignee or grantee these burdens, while all the privileges and benefits had been passed on to others. Respondent cites us to numerous cases laying down the well-settled rule to which we have adverted that a transfer of a franchise carries its liabilities and duties as well as its privileges, but the industry of his counsel and our own independent investigation has failed to bring to light one case where it is held that the liabilities and burdens remain when the full enjoyment of the franchise and its privileges have been legally passed on to another. Cases will be found where the owner of a franchise has not been allowed to discontinue the operation of a part of the railroad for which a franchise was granted. Per contra, cases will be found holding that the remedy in such a case is not to compel the operation of the abandoned portion of the railroad, but lies in an action for forfeiture of franchise. But no case, as we have said, has been pointed out, or has been discovered, where, under an assignable franchise such as this, all rights have been parted with and all obligations yet remain. In reason, and in justice, as well could respondent insist that it is the duty of the Los Angeles Railway Company to perform all of the other burdens imposed upon the owner of the Ninth-street franchise—the grading and repair of streets, the construction of culverts, and the like, as to insist that this particular burden shall remain.

There is no ambiguity in section 6 calling for construction. The language is clear and unmistakable that Kays, the grantee of the franchise, and whoever else may hold it by assignment, shall fulfill the obligations in consideration of the benefits. While the Los Angeles Railway Company was the assignee of Kays, it admittedly fulfilled all obligations. When it transferred the franchise by valid legal sale, as the court finds, to the Pacific Electric Railway Company, the Los Angeles Railway Company ceased to be the assignee of the franchise, and the Pacific Electric Railway Company then became the assignee.

It is found that the two corporations defendant are independent, and no right existed to compel an interchange of transfers between them.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

SHAW, J. I concur. In order to maintain the contention of the respondent it would be necessary to hold that when the franchise granted to Kays was assigned to the Los Angeles Railway Company the effect was that thereupon there became affixed to the franchises of all the connecting lines then operated and owned by the Los Angeles Railway Company a new condition or covenant running with the property, and binding upon all subsequent assignees of such connecting lines, whereby the persons operating them would be obliged to give and receive transfers to and from the Kays line. The new condition would be a qualification or limitation upon the estate of the Los Angeles Railway Company in its connecting lines, and of every subsequent holder thereof. It would be attached to the estate, and be thereafter inseparable from it. The language of the sixth clause quoted in the main opinion will not bear this construction. It does not require that the person operating the connecting lines shall have any estate therein, but merely that he be operating the same. It manifestly imports a mere personal covenant to be temporary to the extent that it shall be obligatory only while the respective lines are operated by the same person or corporation, and to cease as soon as the joint operation ceases.

It should be added that there is nothing in the case requiring a decision on the question whether or not the person operating the Ninth Street Line is still obliged to give and receive transfers to and from the Mateo Street and Santa Fé Avenue Line which is mentioned in the sixth clause, nor whether or not a like burden rests upon the holder of the last-named line, although it may be held by a person or corporation not operating the Ninth street part of the line.

CHASE v. TROUT. (L. A. 1,217.)

(Supreme Court of California, March 2, 1905. On Rehearing, March 31, 1905.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — STREET IMPROVEMENTS—BONDS — VALIDITY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION — LIEN — MORTGAGE—PRIORITIES.

1. That part of the procedure under the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153) concerning street improvements, by which city councils are given jurisdiction to order any of the improvements therein mentioned, and providing that the proceedings shall be begun by a resolution of intention to do the work, which must be posted and published; that a notice of the work and resolution is then to be posted and published by the street superintendent; that at any time after the first publication of the resolution, and before the assessment is issued, any property owner may appear before the council and remonstrate or object to the proceeding in any particular, and obtain a hearing and decision thereon; that at the expiration of 25 days after the resolution has been fully published, and 20 days after notice is given by the street superintendent, the council is deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order the work done—constitutes due process of law, within the constitutional requirement.

2. That part of the procedure under the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153) concerning street improvements, which, after the city council is declared to have acquired jurisdiction to order the work done, provides in detail for advertising and receiving bids for the work, letting the contract to the lowest bidder, and the execution of the contract in pursuance thereof; that the supervision thereof shall be by city overseers; and, after the work is completed to the satisfaction of the city authorities, requiring an assessment to be made on the property benefited, in accordance with minute directions of the statute, and that, when properly certified and recorded, the several amounts assessed shall become a lien on the several lots—is within the legislative discretion; and hence Street Bond Act (St. 1893, p. 36, c. 21) § 4, providing that the bonds, after their issuance, shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings thereto and of the validity of the lien, is effective, after the bonds have been issued, to cure an objection that the time for the completion of the work was extended after the time first fixed had expired.

3. It also cured an objection that the notice of the time of recovering bids for the contract was not posted or published for the precise number of hours or days required by the law.

4. It also cured an objection that the contract did not contain a provision that the materials used should comply with the specifications, especially as the contract did require the contractor to furnish the materials according to the contract.

5. It also cured an objection that the street superintendent recorded the assessment, but did not properly certify to such record.

6. It also cured an objection that the time for beginning the work under the contract was not precisely fixed by the contract.

7. It also cured an objection that the certificate of the engineer did not show that he measured the work.

8. A lien for street improvement assessments is paramount to a mortgage existing at the time the proceedings leading up to the construction of the improvements were in progress.

9. Street Bond Act (St. 1893, p. 36, c. 21) § 4, providing that the bonds, after their issuance, shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings thereto, and of the validity of the lien, is not unreasonable merely because it arbitrarily fixes a period of 30 days after which defects which before may have been fatal are placed beyond inquiry.

10. Under the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153) concerning street improvements, providing that the council shall pass a resolution of intention, describing the work, a resolution declaring it to be the intention of the council that the described street be graded, graveled, and guttered in accordance with the plans and profiles on file in the office of the city engineer, and specifications in the office of the city clerk; that a cement curb be constructed along each line of the roadway of the street in accordance with the specifications, and that a cement sidewalk, five feet in width, be constructed along each side of the street, in accordance with the specifications—contains a sufficient description of the work, where the plans and specifications referred to supply all the information required to make the character of the work and materials absolutely certain, in view of the maxim of Civ. Code, § 3538, that that is certain which can be made certain.

11. Under the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153) concerning street improvements, providing that the council shall pass a resolution of intention, describing the work, and requiring the resolution to be published, plans and specifications referred to in the resolution do not become part of the resolution, so that they must be published, to comply with the statute.

12. Street Bond Act (St. 1893, p. 33) § 2, provides that whenever the city council shall find, on estimates of the engineer, that the cost of any proposed work will be greater than 50 cents per front foot, it may determine that bonds shall be issued under the act. Section 3 (page 34) provides that, when the city council shall determine that bonds shall be issued, it shall so declare in the resolution of intention. Held, that a resolution, after the recital as to cost, declaring that it is "hereby determined that bonds shall be issued" as provided in the act, implies a finding that the cost exceeded 50 cents per front foot, and renders unnecessary an express finding of that fact.

13. An attack on the validity of bonds purporting to have been issued pursuant to the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153) concerning street improvements, on the ground that the city council, being in session the day before the contract for the improvement was let, adjourned its session to the next day at 10 o'clock, but that in fact the adjourned session was called to order and began its session at 9 o'clock, and that the contract was awarded on the same day, is untenable where it did not affirmatively appear that the contract was awarded before 10 o'clock.

14. Where the record of an assessment for street improvements for which bonds were issued under the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153) showed that the documents were copied in the proper book by the street superintendent, followed by the words, "Recorded 9:15 a. m. Apr. 11, A. D. 1896," and the signature of the official, the fact that the documents occupied several pages of the record raises no presumption that all of them were not recorded at the time stated.

15. The validity of bonds purporting to have been issued pursuant to the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153) concerning street improvements was attacked on the grounds that section 2 of the act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153, as amended by St. 1893, p. 172, c. 144) provides that, whenever the grade of a street "shall hereafter be changed, the petition of the owners of a majority of the feet fronting thereon asking for grading the same to the new grade, shall be a condition precedent to the ordering of such grading to be done"; that the grade had been changed before the proceedings involving the validity of the bonds were begun, and that the change of grade was made on a petition which was not signed by the owners of the major part of the frontage, as required by section 38 of the act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 116, c. 114), as amended by St. 1893, p. 89, c. 79; that the resolution of intention to do the work for which the bonds were issued was preceded by and founded on a petition asking that the street be graded to the new grade, which petition was not signed by the owners of a majority of the frontage, as required by section 2. Held that, as the resolution of intention is of itself conclusive evidence that at its passage the persons whose names appeared on the petition were owners of a majority of the frontage, the attack was untenable, and, furthermore, since amended section 38 requires the filing of a petition by a majority of the owners of the frontage as a condition precedent to the change, the same as section 2, in case of an order for the grading to be done, so that, if the absence of such petition would render the proceeding void under section 2, it would have the same effect under amended section 38, the attack was self-destructive.

16. Though under the direct provisions of the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153) concerning street improvements, when the street superintendent procures the certificate of the city engineer to aid him in making an assessment, the certificate must be recorded, as the statute does not require it to be made nor prescribe its contents, the certificate is immaterial.

17. A resolution of a city counsel of its intention to construct street improvements, and issue bonds in payment thereof, under the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153), specifying that the bonds shall be issued to represent the cost of the improvement, shall be serial, extending over a period of 10 years, an equal portion to be paid annually on the 2d day of January of each year after their date, and to bear interest at 7 per cent. per annum, payable on the 2d days of July and January, is in the positive requirements of the statute concerning the form and contents of the bonds, and describes them sufficiently, without setting out the proposed bonds in full.

18. The contractor's return on an assessment for street improvements purporting to have been made in pursuance of the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153) need not state with whom the street superintendent contracted, and hence any irregularities in that respect are immaterial to the validity of bonds issued in payment for the work, especially in view of Street Bond Act (St. 1893, p. 36, c. 21) § 4, providing that the bonds, after their issuance, shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings thereto, and of the validity of the lien.

On Rehearing.

19. A mortgagee of property affected by a street assessment has the right of appeal to the city council, secured by Vrooman Act (Laws 1885, p. 156, c. 153) § 11, as fully as the owner of the property.

Henshaw, McFarland, and Lorigan, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by Delia W. Chase against John H. Trout. From a judgment for plaintiff by default, and an order refusing to vacate the judgment, defendant appeals. Judgment reversed, and appeal from order dismissed.

Edwin R. Fox and Frank G. Finlayson, for appellant. C. W. Chase, for respondent. R. M. F. Soto, amicus curiæ.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment taken upon his default, and from an order refusing to vacate the default and judgment. The complaint sets forth a cause of action to quiet title. The defendant's claim is alleged to consist of certain bonds for an assessment for streetwork, issued in pursuance of the laws commonly known as the "Vrooman Act" (St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153, and amendments thereto) and the "Street Bond Act" (St. 1893, p. 33, c. 21). The proceedings leading up to the issuance of the bonds are set forth at length in the complaint, and it is claimed that there are numerous irregularities and defects therein, which make the bonds absolutely void.

1. Section 4 of the street bond act of 1893, p. 36, c. 21, declares that "said bonds, by their issuance, shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings thereto under said street work act, and this act, previous to the making of the certified list of all assessments unpaid to the amount of fifty dollars or over by the street superintendent to the city treasurer, and of the validity of said lien, up to the date of said list." Appellant contends that under this provision the plaintiff is precluded from making the objections, and that the defects and irregularities are thereby cured.

In Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 Pac. 920, we held that this clause of the bond act was constitutional, in so far as it does not estop inquiry concerning those parts of the proceedings which are essential. It is there said that it may be regarded as settled that the Legislature may make a tax deed or street bond "conclusive evidence of a compliance with all provisions of the statute which are merely directory of the mode in which the power of taxation may be exercised, but that it cannot make it conclusive evidence of those matters which are essential to the exercise of the power; that as to those steps which are jurisdictional in their nature, and without which the power of taxation cannot be called into exercise—such as the listing or assessment of the property, a levy of the tax, some notice of its delinquency, and that the property will be sold therefor—the Legislature cannot deprive the owner of the right to show want of compliance." See, also, German Sav. & L. Soc. v. Ramish, 138 Cal. 120, 69 Pac. 89, 70 Pac. 1067. There has been some confusion as to the significance of the word "jurisdictional" in this and other decisions on the subject. The respondent appears to claim that every act required by law to be done by any person, officer, or body in the course of the proceeding is "jurisdictional," in the sense here intended, so that its omission or defective performance ousts jurisdiction and renders all subsequent acts void, and that none of these irregularities are affected by the curative clause. It can be easily shown that this would make the curative clause without substantial effect. By section 11 of the Vrooman act (page 156) any person affected by the improvement or by the assessment is given the right to appeal to the council, and thereby obtain a hearing and determination as to any defect in the performance of the work, or irregularity in the assessment, whereby he may be injured or prejudiced. By a long line of decisions it has become the settled doctrine that, with respect to any material defect or irregularity which could be cured by the council, the remedy by appeal is the only remedy, so that if the party does not appeal he waives the objection, and if he does appeal the judgment of the council is conclusive. As to this entire class of defects and irregularities, therefore, the curative clause could not have been intended to have any effect, for, as above shown, they must all have been disposed of, either by a failure to appeal, or by the action of the council upon such appeal, before the issuance of the bonds—the event which brings into life the curative clause. As to all other irregularities up to the issuing of the warrant—those which are material and which cannot be remedied by the council—another series of decisions has established the principle that they are fatal and render the entire proceeding void. In treating of this class of irregularities, the requirements of the law found to have been disregarded have been frequently referred to as "jurisdictional" in character, and this without regard to whether they were or were not a part of the proceeding constituting, or necessary to constitute, a compliance with the mandates of the state or federal Constitution; the intention evidently being merely to express the idea that the statute made the requirement a material and essential part of the statutory plan of procedure.

Respondent now claims that this class of irregularities is not affected by the curative clause. These two classes comprise all the material irregularities that can possibly occur, except the few that might occur after the recording of the assessment, and before the making of the certified list of assessments unpaid; that is, irregularities or omissions in the demand and collection of the amount due upon the land assessed. Immaterial omissions or defects would not invalidate the proceedings, nor call for any curative provision. With the trifling exception above mentioned, there would be no class of irregularities upon which the conclusive evidence clause could have the slightest effect. It is not to be supposed that the provision was intended to be so futile. It is clear that the clause was intended to have a much wider scope, and to cover any irregularity in the entire proceeding. The true intent is put beyond doubt in Ramish v. Hartwell, and by the authorities cited in that case in support of the proposition above quoted, and by other authorities on the subject. In Ensign v. Barse, 107 N. Y. 338, 14 N. E. 400, 15 N. E. 401, the court says, speaking of a subsequent validating act: "If the thing wanting or omitted which constitutes the defect is something, the necessity for which the Legislature might have dispensed with by prior statutes, or if something has been done, or done in a particular way, which the Legislature might have made immaterial, the omission or irregular act may be cured by a subsequent statute." And on petition for rehearing the court, on this precise question of the meaning of the word "jurisdictional," said: "A defect may be in one sense jurisdictional relatively to the authority of the assessors acting under an existing law, and yet not so as it respects the power of the Legislature to pass a statute curing the defect." Page 346 of 107 N. Y., page 402 of 15 N. E. The proposition is thus stated by other authorities: "Where directions upon the subject might originally have been dispensed with or executed at another time, irregularities arising from neglect to follow them may be remedied by the Legislature." Williams v. Supervisors, 122 U. S. 163, 164, 7 Sup. Ct. 1244, 30 L. Ed. 1088. "It is competent for them [the Legislature] to sanction retroactively such proceedings in the assessment of the tax as they could have legitimately sanctioned in advance." Exchange Bank Cases (C. C.) 21 Fed. 100. "The Legislature may make the tax deed conclusive evidence of compliance with every requirement which the Legislature might originally, in the exercise of its discretion, have dispensed with." In re Douglas, 41 La. Ann. 765, 6 South. 675; Breaux v. Negrotto, 43 La. Ann. 434, 9 South. 502. "Inasmuch as it is entirely competent for the Legislature to prescribe such formulas as it pleases with regard to the levy and collection of taxes, it is fully within its power, by retroactive legislation, to dispense with their necessity and obviate the evils of their nonobservance." Vaughan v. Swayzie, 56 Miss. 709. "The healing act must in all cases be confined to validating acts which the Legislature might previously have authorized or omitted." Jones v. Landis Tp., 50 N. J. Law, 376, 13 Atl. 251. The power to pass such curative statutes is the same with respect to local assessments as to general taxes, and is "without any limit except such as is imposed by constitutional restrictions or limitations." In re Com'rs of Elizabeth, 49 N. J. Law, 497, 10 Atl. 363; Blount v. Janesville, 31 Wis. 658. A curative statute or clause may preclude all investigation except "the single inquiry whether, in the case presented, the effect of applying the statute is to deprive the party of his property without due process of law." Judson on Taxation, § 337. The following authorities are substantially to the same effect: Rollins v. Wright, 93 Cal. 395, 29 Pac. 58; Haaren v. High, 97 Cal. 445, 32 Pac. 518; Larson v. Dickey, 39 Neb. 463, 58 N. W. 167, 42 Am. St. Rep. 595; Marx v. Hanthorn (C. C.) 30 Fed. 579; In re Lake, 40 La. Ann. 142, 3 South. 479; Raley v. Guinn, 76 Mo. 263; Joslyn v. Pulver, 59 Hun, 129, 13 N. Y. Supp. 311; Id., 128 N. Y. 334, 28 N. E. 604; People v. Turner, 145 N. Y. 451, 40 N. E. 400; Castillo v. McConnico, 168 U. S. 674, 18 Sup. Ct. 229, 42 L. Ed. 622; Tifft v. Buffalo, 82 N. Y. 210; Hatzung v. Syracuse, 92 Hun, 204, 36 N. Y. Supp. 521; 2 Cooley, Tax. (3d Ed.) p. 1014; Burroughs on Tax. p. 336; 2 Desty, Tax. 618, 619.

The two cases last mentioned, and many others which might be cited, are cases of local assessments. The correct proposition is that, as the Legislature has power to devise any scheme for the assessment and levy of taxes for local improvements, provided such scheme includes such notice and opportunity for hearing to the owner of property taxed as will be sufficient to constitute the due process of law required by the Constitution, and otherwise complies with constitutional limitations and restrictions, so the Legislature, by a curative clause in the law establishing the scheme, may provide that the issuance of a bond or the execution of a deed in the enforcement of such levy or assessment shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of the performance of all the required steps in the proceeding, excepting those that are necessary to constitute the due process of law, or to comply with any other constitutional prerequisite. As to all these other statutory steps or acts, the same power which prescribes them is competent to declare that their nonobservance shall not be fatal to the validity of the tax, and that no inquiry may be made concerning them. This is substantially the effect of the statute in question here. The conclusive evidence clause of section 4 of the bond act (St. 1893, p. 36, c. 21) is a part of the law under which the proceeding was carried on, and its effect is the same as if it declared that, although all of these intermediate steps are directed, yet, if they are not performed as required, and the owner permits the matter to proceed until the bond is issued, he shall be thenceforth precluded from proof of such nonobservance, and the requirements shall be conclusively presumed to have been complied with, excepting those which are necessary to comply with constitutional mandates.

It is intimated, rather than claimed, by the respondent, that the phrase "regularity of all proceedings," included in the clause of section 4 in question, does not include such defects as the failure to perform a required act, but only refers to the defective or imperfect performance of such acts as appear to have been at least attempted. Some support for this contention is found in the opinion in Ramish v. Hartwell, supra, where it is said: "This clause does not necessarily imply that any proceedings were in fact taken, but is limited to the 'regularity' of such as were taken." This, however, was said with reference to those parts of the prescribed proceeding as should be deemed essential to a compliance with the constitutional restrictions upon the power of the Legislature. Any other signification would make the opinion contrary to all authority. An "irregularity" is a "violation or nonobservance of established rules and practices." Black's Law Dic. 644. It "consists either in omitting to do something that is necessary for the due and orderly conduct of a suit, or in doing it at an unseasonable time or in an improper manner." Ex parte Gibson, 31

Cal. 625, 91 Am. Dec. 546; 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 481; Jackson v. Kittle, 34 W. Va. 212, 12 S. E. 484. The decisions cited by respondent on the proposition that an act which is void in toto cannot be validated by statute are inapplicable, except to such acts as are void because in violation of the Constitution. All other parts of the proceedings are subject to the rule that the power which creates can also destroy.

What, then, are the essentials, the nonobservance of which cannot be cured? The property must be within the jurisdiction of the local board; there must be the actual performance of some work which is to be paid for (that is, a subject-matter of which the council can acquire jurisdiction); an assessment or apportionment of the amount to be raised must be made; and, as above stated, there must be sufficient notice and opportunity for the hearing and determination of grievances and objections to constitute due process of law. In some cases relating to ordinary annual taxes it is said there must be some notice of sale, and this is among the essentials mentioned in Ramish v. Hartwell. But these decisions do not apply to local assessments under our statute, where notice of sale is provided for by the requirement that a sale can be made only in execution of a judgment of foreclosure, in which the law for ordinary execution sales applies.

In this case the location of the street within the jurisdiction of the council, the actual performance of the work as ordered, and the making of a de facto assessment are all admitted. By the Vrooman act the city council is given jurisdiction to order made any of the improvements therein mentioned, by the proceeding therein prescribed. The proceedings are begun by a resolution of intention to do the work, passed by the council, which must be posted and published. A notice of the work and resolution is then to be posted and published by the street superintendent. At any time after the first publication of the resolution, and before the assessment is issued, any property owner may appear before the council and remonstrate or object to the proceeding in any particular, and obtain a hearing and decision thereon. At the expiration of 25 days after the resolution has been fully published, and 20 days after the notice is given by the street superintendent, the statute declares that the council is deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order the work done. This part of the proceeding constitutes "due process of law," and satisfies the constitutional requirement. Brown v. Drain (C. C.) 112 Fed. 585; Id., 187 U. S. 635, 23 Sup. Ct. 842, 47 L. Ed. 343; Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14 Pac. 71. These seem to comprise all the essentials required by either the state or federal Constitution.

The act then makes provision, with much detail, for advertising for and receiving bids for the work, letting the contract for the work to the lowest bidder, the execution of a contract in pursuance thereof for the performance of the work, and the supervision of its performance by city overseers. After the work is completed to the satisfaction of the city authorities, an assessment is to be made upon the property benefited in accordance with the minute directions of the statute, and when properly certified and recorded the several amounts assessed become a lien on the several lots. All persons are deemed to have notice of the assessment from the time it is recorded.

It is obvious that the manner of procedure after the council has acquired jurisdiction to order the work done—the entire subject of letting the work, executing the contract, completing the work, and the minor details as to the mode and manner of making the assessment—are matters within the legislative discretion. If a plan entirely different in detail from that contained in the statute, but arriving at the same result, had been adopted by the Legislature for the accomplishment of these objects, and had been enacted as law, instead of the one embodied in the statute, such law, from a constitutional point of view, would have been a valid enactment. There is nothing in the Constitution which made the plan adopted a necessary one in these particulars. The Legislature could at any time amend the law by omitting all the details, after jurisdiction is acquired, and giving the council general power to get the work done by such means and in such manner as it deems best, and the law would still be constitutional. It must be equally competent to provide, in the law itself, that a disregard of its provisions as to any of these intermediate proceedings shall not be fatal to the validity of the assessment, or that, after a given stage in the matter has been reached, all inquiry as to such proceedings shall be cut off, and they shall be conclusively presumed to have been performed in the manner required by the law.

2. Many of the plaintiff's objections to the proceedings are within the scope of this proposition. Among these objections are the following: That the time for the completion of the work was extended after the time first fixed had expired; that the notice of the time of receiving bids for the contract was not posted or published for the precise number of hours or days which plaintiff claims the law directs; that the contract did not contain a provision that the materials "used" should comply with the specifications; that the street superintendent recorded the assessment, but did not properly certify to such record; that the time for beginning work under the contract was not precisely fixed by the contract; and that the certificate of the engineer does not show that he measured the work. Without determining whether or not these objections would be fatal or material if offered in a proceeding in which they could be made, it is sufficient to say that, under the curative clause of the bond act, after the bonds are issued the objections are conclusively presumed to have no foundation in fact. The Legislature undoubtedly could have enacted a valid law, which would have authorized the extension of the contract after the time first fixed had expired, or the receiving of bids after a more limited notice, or providing that a contract need not expressly provide that the materials used shall comply with the specifications, or that the record of the assessment need not be certified, or that the time to begin work need not be fixed in the contract, or that no certificate need be made by the engineer. Having such power, it likewise has power to declare that after the issuance of the bonds it shall be conclusively presumed that such directions, if any such exist, have been followed.

The same may be said of the objection that the specifications delegated to the street superintendent powers which the law vests in the council. Such powers might lawfully have been given to the street superintendent in the first instance, and hence they are subject to the curative effect of the clause in question. There might, of course, be an attempt to give him such power as to enable him to make a complete departure from the statutory plan of procedure, and substitute for the work ordered by the council a different character of work. This would be equivalent to an attempt to compel the making of the improvement without notice of the character of the work to be done—that is, without due process of law—and it would necessarily be void notwithstanding a curative clause. So, also, the alternative plan giving him power to change the amount of the contract price and of the assessment, as was attempted and condemned in Bolton v. Gilleran, 105 Cal. 247, 38 Pac. 881, 45 Am. St. Rep. 33, may be beyond the reach of a curative provision, because it would give power to that officer to improve the street and levy an assessment without a substantial compliance with constitutional conditions. But we have here no attempt to make any such radical departure. The contract price was fixed by the council, and could not be changed. The only discretion given to the superintendent of streets was with respect to the manner of performance of certain subordinate parts of the contract—details in the application of the general plan of the work to the actual physical conditions disclosed by the doing of the work, which could not be absolutely determined beforehand. The details here left to that officer consists of such things as the substitution of good earth for spongy material found in place beneath the proposed deposit of gravel, the quality of earth to be used for fills, and the allowance for settling, and the corresponding change in the form of what is called the "cross-section"; the culverts to be put in where drainage is necessary; the slope of the banks of fills; and the exact shade of the "dark slate color" to be given to the surface of the sidewalk. However desirable it would be to have the precise details of the work, even to the smallest fraction, fixed in advance of the bids, so that the exact cost to the contractor, as well as the contract price, may be known at the time the contract is let, it always has been and always will be impossible to do so. As was said in Haughawout v. Hubbard, 131 Cal. 678, 63 Pac. 1079: "To some extent, such details must depend on unanticipated contingencies, and can be determined only by the exigencies of the actual construction. The specifications must therefore always fail, more or less, in certainty or completeness of detail; and hence the most accurate and detailed specifications must leave unprovided for many questions arising in the course of the work, as to the kind and amount of the work or materials, and other details of construction." The giving of discretion to some person as to all these details, the culverts possibly excepted, is inevitable in every such work. If not vested in and exercised by the street superintendent, it will be exercised by the contractor himself. The statute recognizes this condition, and itself provides that the work must be done to the satisfaction of the street superintendent. The culverts may not be subject to this necessity, and, in the absence of a curative clause, might be sufficient to invalidate the assessment. Grant v. Barber, 135 Cal. 188, 67 Pac. 127. But unquestionably the Legislature might have provided in the statute that the number and location of the culverts to be placed under any graded streets should be controlled by the street superintendent, and that the contractor for any such work should construct them where directed by such officer. Hence the curative provision validates the assessment in this respect. Much more is this true of the other details. All of them relate to the manner of the work, and the method of procedure to get it done, and not to the subjects of the notice to the owners, the hearing of grievances, the fact that work was done, nor to the existence of a uniform assessment. With respect to the objection as to the failure of the contract to declare that the materials "used" shall comply with specifications, it may be observed that the contract does require the contractor to "furnish" the materials required thereby and according thereto. Counsel's argument is that materials can be furnished without being used. The answer is that no materials can be used without being furnished, and, if the materials furnished are sufficient, the materials used must be sufficient also.

Some other questions require more particular notice:

3. The fact that the plaintiff at the time the proceedings were in progress was a mortgagee only, and became an owner subsequently upon a foreclosure of her mortgage, even if it is conceded that such fact is averred, is entirely immaterial. As mortgagee she was as much bound by the proceedings as if she had been the owner, and her lien as mortgagee, although it may have been prior in point of time to that of the assessment, was not, because of that priority, paramount thereto. The assessment lien covered the entire estate, and was paramount to all existing liens of a private nature. German S. & L. Soc. v. Ramish, 138 Cal. 125, 69 Pac. 89, 70 Pac. 1067; California, etc., Co. v. Weis, 118 Cal. 492, 50 Pac. 697.

4. The fact that the conclusive evidence clause of the bond act arbitrarily fixes a period of 30 days, after which defects which before may have been fatal are placed beyond inquiry, does not make the law unreasonable. There is no strict analogy between such a law and a new statute of limitations shortening the time previously allowed for the bringing of an action. In such cases it has been held that the new law is void if it prescribes a period so short that it does not give the party a reasonable time after it takes effect within which to begin his action. Here the notice of the proceedings is sufficient to constitute due process of law. The period of 30 days after the date of the warrant, within which the statute permits an owner to prevent the issuance of any bond by filing an affidavit and requesting that no bond be issued, gives a reasonable time to the owner within which to make his election whether he will take advantage of the extension of time afforded by the issuance of a bond, or, by requesting that no bond be issued, preserve such rights as he may think he has to defeat the assessment for irregularity in the proceedings. The notices having been given, he is conclusively presumed to have knowledge of his right to so elect. It should not be forgotten that, at the time the assessment becomes due, other persons have valuable property rights at stake, as well as the owner.

5. It was not necessary that the resolution of intention should have given a more complete description of the work. The act provides that the council shall pass a resolution of intention, "describing the work." The resolution in question declares it to be the intention of the council that the described street "be graded, gravelled and guttered in accordance with the plans and profiles on file in the office of the city engineer and specifications on file in the office of the city clerk of the city of Los Angeles; * * * that a cement curb be constructed along each line of the roadway of said" street in accordance with said specifications; and "that a cement sidewalk five feet in width be constructed along each side of said" street in accordance with the said specifications.

It is claimed that the resolution does not sufficiently describe the work, and also that the plans and specifications on file are made a part of the resolution by the reference to them, and that the proceedings are void because these plans and specifications were not incorporated into the resolution and published. The appellant, in answer to this claim, contends that the curative clause of the bond act covers these defects, if such they are. The resolution of intention is the first step in the proceeding. It is to be published, and it is by means of such publication, and the notice thereafter given, which refers to it for particulars, that the council acquires jurisdiction. It is a part of the "due process of law" required by the Constitution, the want of which cannot be cured or waived by the Legislature. There must be a substantial compliance with the provisions of the act in regard to this preliminary process.

In several decisions of this court involving resolutions which did not refer to any sufficient plans or specifications, it has been held that the phrase "describing the work," in the act, means that the resolution must not only describe the work proposed to be done, but must also state, in general terms, at least, the materials of which such work is to be composed. Thus it is said that a resolution declaring the intention that a certain street be "curbed" or "guttered," or that "suitable drains and inlets" be made, or that a "flushing apparatus" be provided, does not sufficiently describe the work, and that an assessment founded upon such a resolution is void. Schweisau v. Mahon, 128 Cal. 114, 60 Pac. 683; Fay v. Reed, 128 Cal. 358, 60 Pac. 927; Bay Rock Co. v. Bell, 133 Cal. 152, 65 Pac. 299; Williamson v. Joyce, 137 Cal. 107, 69 Pac. 854. In Bay Rock Co. v. Bell and Fay v. Reed there was a reference to plans and specifications, but it was found that the reference was incomplete, or that such plans or specifications were themselves defective and insufficient to remove the uncertainty as to the materials. The question whether or not an ordinance can be aided by a reference to documents on file was mentioned, but in each case it was expressly left undecided. There is no decision in this state on the exact point. It has been held that such an ordinance can be aided, as to the description of the street to be improved, by a reference to records, or to facts manifest to the eye on the street itself. Williams v. Bergin, 116 Cal. 57, 47 Pac. 877; Cohen v. Alameda, 124 Cal. 507, 57 Pac. 377. It was not claimed that the things thus referred to must also be published. There are other cases of similar import. The authorities of other states, with practical unanimity, establish the rule that a reference to plans and specifications on file will serve to make sufficient the description of the work in a resolution of this character, where, by the terms of the description in the resolution itself, it would be void. The following authorities are substantially to this effect: Stone v. Cambridge, 6 Cush. 270; Boehme v. Monroe, 106 Mich. 404, 64 N. W. 204; Jenney v. Des Moines, 103 Iowa, 350, 72 N. W. 550; Carlinville v. McClure, 156 Ill. 496, 41

N. E. 169; C. & N. P. R. Co. v. Chicago, 172 Ill. 69, 49 N. E. 1006; Lehmers v. Chicago, 178 Ill. 530, 53 N. E. 394; Claflin v. Chicago, 178 Ill. 549, 53 N. E. 339; Shannon v. Hinsdale, 180 Ill. 202, 54 N. E. 181; Brewster v. Peru, 180 Ill. 124, 54 N. E. 233; 2 Beach, Pub. Cor. § 1182; McQuillin, Mun. Ord. § 545.

This does not make the plans and specifications referred to an integral part of the resolution, so that they must also be published, in order to comply with the statute requiring the publication of the resolution. The rule is but an application of the maxim, "That is certain which can be made certain." Civ. Code, § 3538. It applies not only to ordinances, but to all documents alike. It is the same rule which allows references to a map, plat, or to other documents in a description of land. Where such descriptions are required to be published, as in a notice of sale of land, for instance, it is never necessary to incorporate in the publication the map or plat referred to, in order to make a legal publication. The purpose to be served by the publication of the resolution is, in the first place, to inform interested persons of the general character of the improvement proposed; and, in the second place, to make a specific declaration of the particular kind of improvement, as a basis of future action. The plans and specifications being on file in a public office, both purposes will be as well accomplished by a mere reference to them as by setting them forth in full as a part of the resolution. The plans and specifications referred to supply all the information required to make the character of the work and materials absolutely certain. We hold that a resolution of intention sufficiently describes the work if it states the kind of work to be done, as stated in the statute, and refers to plans and specifications on file in the office of the city clerk or engineer, which give the details as to the materials to be used, and that the matters referred to need not be published.

6. The bond act provides (section 2) that "whenever the city council * * * shall find, upon estimates of the engineer, that the cost of any proposed work * * * will be greater than fifty cents per front foot," it may determine that bonds shall be issued under the act, and (section 3) that, when said city council shall determine that bonds shall be issued, "it shall so declare in the resolution of intention to do said work" (St. 1893, pp. 33, 34, c. 21). These provisions do not make it necessary that the council should by a formal statement declare such finding. The council must, of course, ascertain and find that the cost will exceed the amount named; but this does not mean that there must be an express written declaration of such finding, simliar to that required in an action in the superior court, or at all. The resolution, after the recital as to the cost, declares that "it is hereby determined that bonds shall be issued" as provided in the act. The passage of the resolution containing this declaration sufficiently indicated that the council had found the necessary fact. Where a legislative body is given power to act whenever it shall find a given fact to exist, it is not necessary, as a condition to the exercise of the power, that such body should previously or contemporaneously make a declaration that the fact exists. The fact that it takes the action raises the presumption that it had, upon inquiry, ascertained the existence of the fact, unless the statute giving the power explicitly requires an express finding or declaration of the conditions precedent. The bond act does not require any declaration whatever as to the cost. All that is required to be stated in the resolution is the determination of the council that bonds shall be issued. This the resolution does, and this implies a finding that the cost exceeded the amount required. McQuillin, Mun. Ord. § 140; German Sav. & L. Soc. v. Ramish, 138 Cal. 130, 69 Pac. 89, 70 Pac. 1067; Spaulding v. Homestead, etc., Ass'n, 87 Cal. 45, 24 Pac. 600, 25 Pac. 249; Farmers', etc., Bank v. Board, 97 Cal. 328, 32 Pac. 312; People v. Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 342, 65 Pac. 749.

7. It is claimed that the contract was awarded at a time when the council was not lawfully in session. There is nothing in the point, even if we concede that the curative clause does not place it beyond inquiry. It is alleged that the council, being in session the day before, had adjourned that session to the next day at 10 o'clock, but that in fact said adjourned session was called to order and began to transact business at 9 o'clock, and that the contract was awarded on that day. It is not alleged that the contract was awarded before 10 o'clock, and it will certainly not be presumed that such was the fact. Further comment is unnecessary.

8. With regard to the supposed defect in the certificate attached to the record of the assessment and in the record itself, it may be further said that the facts alleged show no such irregularity. It appears that the warrant, assessment, diagram, and engineer's certificate were copied in the proper book by the street superintendent, and that the certificate was in the following words, written underneath them: "Recorded 9:15 a. m. Apr. 11, A. D. 1896. P. A. Howard, Street Superintendent City of Los Angeles." The criticism seems to be that the documents may have occupied several pages of the record, and the certificate is insufficient, because it does not expressly state that all of the documents were recorded at that time. This, however, is implied from the words used, and the place where they appear immediately following the documents, coupled with the further consideration that the law required all these documents to be recorded by that officer in that book. This would be a sufficient showing to admit the record in evidence, and it by no means justifies or authorizes the conclusion that the documents, or any of them, were not recorded at the time stated.

9. Section 2 of the Vrooman act provides "that whenever the grade of a street * * * shall hereafter be changed, the petition of the owners of a majority of the feet fronting thereon, asking for grading the same to the new grade, shall be a condition precedent to the ordering of such grading to be done." St. 1885, p. 147, c. 153, as amended by St. 1893, p. 172, c. 144. It is alleged that the grade had been changed before the proceedings here involved were begun, and that the change of grade was made upon a petition which was not signed by the owners of the major part of the frontage, as required by section 38 of the act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 116, c. 114) as amended in 1893 (St. 1893, p. 89, c. 79). It is further alleged, in effect, that the resolution of intention to do the work for which these bonds were issued was preceded by, and founded upon, a petition asking that the street be graded to the new grade, which petition was not signed by the owners of a majority of the frontage, as required by section 2, above quoted. Hence it is claimed the proceeding was unauthorized and the bonds void. In German Sav. & L. Soc. v. Ramish, 138 Cal. 130, 69 Pac. 89, 70 Pac. 1067, it is said that in such a case the passage by the council of the resolution of intention to do the work "is itself conclusive evidence that at its passage the persons whose names appeared upon the petition were owners of a majority of the frontage," and this seems to answer the contention. A further and sufficient answer to the point is that, as pleaded, it is completely self-destructive. The act of 1893 aforesaid, relating to a change of the theoretical grade, just as positively requires the filing of a petition therefor by the owners of a majority of the frontage, as a condition precedent to the change, as does section 2 of the Vrooman act, above quoted, in case of an order for the grading to be done. If the absence of such petition would render the proceeding void in the latter case, it would have the same effect upon the former. Hence, taking the whole allegation as true, as we must, it follows that the order purporting to change the theoretical grade was itself void, or, in other words, that there has been, in contemplation of law, no change of the grade, such as is contemplated by the quoted clause of section 2 aforesaid. There having been no change of grade, there was no necessity for any petition of property owners, as a condition precedent to the power of the council to order the grading done to the legal grade. The bonds are unaffected by the filing of an insufficient petition purporting to be made in pursuance of a provision not applicable to the case. The resolution to do the work of grading does not specify any particular level, altitude, or grade to which the surface of the street must be reduced or raised, and it must therefore be taken to refer to whatever grade was then lawfully established.

10. In regard to the contents of the certificate of the city engineer recorded with the assessment, it should be said that the act nowhere specifies what such certificate shall contain, nor requires that any such certificate shall be made. If the street superintendent finds himself able to make the assessment without the aid of any certificate from the engineer, there is nothing in the statute forbidding him from doing so. If he procures such certificate to aid him, the statute requires that the same, whatever it contains, must be recorded. Only that, and nothing more. Reid v. Clay, 134 Cal. 215, 66 Pac. 262; O'Dea v. Mitchell (Cal.) 77 Pac. 1020.

11. The description of the bonds in the resolution of intention was sufficient. It specifies that the bonds shall be issued to represent the cost of the improvement, and shall be serial, extending over a period of 10 years, an equal portion to be paid annually on the 2d day of January of each year after their date, and to bear interest at 7 per centum per annum, payable semiannually on the 2d days of July and January. This, in connection with the positive requirements of the statute concerning the form and contents of the bonds, describes them sufficiently. It is not intended that the resolution should copy the proposed bonds in full.

12. We can see no reasonable objections to the form or sufficiency of the contractor's return upon the assessment. It was not necessary that it should state with whom the street superintendent contracted. The warrant was in favor of Stansbury and Moore. The return was made by Moore, and states that he is the contractor named in the assessment, diagram, and warrant. Moore was certainly named in the warrant, and, as the diagram and assessment are not in the record, we must presume that they also name him, so that the statement is not untrue, even if Stansbury was also named, and the statement was material. It is clearly shown therein that the demand was made by virtue of the warrant, though it is not expressed in the same language as that which counsel for respondent uses in his brief to express the same idea. Besides, these irregularities, if material, are cured by the conclusive evidence clause.

The conclusion is that the complaint sets forth no irregularity in the proceedings which is not cured by the bond act, and hence that the bonds of the defendant are valid, and the complaint does not state a cause of action. The judgment must be, therefore, reversed.

The writer of this opinion was the judge of the court below who presided when the judgment was rendered. He desires to say that the judgment was given on default, ex parte, and without any consideration of the effect of the curative provision here discussed.

13. The appeal from the order refusing to vacate the default may as well be dismissed. The reversal vacates the judgment, and no further proceedings can be had in the court below, except upon an amended complaint, which must be served on the defendant. This will necessarily open the default. The appeal therefore presents a question wholly immaterial to the rights of the parties, except as to costs; and, as the two appeals are presented on the same transcript and briefs, the appellant will recover all costs.

The appeal from the order is dismissed, and the judgment is reversed, with costs.

HENSHAW, J. I dissent, and adhere to the subjoined opinion, heretofore rendered in department. I think the correct rule for the interpretation of the statute in question was laid down in Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 Pac. 920, which case, and others which have followed its construction of the law, are reversed by the prevailing opinion. Moreover, they are reversed upon a line of authority dealing with the general taxing power, which is not only a high prerogative power of a government itself, but one whose daily exercise is necessary to the very existence of the government. It is natural, therefore, in dealing with questions of the collection of taxes—the very life blood of a nation's existence—to find courts construing somewhat liberally curative acts, and looking in their interpretation to discover but one thing, namely, whether the subject who is taxed has had his day in court. But I do not believe it was the intention of our Legislature, nor yet necessary to a construction of this law, to clothe street contractors with this high governmental prerogative, and, by putting a bond for streetwork in their hands, to declare, as is declared in the opinion, that the property owner is forever, and in every forum, shut out from the right of contesting its legality.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

The following is the opinion in department, above referred to:

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to quiet plaintiff's title against a lien upon her lands claimed by defendant by virtue of his ownership of certain street bonds. The plaintiff sought to have the bonds, the assessment, the warrant, the diagram, and the proceedings for the streetwork, and the contract for it, so far as they affected her lands, declared to be null and void, and sought further to have the bond delivered to the clerk of the court, and by him canceled. The complaint is therefore, in its nature, a bill of peace against the outstanding street bonds. Defendant made default, and the judgment granted plaintiff the relief sought. Defendant appeals from that judgment, and from the order of the court refusing to vacate his default.

The questions here presented have to do with the provisions of the general street laws of the state, the Vrooman act, and the street bond act (St. 1893, p. 33, c. 21). The latter portion of section 4 (page 36) of said last-named act, after setting forth the conditions whereunder and the terms whereby such bonds may be issued, provides as follows: "Said bonds, by their issuance, shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings thereto under said street work act and this act, previous to the making of the certified list of all assessments unpaid to the amount of $50 or over by the street superintendent, to the city treasurer, and of the validity of said lien, up to the date of said list." In Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 Pac. 920, this conclusive evidence clause, as it may, for convenience, be called, was considered by this court. It was there determined that the provision making the bond conclusive evidence of the validity of the lien was unconstitutional and void, as depriving a person of his property without due process of law, and the true rule regarding the extent and scope of the operation of the conclusive evidence clause is distinctly and succinctly laid down. It is there said: "We have seen that the Legislature had the authority to declare that the issuance of the bond should be conclusive evidence of certain facts, provided such facts were not essential to the jurisdiction of the officers to create the assessment; and, to the extent that the Legislature could exercise this power, it should be upheld. In the first portion of the sentence above quoted, the Legislature has not assumed to make the bond conclusive evidence of the existence of any jurisdictional fact, or that any step essential to the creation of an assessment has been taken, but has merely declared that it shall be conclusive evidence of the 'regularity' of all proceedings prior thereto. This clause does not necessarily imply that any proceedings were in fact taken, but is limited to the 'regularity' of such as were taken, and leaves the owner at liberty to show in defense of his property that no jurisdiction to authorize the work or make the assessment was in fact acquired." Under the rule here laid down, which may not be gainsaid, we may turn without further discussion or citation of authorities to the attacks made by the complaint against the validity of the bonds—attacks which, for the purposes of this appeal, are to be taken as true upon all matters of fact properly averred. These attacks are some 15 or more in number, but it will not be necessary to consider them all, since the grounds of some of them, at least, are well taken, and they are sufficient to invalidate the bonds in question.

1. It appears that the contract was dated upon September 28, 1895, and the work was to be completed "one hundred and twenty days thereafter." This means the designated number of days after the date of the contract. Palmer v. Burnham, 120 Cal. 366, 52 Pac. 664. The time for the completion of the work, as originally fixed, expired on the 26th day of January, 1896. The only extension of time was that granted by the council on February 3, 1896, and was made by the street superintendent on February 6, 1896, when a 40-days extension was attempted to be given. Under a numerous and unbroken line of authorities, the council did not have the power to authorize the extension after the time for the completion of the contract had expired, and the assessment which followed would be void. Turney v. Dougherty, 53 Cal. 619; Beverdige v. Livingstone, 54 Cal. 54; Mappa v. Los Angeles, 61 Cal. 309; Fanning v. Schammel, 68 Cal. 429, 9 Pac. 427; Dougherty v. Coffin, 69 Cal. 455, 10 Pac. 672; Brock v. Luning, 89 Cal. 319, 26 Pac. 972; Palmer v. Burnham, 120 Cal. 364, 52 Pac. 664.

This radical defect, however, appellant insists, is cured by the conclusive evidence clause of the bond act, and herein the reasoning is that the conclusive evidence clause of the act is in its nature curative, and validates anything and everything done or not done, jurisdictional or otherwise, the doing of which the Legislature might in the first instance have dispensed with. This, within certain limitations, is true; but the limitations are set forth in Ramish v. Hartwell, supra, and are all important. If, for example, the Legislature has prescribed certain steps as being necessary to the acquirement or exercise of jurisdiction, the omission to take these steps will not be rectified by the conclusive evidence clause, nor will it be an answer to say that the Legislature might have dispensed with them or substituted others for them. It must be remembered that the conclusive evidence clause was not designed to confer, and could not, if it were designed, confer, any added or new jurisdiction; nor can it be construed to permit the acquirement of jurisdiction by pursuing a mode other than the one which the Legislature has advisedly prescribed. As well might it be said that because the Legislature could have provided for personal service of the notice of streetwork, instead of service by publication and posting, notice by publication and posting was utterly dispensed with, under the provisions of the conclusive evidence clause. It could not be dispensed with even if it were shown that actual notice was in fact given to every property owner, because the mode prescribed is a process of law, and the only process ordained by law for charging the property owner with notice. So in this instance it has been held by all of the decisions that after the expiration of the time fixed for the completion of the contract the council has not "power" to extend the time for the completion of the work. Lacking power, they lack jurisdiction, and an attempt to extend the time under such circumstances is an act in excess of jurisdiction, rendering subsequent proceedings void. Nor does it matter that the Legislature might have authorized the council to extend the time after such default upon the part of the contractor. The fact remains that it has not done so, and, as has been said, the conclusive evidence clause was not designed to confer any new or added jurisdiction upon the council, but merely to correct irregularities in proceedings done within their jurisdiction.

2. The specifications under which the street improvement was made, delegated powers which the law requires to be exercised by the council. Without setting forth these specifications, it is sufficient to say that they are identically the same as those discussed and condemned in Chase v. Scheerer, 136 Cal. 248, 68 Pac. 768, and substantially identical with those likewise condemned in Stansbury v. White, 121 Cal. 435, 53 Pac. 940, and Chase v. Treasurer of Los Angeles, 122 Cal. 541, 55 Pac. 414. The acquirement by the council of jurisdiction to order the work done means no more than that it acquires jurisdiction to legally order the work done. The conclusive evidence clause cannot operate to cure a defect of this nature—a defect going to the very exercise of the jurisdiction which the council had acquired. It was not within their jurisdiction to delegate these powers to the street superintendent, and, for the reasons above given under subdivision 1, the conclusive evidence clause cannot be construed to rectify proceedings taken by the council in excess of its jurisdiction and in violation of its powers.

3. The motion to vacate the default was based upon an alleged mistake in law upon the part of the defendant, who believed that the defects pleaded in the complaint were unanswerable, and fatal to the validity of his bond. As the sole ground for vacating the default was that this belief was mistaken, and as appears from the foregoing it was not a mistaken belief, the trial court properly refused to make the order.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

SHAW, J. The petition for a rehearing is denied. In response to an objection urged somewhat at length in the petition for a rehearing, we think it proper to say that a mortgagee of property affected by a street assessment has the right of appeal to the city council, secured by section 11 of the Vrooman act (Laws 1885, p. 156, c. 153), as fully as the owner of the property. The rule of strict construction in regard to proceedings to assess property for local public improvements does not apply to those provisions of the law which are made for the benefit of the property owners to enable them to present objections to irregularities in the proceedings. With respect to such provisions the statute will be liberally construed in favor of the person interested. City Street Imp. Co. v. Babcock, 139 Cal. 692, 73 Pac. 666. The provision that "all other persons directly interested in any work provided for in this act or in the assessment" may appeal to the council is intended to allow any person to appeal who has a direct interest, either as a lienholder or as owner in any property affected by the assessment, and to distinguish persons having such direct interest from those who have an interest only as members of the body usually designated as the public.

WOOD v. MOULTON et al. (L. A. 1,324.)*

WATERS AND WATER COURSES—SURFACE WATERS—WRONGFUL DISCHARGE—INSTRUCTIONS —VIEW—MISCONDUCT OF JURY—MISCONDUCT OF WITNESSES—APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR— NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. The rule of the civil law is adopted in California as the rule governing the rights and obligations of parties with respect to surface water, and under that rule the owner of higher lands has no right to divert surface or storm waters from his lands onto the lands of another, over which they would not naturally have flowed, nor has he the right, by accumulating surface waters upon his own lands in ditches or other like artificial channels, to precipitate them upon his neighbor's lands in larger quantities or in different form from that which they would have taken in the course of nature.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 48, Cent. Dig. Waters and Water Courses, §§ 126–131.]

2. In an action for the wrongful discharge of surface water over plaintiff's lands, the court charged that defendants had the right to confine surface water flowing over their land into one channel, and to carry the same in substantially the same channel in which the water flowed naturally across their land, without substantially increasing the volume of water therein. In a subsequent instruction the jury were told that defendants had the right to confine two or three channels into one, and so carry the waters over their land, although such change might throw increased waters into the natural and customary channel. Held that, while the two instructions were obviously conflicting, defendants could not complain thereof, as the former fairly stated the law, and the latter was more favorable to them than they were entitled to.

3. Testimony was given for defendants that holes had been dug along a street, and that the soil disclosed no indication of sand. A view was granted, and the jury found a laborer filling the last of the holes, but on a suggestion from one of the jurymen he dug another hole, in which the jury noticed the character of the soil. There was no denial of the testimony of defendants' witnesses that there was no indication of sand in the soil. Held that, though the conduct of the jury was irregular, defendants were not prejudiced thereby.

4. Conduct of a witness for defendants, who accompanied the jury upon a view, in attempting to state what his testimony had been on the trial, was, if improper, not prejudicial, where the witness did not change his testimony in any way adverse to defendants, and it was not shown that he succeeded in his attempt.

5. An irregularity of a witness accompanying the jury on a view is not ground for complaint on appeal, where appellant failed to call the court's attention to the irregularity before the verdict was rendered.

6. Newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative, or designed to contradict witnesses, is not ground for a new trial.

7. In an action for damages caused by the wrongful discharge of surface water over plaintiff's land, where there was no claim in the answer that any part of the damage was caused by waters flowing on to plaintiff's land, from sources over which defendants had no control, and it was shown that the ditch was capable of carrying the natural storm waters off if it had not been obstructed by the sand and gravel washed into it by defendants' acts, defendants were not entitled to an instruction limiting their liability to damages caused by water wrongfully diverted by them, and exempting them from liability for damages caused by waters flowing from sources over which they had no control.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by A. A. Wood against J. F. Moulton and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Collier & Carnahan and O. P. Widaman, for appellants. Purrington & Adair, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Defendants are the owners of a large tract of land. Plaintiff's land (20 acres in extent) is contiguous to, and lower in elevation than, defendants' land. It is charged that defendants, in preparing their land for cultivation, changed the course of surface water which in times of rain accumulated in a ravine in the hills upon their property, erected an embankment across the original wash which these surface waters followed, and constructed a new channel for them to the canal of the Riverside Water Company. The result was that under a heavy rainfall the waters rushed over the land and down the channel into the canal of the Riverside Water Company, filling it with mud and other débris, and, breaking over the canal, continued their way across defendants' land and on to plaintiff's land, doing damage. It was charged that but for the interference by defendants with the natural flow of the surface waters they would never have reached plaintiff's land. The action was brought to recover damages, and to compel the defendants to abate the embankment and channel as a nuisance, and to restore the original channel to its earlier condition. A jury trial was had, and the jury returned its verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $1,000. Judgment for plaintiff in that amount followed. No disposition of any kind seems to have been made of plaintiff's prayer for a mandatory injunction and other equitable relief, and, as the case is presented to us, it is simply an action at law for damages to real property.

Appellants' principal contention is that, under the statutes of this state (St. 1850, p. 219, c. 95), and under section 4468 of the Political Code, as the common law of England is made the rule of decision in this state, where not repugnant to or inconsistent with out Constitution or laws, the defendants' acts in ridding themselves of this storm water were entirely consistent with their rights, and if plaintiff suffered damage therefrom it was damnum absque injuria. Such, indeed, was the rule at common law, but by a long course of decisions in this state, consistently adhered to, the rule of the civil law has been adopted, and has become our rule of property. Ogburn v. Connor, 46 Cal. 346, 13 Am. Rep. 213; Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 Pac. 872, 21 Pac. 11; McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515, 23 Pac. 795, 8 L. R. A. 575; Gray v. McWilliams, 98 Cal. 157, 32 Pac. 976, 21 L. R. A. 593, 35 Am. St. Rep. 163; Los Angeles Cemetery Association v. City of Los Angeles, 103 Cal. 461, 37 Pac. 375; Rudel v. Los Angeles County, 118 Cal. 281, 50 Pac. 400; Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 663, 57 Pac. 572; Larrabee v. Cloverdale, 131 Cal. 96, 63 Pac. 143; Sanguinetti v. Pock, 136 Cal. 466, 69 Pac. 98, 89 Am. St. Rep. 169. In Los Angeles Cemetery Ass'n v. City of Los Angeles, supra, the differences and distinctions between the rule at common law and that at civil law having been pointed out, it is said: "In a considerable number of states of our Union, California included, the doctrine of the civil law has been substituted for the common-law rule." In Cushing v. Pires, supra, it is said: "It is the settled law of this state that a landowner cannot protect his own land to the injury of another's land by turning the storm or surface water which would naturally flow thereon away from his own and on to the lands of another." It follows, therefore, that the owner of higher lands has no right, for his own relief, either to divert surface or storm waters from his lands on to the lands of another, over which they would not naturally have flowed, nor has he the right, by accumulating the surface waters upon his own lands in ditches or other like artificial channels, to precipitate them upon his neighbor's land in larger quantities or in different form from that which they would have had or taken in the course of nature. The rule of this state is the rule of the civil law, "Aqua currit, et debet currere, ut currere solebat," and we have, moreover, modified, to meet our conditions, the harsh and drastic common-law maxim of "Cujus est solum, ejus est usque ad cœlum et ad inferos," by applying with it the more benign and equitable rule of "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas."

Appellants complain of instructions given by the court, but the gravamen of their complaint is that the instructions embodied the rule of the civil law and not that of the common law, and, for the reasons already given, their point is not well taken. In particular, however, appellant complains that there are contradictory instructions. Instruction 6 is as follows: "If you find that the defendants in this case, in a reasonable manner, and for the proper cultivation and improvement of their own land, confined the surface or flood waters flowing down upon their tract through a surface water channel (at certain points spreading out over their tract and assuming various channels) into one channel, and carried the same in substantially the same channel in which the water flowed naturally across their land, without substantially increasing the volume of water therein, then you are instructed that defendants were exercising a legal right," etc. In instruction 8 the jury was advised: "Defendants had the right * * * to confine the two or three channels in one, and so carry said waters along and over said tract, thus directing it into its natural channel lower down on defendants' land, even though such change might throw increased waters into said natural and customary channel below." It is not easy to perceive why the court should have given these two instructions so obviously conflicting, but appellants have no just cause for complaint. The sixth instruction fairly stated the law. Appellants certainly are not injured because in a later instruction the court laid down a rule more favorable to them than the law justifies.

The jury, under instructions of the court, were sent, with Francis Cuttle and J. R. Cuttle, in custody of the sheriff, to view the premises. Testimony had been offered by the defendants on the trial to prove that no wash had ever crossed a certain street, thus contradicting evidence upon that point offered by plaintiff. The evidence of defendants was that holes had been dug about three feet deep along the street for a hundred feet or so, and that there was no indication of sand there at all; it was rich ground—loam. When the jury reached this point, a laborer was filling the last of the holes. Upon being asked why he had done so, he offered to dig some more. He then proceeded to dig at that point, and made a hole about 15 or 18 inches deep. While the digging was going on, several of the jurymen stood about watching the result of the work and noticing the soil as it was exposed, and finally one of the jurymen said that that was sufficient, and the digging ceased. We do not perceive how this, if it be treated as an irregularity, could have been prejudicial to the defendants. There had been no denial of the testimony of their witnesses that there was no indication of sand in the soil which had been dug from the holes, and, except upon the theory that defendants' witnesses were false or mistaken in their testimony, defendants could not be prejudiced by the digging of a hole at this particular spot.

Defendants next complain because J. R. Cuttle, while on the ground with the jury, "stated, or endeavored to state, what his testimony had been on the trial as to where the water was accustomed to run." J. R. Cuttle was the superintendent of the defendants, and had been called as a witness by them, and had given evidence in their favor. However improper the effort of Cuttle may have been, it is impossible to see how appellant could have been prejudiced by it. It is not pretended that in his attempt to state what his evidence had been he changed his view in any way adverse to defendants' contention. Moreover, it does not appear that the witness succeeded in his attempt. So far as defendants' rights are concerned, the irregularity was one which did not impair them, and one, therefore, of which they have no just cause of complaint.

A more serious objection is that presented by the following facts: Francis Cuttle, who also accompanied the jury, stated, in reply to the question of one of the jurymen, "Where did the water run across here before the land was improved?" "It did not run here at all." The court, in sending the Cuttles with the sheriff in charge of the jury, instructed them that they were to express no opinion in regard to the matter, or to give any evidence, "except to answer questions which they may ask with regard to the points involved; and the sheriff will go with the jury to see to it that no one is allowed to talk to them in regard to the case, except these two gentlemen." Francis Cuttle had already testified to the same matter in court, and it might be said that this question and answer were fairly within the instructions given by the court, and amounted to no more than pointing out upon the ground the facts to which he had testified in court. Be this as it may, however, appellants cannot be heard to complain. They knew of the irregularity at the time, and had ample opportunity to call the court's attention to it before a verdict was rendered. They chose, however, to remain silent and trust to the chance of a verdict, and, that verdict having been unfavorable to them, they will not at this late day be allowed to urge the irregularity. In Monaghan v. Rolling Mill Company, 81 Cal. 190, 22 Pac. 590, it is said: "This circumstance was known to appellant at the time of its occurrence, and no objection was made; and he could not thus remain quiet and take the chance of a favorable verdict, and keep this point in reserve." See, also, 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 1206; 1 Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 27; Ipswitch v. Fernandez, 84 Cal. 639, 24 Pac. 298.

We perceive no error of the court in the admission or rejection of evidence that calls for special notice, nor can it be said that the court was in error in refusing a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. There is not a sufficient showing of diligence, and the evidence itself is, in its nature, cumulative and designed to contradict the plaintiff's witnesses, and the rule is that newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative or designed to contradict witnesses is not of a character to warrant granting a new trial. People v. Anthony, 56 Cal. 397; Chalmers v. Sheehy, 132 Cal. 459, 64 Pac. 709, 84 Am. St. Rep. 62.

In a supplemental brief appellants make an additional point that the court erred in refusing to give an instruction to the effect that, in considering the question of damage, they should determine whether any part of the damage was caused by waters flowing on to plaintiff's land from other sources over which defendants had no control, and that, if they so found, defendants were liable, if liable at all, only for that portion of the damages caused by water wrongfully diverted by them. This instruction was addressed to a contention that the waters of the Riverside Water Company's ditch intermingled with the waters from defendants' land, and that the damage was caused, at least in part, by waters from this ditch. But there was no issue presented by the answer of the defendants that any part of the damage was caused by waters flowing on to plaintiff's land from other sources over which they had no control, and it is made to appear very clearly that the ditch was capable of carrying the natural storm waters if it had not been obstructed and damaged by the sand and gravel washed into it by defendants' acts. It cannot reasonably be contended under this state of the case, therefore, that the Riverside Water Company's canal, to which reference in the instruction is made, was joint tort feasor with defendants.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

ATTORNEYS—ADMISSION TO PRACTICE—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Under Act Feb. 15, 1905, vesting in the district courts of appeal created by Const. art. 6, as amended November 8, 1904, the exclusive power to admit persons to practice as attorneys and counselors in the several courts of the state, the Supreme Court has no original jurisdiction of an application for such admission; and a contested application originating in the Supreme Court will be transferred to the proper district court of appeal.

In Bank. Application of Frank W. Hovey to be admitted to practice as an attorney. Transferred to district court of appeal for Second district.

PER CURIAM. Whereas, heretofore, at a session of this court held on June 17, 1904, Frank W. Hovey made application to this court for an order admitting him to practice as an attorney and counselor in all the courts of this state, and was thereupon duly examined by this court as to his qualifications, and upon said examination was by this court found qualified, and there being opposition to his said application for admission to practice, this court thereupon proceeded to make inquiry as to the good moral character of said Frank W. Hovey, and, to that end, made an order referring that question to Hon. M. T. Allen, judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, as referee, to take testimony, and therefrom report to this court his findings concerning the character of said applicant, and said referee having thereafter made and filed in this court his report and finding in regard to the moral character of said applicant, and the matter having been thereupon continued for argument and determination upon said report; and whereas, there has been no hearing or determination thereon, and by an act approved February 15, 1905, it has been provided that power to make orders admitting persons to practice as attorneys and counselors in all the courts of this state is now lodged exclusively in the several district courts of appeal created by the amendment adopted November 8, 1904, to article 6 of the Constitution: Now, therefore, it is ordered by this court that the aforesaid application of Frank W. Hovey be transferred to the district court of appeal for the Second District for hearing and determination upon the report of said referee, and that the clerk of this court, when said district court of appeal is organized, do forthwith send to said court all the papers on file in said proceeding, together with a copy of this order and all other orders made by this court therein.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—FRAUD—RESCISSION—TENDER—PAYING MONEY INTO COURT—APPEAL—ERRORS OF LAW OCCURRING AT TRIAL—NONSUIT.

1. On appeal from an order denying a new trial neither the sufficiency of a pleading nor the action of the court upon a demurrer thereto or a motion to strike out can be considered, and, where no evidence was introduced, only the errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to can be considered.

2. The action of the court in granting a nonsuit upon the opening statement of counsel is, if improper, an error of law occurring at the trial, which may be reviewed on appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

3. Code Civ. Proc. § 572, provides that a party may be required to pay money into cour*

when it is admitted by the pleading or shown upon the examination of the party that he has in his possession any money which, being the subject of litigation, is held by him as trustee for another, or which belongs to or is due another. In an action to set aside a deed plaintiff offered to pay the consideration received into court whenever the court should order reconveyance, which offer was not accepted by defendant. Held, that it was error to require plaintiff to pay the money into court as a condition precedent to his right to continue the action.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 462, providing that the statement of any new matter in the answer must on trial be deemed controverted, the overruling of a demurrer to a defense set up in the answer does not authorize the granting of a judgment of nonsuit, in the absence of any proof of the facts alleged in the answer, or an admission by plaintiff that they are true.

5. A motion for nonsuit upon the opening statement and admission of plaintiff concedes the truth of all plaintiff's averments.

6. Where defendants, by means of fraud and undue influence, obtained property from plaintiff at a sum greatly less than its value, and upon discovering the fraud plaintiff immediately notified defendants of his rescission of the transaction, demanded a reconveyance, and tendered back the consideration, which he remained able and willing to return at any time, he was entitled to reconveyance of the property.

7. Civ. Code, § 1691, declares that the rescission of a contract is accomplished by complying with certain rules therein prescribed, and that, if such rescission is not acceded to, it may be enforced by action, and provides that the party making rescission must restore everything of value which he has received from the other party under the contract. A person from whom a conveyance was obtained by fraud gave notice of rescission immediately upon discovering the fraud, and tendered back the certificate of deposit which he had received as consideration for the conveyance. Held, that the rescission was completed by the tendering of the certificate, and that plaintiff was not thereafter required to keep the certificate intact, but was entitled to a reconveyance on tendering back the amount of the certificate in money.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Trinity County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by Robert Woodburn against H. Duvergey and others. Pending the action plaintiff died, and R. M. Green and others, as executors, were substituted. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

D. J. Hall, T. B. Dozier, and Milton J. Green (Gavin McNab, of counsel), for appellants. Reid & Bartlett, James W. Bartlett, C. W. Cross, and H. R. Given, for respondents.

HARRISON, C. This action was brought by Robert Woodburn to obtain a judgment canceling and declaring void a deed of conveyance of certain mining property made by him to the defendants, upon the ground that it was executed by him by reason of fraudulent representations and undue influence on the part of the defendants, and at a time when he was mentally incompetent to transact ordinary business, and that, upon being restored to capacity, and discovery of the fraud, he had rescinded the transaction and demanded a reconveyance of the property, offering at the same time to restore the consideration he had received therefor.

The deed of conveyance was executed October 14, 1899, and the notice of rescission and the demand for a reconveyance was made October 24, and upon its refusal this action was commenced against the grantees therein October 28, 1899. Issues were joined upon the allegations of the complaint, but before the trial of these issues Woodburn died, and in April, 1901, the executors of his will (the appellants herein) were substituted as plaintiffs in the cause. In the complaint it is alleged that at the time of the execution of the deed Woodburn received from the defendants the sum of $25,000 as the consideration for its execution, and that the property was then, and at all times since has been, of the value of $150,000. In their original answer the defendants denied that they "paid" to Woodburn $25,000 as the consideration for the execution and delivery of the deed, "except as follows"; and alleged that they were at that time the owners of a certificate of deposit for $25,000, deposited in the Bank of California in San Francisco, which by its terms was made payable to one of them, and that at the time of the execution of said deed the payee named in the said certificate of deposit duly indorsed the same to Woodburn, or his order, and that Woodburn received and accepted the said certificate of deposit in full payment and satisfaction for the execution to them of the said deed of conveyance. In August, 1901, after the appellants had been substituted as plaintiffs in the action, the defendants filed a supplemental answer, in which they alleged that Woodburn, in November, 1899, borrowed from the Bank of Shasta County $5,500, and transferred and assigned to the bank the said certificate of deposit as collateral security therefor, and that on April 23, 1900, he borrowed from that bank the further sum of $3,000, and that the said bank received and continued to hold the certificate of deposit as such collateral security until after his death; that in December, 1900, by virtue of an agreement on the part of the executors of his will (the present plaintiffs) the certificate of deposit was paid by the Bank of California to the Bank of Shasta County, and that the latter bank, after reimbursing itself for the moneys loaned to Woodburn, paid the remainder to the plaintiffs as his executors, and that the assets of the estate of Woodburn do not exceed the sum of $16,000. Upon these facts the defendants alleged that the transaction was ratified and confirmed both by Woodburn in his lifetime and by his executors since his death, and that, as they have put it out of their power to restore to the defendants the certificate of deposit which was given to Woodburn, they cannot maintain the present action.

When the case came on for trial, the plaintiffs, having previously given notice thereof, moved the court to strike out defendants' supplemental answer, and also presented a demurrer to its sufficiency. During the argument thereon it was admitted on their behalf that the averments in said answer of the pledge of the certificate of deposit by Woodburn to the Bank of Shasta County as collateral security for loans to him, and its subsequent collection by that bank from the Bank of California and payment of the balance thereof to the plaintiffs, were true. The court thereupon ordered that the plaintiffs immediately deposit with the clerk of the court $25,000, or a certificate of deposit of the Bank of California for that sum, payable upon demand to the order of the clerk to abide the result of the trial, and that upon such deposit the demurrer to the supplemental answer would be sustained, and the motion to strike it out would be granted, and that, failing to make such deposit, the pleading would stand. The plaintiffs excepted to this order, and the hearing of the case was continued until September 30, 1901, and the plaintiffs were given until that day within which to make the said deposit. When the cause was called for trial on that day, the plaintiffs' counsel stated that they declined to make the deposit ordered by the court, upon the ground that the court had no authority to require them to make such deposit before a decree was rendered in their favor. The court thereupon ordered that the demurrer to the supplemental answer be overruled, and that the motion to strike it out be denied, to which order the plaintiffs thereupon duly excepted. The court then stating that it was ready to proceed with the trial of the cause, counsel for the plaintiffs made an opening statement to the effect that they would prove all the allegations set forth in their complaint, and, while admitting that the facts set forth in the aforesaid supplemental answer, so far as relates to the hypothecation by Woodburn of the certificate of deposit and the subsequent cashing of the same, were substantially true, stated that they would also prove that at all times since the commencement of the action Woodburn and his executors had been and were then able, ready, and willing to return to the defendants, or to pay into court subject to their order, $25,000, either in gold coin or in the form of certificate of deposit for that sum, whenever the court should by its decree and judgment order the reconveyance of the mining properties to the plaintiffs. Upon this statement, Mr. Cross, of counsel for defendants, said, "Then we ask this court, as preliminary to the proceedings in this case, that you pay that money into court for us." And upon the court replying, "You may take such an order," counsel for the plaintiffs excepted thereto, and stated that they declined to pay it, upon the grounds previously stated. Thereupon Mr. Cross moved for a nonsuit upon the grounds that they were entitled thereto by reason of the opening statement and the admission made by plaintiffs' counsel, and the failure of plaintiffs to pay into court the $25,000, which the court had ordered them to pay as a condition of the right to proceed with the trial of the cause. The court thereupon granted the motion for a nonsuit, and ordered that a judgment of dismissal be entered, to which the plaintiffs duly excepted. The plaintiffs afterwards moved for a new trial, which was denied by the court, and from this order the present appeal has been taken.

Upon an appeal from an order granting or denying a new trial only such matters can be considered as are made grounds upon which the superior court is authorized to grant or deny the motion. Neither the sufficiency of a pleading nor the action of the superior court upon a demurrer thereto, or upon a motion to strike out the pleading, or any portion thereof, can be considered. As no evidence was introduced before the court in the present case, only the errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the plaintiffs can be considered. The trial of a cause includes all the rulings of the court and the proceedings before it which conduce to the decision which it makes upon the issues in the case as the basis of its judgment. People v. Turner, 39 Cal. 270; Moore v. Bates, 46 Cal. 29. Any erroneous ruling, by virtue of which a party is precluded from introducing evidence in support of his cause of action as set forth in his complaint or his defense, is an error of law occurring at the trial. The action of the court in improperly granting or refusing a nonsuit is also an error of law, whether made upon the opening statement of counsel or after the close of the evidence in the cause. Craig v. Hesperia Land & Water Co., 107 Cal. 675, 40 Pac. 1057. Under these principles, the order of the court requiring the plaintiffs to pay into court the sum of $25,000 as a condition upon which they could proceed to trial, and the order granting a nonsuit upon the opening statement and admissions of their counsel, may be reviewed as errors of law occurring at the trial. We are of the opinion that in each of these rulings the court committed error, and that the plaintiffs' motion for a new trial should have been granted.

1. A party to a controversy involving a right to a certain sum of money cannot be required to pay that money into court, unless it is either clearly admitted by him in his pleading, or shown in some proceeding in the cause, that he has himself no right to retain it, and that his antagonist is entitled to it, or at least has an absolute interest therein. Such admission must be free from any condition, and the antagonist must himself claim an immediate right to the money before he can ask that it be deposited in court. If the admission make the right of the other party dependent upon his performance of some condition, or if the other party does not claim any right to the money, or disputes the existence of the condition, the court will not order the money to be deposited before a hearing in the cause and a judicial determination of the respective rights of the parties, for the reason, as given by Lord Cairns in Hagall v. Currie, Law Rep. 2 Ch. App. 449, that "if money is ordered to be brought in, which is not clearly due, very gross injustice may be done, as the defendant may be put to great inconvenience, and afterwards be told that his view of the case was correct." A court ought not to require a litigant to surrender his property to another, or for his benefit, until there has been a judicial hearing and determination that he has no right to such property; but an order that he pay money into court without such hearing is, in effect, an arbitrary judgment against his right to its possession. The principle upon which the rule rests was very fully considered in McKim v. Thompson, 1 Bland. 150, wherein it was held that the order for such payment must depend upon a judicial determination, upon the facts as then shown to the court, that the party from whom the payment is asked has no right or title to hold the money, and that he cannot be allowed at any subsequent stage of the cause to contradict or explain away those facts. The same principle was declared by Lord Cottenham in Richardson v. Bank of England, 4 My. & Cr. 165. See, also, Peacham v. Daw, 6 Madd. 98; Hopkins v. McEldery, 4 Md. Ch. 23; McTighe v. Dean, 22 N. J. Eq. 81; Daniell, Ch. Prac. *1780. Section 572, Code Civ. Proc., prescribes the condition under which the courts of this state may make such an order to be "when it is admitted by the pleading, or shown upon the examination of a party, that he has in his possession or under his control any money or other thing capable of delivery, which, being the subject of litigation, is held by him as trustee for another party, or which belongs to, or is due to another party." If the money in the possession of the party is not the subject of the litigation, but its payment is an incident thereto, dependent upon the judgment to be rendered in the action, as in the case of an action for redemption, specific performance, accounting, rescission, or the like, the provisions of this section do not authorize such order; and in all cases when it may be made it must appear that the party holds the money as trustee, or that it "belongs or is due to another party." In Jenkins v. Hinman, 5 Paige, 309—an action to redeem from a mortgage—the court denied the defendant's motion for an order that the plaintiff pay into court the amount admitted by him to be due upon the mortgage, upon the ground that the defendant claimed the absolute title to the land, and repudiated the idea that anything was due to him upon the mortgage. Birdsall v. Waldron, 2 Edw. Ch. 315, was an action by a vendee for specific performance. Prior to commencing the action the vendor (defendant in the action) had refused to accept the purchase money which the vendee had tendered him. While the action was pending the defendant asked for an order requiring plaintiff to pay into court the money which he had tendered before suit. The court denied his application, saying: "The complainant would not be obliged to pay the purchase money before obtaining a title, and much less can he be compelled to part with his money while the vendor is resisting the performance." The offer of Woodburn to restore the certificate of deposit was not a tender made in discharge of an obligation on his part which the defendants could require him to perform on pain of some forfeiture, nor was it an admission by him that it belonged to them. The offer was coupled with a demand for performance on their part, and could not be enforced by them without such performance. As the offer was kept good by the averments of the complaint, the defendants cannot demand that the money be paid into court, unless they signify their acceptance of the offer in accordance with the terms of the demand. See Irvin v. Gregory, 13 Gray, 215.

Counsel for respondents have not presented any principle of law in their briefs in support of this order, nor have they cited any authority in which such an order has been sustained. Miller v. Louisville, etc., 83 Ala. 274, 4 South. 842, 3 Am. St. Rep. 722, cited by them, involved only the sufficiency of the complaint as against a general demurrer; and although the court, in reply to the objection that the complaint failed to show that a tender of the money had been made, stated that the averment on this point would have been more complete if the complainant had offered to bring the same into court, yet, by affirming the order overruling the demurrer, and holding that the omission was not fatal to the complaint, it necessarily held that as it was not necessary to make such averment, the plaintiff could not be required to deposit the money in court in advance of the trial. In Sneed v. Town, 9 Ark. 575, the proposition does not appear to have been presented in the case, and was not determined, or even discussed, in the opinion therein.

2. Although the order overruling the plaintiffs' demurrer to the supplemental answer was a judicial declaration that the facts alleged in that answer stated a defense to the plaintiffs' cause of action, yet the court was not, for that reason, authorized to grant a nonsuit or render judgment dismissing the complaint without any proof of the facts alleged in the answer, or an admission by the plaintiffs that all of these facts were true. In the absence of such admission, all of the allegations were controverted by virtue of section 462, Code Civ. Proc., and it devolved upon the defendants to establish them by evidence, and unless so established the court was not authorized to grant a nonsuit. The order overruling the demurrer disposed of the issue of law presented by the pleading, but the order granting a nonsuit could be made only upon a consideration by the court of the evidence introduced by the plaintiffs, or their statement of what they intended to prove, and a decision by it that it was insufficient to establish the cause of action set forth in their complaint. Such decision, if erroneous, would be an error of law occurring at the trial, and reviewable upon an appeal from the order denying a new trial. The motion by the defendants for a nonsuit upon the opening statement and admissions of the plaintiffs conceded the truth of all the averments in the complaint and the amendments thereto. This was an admission that the defendants had, by means of fraud and undue influence, obtained the mining property from Woodburn at a sum greatly less than its value; that upon discovering the fraud Woodburn had immediately notified them of his rescission of the transaction, and demanded a reconveyance of the property, and had tendered to them the certificate of deposit which he had received from them, and that upon their refusal he had commenced the present action; that at all times since said tender the said Woodburn, during his lifetime, and the plaintiffs, as his executors, since his death, had been able, ready, and willing to restore to them, or pay into court subject to their order, the money which had been received from the defendants, upon receiving from them a good and sufficient reconveyance of said mining property. Upon these facts being shown by the plaintiffs, or admitted by the defendants, the court was not authorized to grant a nonsuit.

The ground chiefly relied upon by the respondents in support of the nonsuit is that by reason of the conduct of Woodburn and the plaintiffs in reference to the certificate of deposit they had put it out of their power to restore it to the defendants, and that, inasmuch as they cannot restore the identical property which was received from the defendants, they have lost their right of rescission. This proposition, however, is not sustained either by the authorities cited in its support or by the statute. None of the cases cited hold that, when a defrauded party has promptly rescinded the transaction, and immediately thereafter commenced an action to enforce such rescission, he has been denied relief merely because at the hearing of the cause he was not able to restore the identical property which he had received. Section 1691, Civ. Code, makes no such requirement, but merely requires him to restore "everything of value" which he has received from the other party under the contract. This provision is based upon the equitable principle that he who seeks equity must "do equity"; but the requirement to do equity will vary with the circumstances of the cases in which the rule is invoked, and in the present case the rule will be satisfied by returning the $25,000 in gold coin which the certificate of deposit represented.

The "certificate of deposit" was not the consideration for which the defendants purchased the mining property from Woodburn. They did not agree to give him the certificate of deposit in exchange for the mining property, but they purchased the property from him for the sum of $25,000, and the certificate of deposit was accepted by him in payment therefor, as representing that amount of money. It would be a reproach upon the administration of justice to concede that equity is too feeble to relieve a party from a fraudulent transaction upon the ground that he has collected the amount of a certificate of deposit, or check, or other obligation which he received in that transaction, and is thus unable to restore the identical thing which he received. It is not an invariable rule that the rescission of a contract obtained by fraud will be denied merely upon the ground that the parties cannot be placed in statu quo. If equity can still be done between the parties, courts will grant relief to the defrauded party. Neblett v. McFarland, 92 U. S. 101, 23 L. Ed. 471; Pierce v. Wilson, 34 Ala. 596; Myrick v. Jacks, 33 Ark. 425; Gatling v. Newell, 9 Ind. 572; Tarkington v. Purvis, 128 Ind. 182, 25 N. E. 879, 9 L. R. A. 607; Montgomery v. Pickering, 116 Mass. 227; Brown v. Norman, 65 Miss. 369, 4 South. 293, 7 Am. St. Rep. 663; Paquin v. Milliken, 163 Mo. 79, 63 S. W. 417, 1092; Masson v. Bovet, 1 Denio, 69, 43 Am. Dec. 651; Bank v. Peters, 123 N. Y. 279, 25 N. E. 319; Wharton on Contracts, § 285. "Parties engaged in a fraudulent attempt to obtain a neighbor's property are not the objects of the special solicitude of the courts." Neblett v. McFarland, supra. "Restoration is not exacted on account of any feeling of partiality in regard to the fraudulent party. The law cares very little what his loss may be, and exacts nothing for his sake." Masson v. Bovet, supra. The provision in section 3407, Civ. Code, that in case of rescission on the ground of "mistake" it is sufficient if the party against whom it can be adjudged can be restored to "substantially the same position as if the contract had not been made," taken in connection with section 3408, clearly indicates that such restoration is sufficient in case of rescission on the ground of fraud. Section 1691, Civ. Code, declares that the rescission of a contract which is authorized by section 1689, Civ. Code, is "accomplished" by complying with the rules prescribed therein, and, if such rescission is not acceded to by the other party, it may be enforced by action. In such action the court determines whether the plaintiff had a sufficient ground for rescinding the contract, and whether he has complied with the provisions of section 1691. If so, the judgment therein affirms the rescission made by the plaintiff, and determines the rights of the parties as they existed when the rescission was made. "The court proceeds on the principle that, as the transaction ought never to have taken place, the parties are to be placed as far as possible in the situation in which they would have stood if there had never been any such transaction." Neblett v. McFarland, supra. Woodburn, upon the discovery of the fraud, gave to the defendants herein prompt notice of his rescission, and his offer at that time to restore the certificate of deposit made the rescission complete. This offer, though refused by the defendants, followed almost immediately by the offer made in the complaint, entitled him to the aid of the court in securing him the result and fruit of such rescission. Loaiza v. Superior Court, 85 Cal. 11, 24 Pac. 707, 9 L. R. A. 376, 20 Am. St. Rep. 197. After he had "accomplished" the rescission and commenced his action for its enforcement, he was not required to keep the certificate of deposit intact, at the risk of any subsequent inability of its maker to pay the same, nor, if collected, was he required to let the money lie idle in his possession. The refusal of the defendants to accept it when tendered to them did not require from him more than to be able to restore it or its equivalent when they should tender him their deed of reconveyance, or when he should obtain judgment in the action. As was said in the Loaiza Case, he was only required to be able to "make the offer good whenever they should comply with his demand." The collection of the money represented by it, or his depositing it as security for a loan of less than half its amount, did not have the effect to revoke or withdraw his rescission. Any inference that his rescission was thereby withdrawn is fully overcome by the offer in his complaint, and his ability during his lifetime and that of his executors after his death to restore the $25,000 whenever the defendants should demand it, or whenever its restoration should be adjudged by the court. "Equivocal acts which do not clearly evince a purpose, with complete knowledge of the fraud, to retain the property as his own, will not defeat the right of the person defrauded to rescind. The act must be unequivocal, and must show an election to retain the property, after discovering the deceit, before the right to rescind is gone. Where subsequent acts are relied on as a defense in a case where fraud is clearly established, the act must stand upon the clearest evidence, and must evince a purpose to waive or forgive the fraud, and must amount to a clear election not to rescind." Tarkington v. Purvis, supra. "When the original fraud is clearly established by circumstances not liable to doubt, a confirmation of such a transaction is so inconsistent with justice, so unnatural, so liable to be connected with fraud, that it ought to be watched with the utmost strictness, and to stand only upon the clearest evidence as an act done with all the deliberation that ought to attend a transaction the effect of which is to ratify that which in justice ought never to have taken place." Morse v. Royal, 12 Vesey, 373. See, also, Pierce v. Wilson, 34 Ala. 606; Montgomery v. Pickering, 116 Mass. 227.

To the extent that the court granted a nonsuit upon the ground that the plaintiffs had failed to pay the $25,000 into court, it erred, for the reasons stated in the former part of this opinion.

The order denying a new trial should be reversed.

VALLEY LUMBER CO. v. STRUCK et al.

(S. F. 3,411.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—INSTALLMENTS OF PRICE—WHEN DUE—PREMATURE PAYMENT—APPEAL—APPEARANCE—CONSOLIDATED ACTIONS.

1. On appeal in an action which had been consolidated with another, a stipulation in such other action that the pleadings therein should be omitted from the transcript, but that the action should be determined by the result of the appeal, was an appearance to the appeal rendering notice to the successful party in the consolidated action unnecessary.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, relative to mechanics' liens, and declaring that no payment made by the owner before it is due shall defeat any lien except that of the contractor, the payment, after completion, but before acceptance by the architect, of an installment due when the building should be "completed and accepted by the architect," was not premature, the provision for acceptance being solely for the benefit of the owner.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by the Valley Lumber Company against P. E. Struck and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. M. Drew and F. H. Short, for appellants. L. L. Cory, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to foreclose certain liens of plaintiff and his assignors under the mechanic's lien law. Judgment was for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment, and also from an order denying their motion to set aside the judgment and render another judgment, etc.

Respondent contends that the appeal should be dismissed because the notice of appeal was not served upon one F. A. Duncan. It appears that said Duncan had also instituted an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien against the same property involved in the action of the plaintiff herein, and that the two actions had been consolidated, and a judgment rendered giving to plaintiff herein the amount found due it, and to Duncan the amount found due him, and enforcing a lien as to each. This appeal is taken upon the judgment roll, and the transcript does not contain the pleadings in the Duncan Case. The consolidation of the two actions is shown by the findings and the judgment; but the transcript does not show any service of the notice of appeal on Duncan, and for this reason respondent contends that the appeal should be dismissed. But this point is not tenable. There is in the transcript a stipulation between the attorneys for Duncan and the attorneys for appellants which is as follows: "F. A. Duncan, plaintiff, versus P. E. Struck et al., Defendants. It is hereby stipulated that the pleadings in the case of F. A. Duncan v. P. E. Struck et al. may be omitted from the transcript on appeal in the case of the Valley Lumber Company v. Struck et al., and that the final judgment in said Duncan v. Struck et al. shall depend upon and be determined by the judgment in the case of the Valley Lumber Company v. P. E. Struck et al., now on appeal to the Supreme Court of the state of California, and that the omission of the pleadings in said action shall in no way affect the rights of the plaintiff or any party to said action in the said case of Duncan v. Struck et al. It is stipulated and agreed that the pleadings in said action of Duncan v. Struck et al. are the same as those in the case of Valley Lumber Company v. Struck et al., printed in said transcript on appeal, and if the judgment in favor of said Valley Lumber Company shall be reversed or affirmed such reversal or affirmance shall apply to and fully cover the said case of Duncan v. Struck, and upon the return of the remittitur on appeal to the trial court said trial court shall make all such orders as may be necessary to place said two consolidated actions in the same position so that in all respects the same orders and proceedings shall be had and taken in each of said consolidated actions, except that the rights of the said plaintiff shall be unaffected by any reversal of said judgment if the same be reversed in connection with the order referred to in said notice of appeal. Dated this 12th day of November, 1902. A. M. Drew and Frank H. Short, Attorneys for Defendants. A. C. Williams, Attorney for Plaintiff."

This stipulation is clearly an appearance by Duncan to the appeal, and takes away from the respondent herein the right to make the somewhat technical point that its judgment cannot be reviewed because Duncan's judgment might be affected without his having had his day in court. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

The facts out of which the only point involved in the appeal arises are these: On April 30, 1901, the defendant Hines entered into a written contract with the defendant Struck for the altering and improvement by the latter of a certain building. The contract price was $2,180, to be paid in four installments, as follows: $400 when certain named work should be done, $500 when certain other work should be done, $735 when the buildings and improvements shall be "completed and accepted by the architect," and the last payment of $545 35 days thereafter. The question on the appeal relates to the said third payment of $735. The building was completed on August 17, 1901, and the said third payment was made on that day; but there was no certificate of the architect until two days thereafter, to wit, on August 19, 1901, on which last-named day the architect gave a certificate of acceptance, which he dated August 17th. The contention of respondent and the decision of the court are that because this third payment was made before the execution of the architect's certificate it was made prematurely, and therefore the owners of the building must pay the said amount over again to the lienholders, under section 1184, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that "no payment made prior to the time when the same is due, under the terms and conditions of the contract, shall be valid for the purpose of defeating, diminishing, or discharging any lien in favor of any person, except the contractors, but as to such liens such payments shall be deemed as if not made, and shall be applicable to such liens." And by the judgment in the case the said sum of $735 is decreed to be subject to plaintiff's lien. We do not think that this position is tenable. The Code itself does not require any acceptance by an architect or a certificate of such acceptance, and has no reference to that subject. The provision in the contract as to acceptance by the architect is solely for the benefit of the owner of the building—merely a means of satisfying the owner of the fact of completion and not for the benefit of the lienholder. The time when the payment was due was the completion of the building; the acceptance by the architect was merely evidence of such completion, which the owner has a right to require as against the contractor; but when the completion had taken place, and the owner was satisfied of that fact, he could safely make the payment as against any third party—at least, as against any party who had not previously given the notice of having performed labor or furnished materials which is provided for in the latter part of said section 1184; and no such notice had been given in the case at bar. This view of the statute has heretofore been expressed by this court. It was declared in Blethen v. Blake, 44 Cal. 117, where the court held that (we quote from the syllabus): "In a contract for the erection of a building where there was a clause providing that the payment should be made in installments upon the certificate of the architect that the materials and labor had been furnished in accordance with the plans and specifications, held, that the clause as to the production of the certificate was for the benefit of the owners of the building, and that they might waive it at their option and accept other proofs of the required fact." It was also so held in McLaughlin v. Perkins, 102 Cal. 502, 36 Pac. 839, where the court says that similar provisions in the contract there under review "were intended simply for the protection of the owner by making the approval of the architect a condition precedent to the contractor's right to demand payment of the money. This condition, however, the owner was at liberty to waive, if he chose to do so, and he might, without any certificate from the architect, have accepted the building and paid for it as he had agreed to do." And the result of the general authorities on the subject is correctly stated in 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 933 (1st Ed.) as follows: "The provision requiring certificates of approval is placed in the contract for the benefit of the owner, merely to provide a method by which he can satisfy himself that the contract has been performed. He may waive it at his option, and receive other proof of the required fact, or pay without proof." In Loup v. Cal. S. R. R. Co., 63 Cal. 97, cited by respondent (which was not a mechanic's lien case), the question was merely whether a plaintiff who had done work under a certain contract could maintain an action against the party for whom the work was done before certain estimates had been made by an engineer as provided in the contract. And the case of Newport, etc., Co. v. Drew, 135 Cal. 585, 58 Pac. 187, also cited, deals entirely with the rights of materialmen who had given the notice provided for in the latter part of said section 1184 to have a lien on unpaid installments, whether matured or not; and the amounts of the various installments, except the last one, were not specified in the contract, but were to be fixed, from time to time, by "estimates" of the superintendent of construction, to be evidenced by his certificates. The case, therefore, has no applicability to the one at bar. Respondent relies on section 1201, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that "it shall not be competent for the owner or contractor, or either of them, by any term of their contract, or otherwise, to waive, affect, or impair the claims and liens of other persons"; but the payment of the third installment when the building was completed did not affect or impair any claim or lien of plaintiff; its right would have been no different if the payment had not been made until two days later, when the certificate was given.

Under the foregoing views the court below erred in finding and decreeing that the amount of said third installment, $735, is in the hands of the appellant I. B. Hines to be applied to respondent's lien; the only amount so in his hands to be so applied is the last payment of $545; and for this reason the judgment must be reversed. There is also an appeal from "an order denying said defendants' motion to vacate the judgment and to enter another and different judgment," etc.; but, as the transcript does not show any such motion or order, said appeal cannot be considered, and is dismissed.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in accordance with this opinion.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal, but I cannot agree to the grounds upon which it is based in the majority opinion. It has not been and will not be contended by any one that, as between the owner and the contractor, the provision in the contract with respect to acceptance by the architect could not be waived, nor that the owner could not, if he chose, make the payment when the building was completed, or at any time previous thereto, so far as he himself was concerned. In a building contract, as in any other contract, the owner may, so far as his rights are concerned, waive any condition therein, regardless of whether it is for his benefit or not. The point that the condition is for his benefit is entirely immaterial. In the case at bar $545 of the contract price was made payable 35 days after completion. This delay was no doubt in part intended to be and was for the benefit of the owner. Yet it will not be claimed that the owner could waive this condition giving him further time, and by paying this installment on completion cut off the right of the lien claimants to compel him to pay it again. Nor does the statute declare, as the main opinion seems to tacitly assume, that it is only payments made prior to the times mentioned in the statute itself which cannot be prematurely made without subjecting the owner to liability to pay it again. The statute does not fix the time of any payment except the final installment, and it does not make the time there fixed the test of liability. The contract must furnish the test. The provision is that no lien shall be defeated or diminished by a payment made before it becomes due "under the terms and conditions of the contract." And it applies as forcibly to any intermediate payment provided in the contract as to the final payment fixed by the statute. Here the contract does not make the payment due on completion. A subsequent event must occur before it matures; the architect must accept it as complete. Under the majority opinion the owner is given power to deviate from the recorded contract—a power of which he is expressly deprived by the statute itself. The statute declares that any payment "made prior to the time when the same is due under the terms and conditions of the contract" shall as to such liens "be deemed as if not made, and shall be applicable to such liens"; that is, to all liens except that of the contractor. Code Civ. Proc. § 1184. There is no exception in favor of conditions beneficial to the owner, nor any permission to him to waive conditions fixing the time of payment, and thereby evade the penalty. He is rigidly held to the exact conditions stated in the contract, and he can no more declare a payment due in advance of its maturity without the consent and to the injury of persons entitled to liens than could the contractor without his consent. The effect of the statute, so far as it applies in favor of the holder of a lien, is that he is substituted to the rights of the owner so far as the terms of the contract are concerned, and that it is the lienholder and not the owner who has the power to waive an express condition of the contract, and thereby defeat, diminish, or impair his lien. The payment made two days before the architect accepted the building cannot be justified on the theory that the owner had the right to waive the condition. It can be justified, if at all, only upon the theory that the architect's certificate was a trivial matter, and that the actual completion of the building was a substantial performance by the contractor, and would entitle him to recover without the acceptance by the architect. Generally the law is satisfied with a substantial performance. 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 145; Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 511, 25 Pac. 686. But the majority opinion is not founded on this principle, and I express no opinion on the question whether, in view of the strong language of the statute, the rule applies to contracts of this character, where the rights of third persons are affected.

In the former consideration of this case by the court in bank the judgment was affirmed on the authority of Sweeney v. Meyer, 124 Cal. 512, 57 Pac. 479. In that case it was held that where a premature payment was made the owner was liable to be again called upon to pay it to the lienholders, although their liens were filed after the payments were made, and they had not given any notice under the subsequent clauses of section 1184, requiring the owner to withhold a sufficient amount of the contract price to pay their claims. So long as this decision is not overruled by this court I cannot perceive any theory upon which a judgment of affirmance can stand. In my opinion, however, the following portion of the dissenting opinion of the Chief Justice, filed upon the former hearing in bank in this case, states the correct construction of the statute upon this subject:

"By the mechanic's lien law the owner and contractor are authorized to stipulate for the payment of three-fourths of the contract price of a building by installments to become due, at their option, at or before its completion; but no notice of lien can be recorded until after completion, and consequently no lien can be acquired upon the building by merely recorded notice for any greater portion of the contract price than the 25 per cent. which must be made payable not less than 35 days after completion, unless the owner and contractor voluntarily agree that a larger proportion may be retained until after the time when the lien notices may be recorded. But the law also provides for personal and actual notice to the owner by a laborer or materialman of his claim at or at any time after the time it accrues, irrespective of the completion of the building, and this notice operates as a garnishment to intercept the payment of any installment of the contract price not then due by the terms of the contract, compelling the owner to withhold a sufficient sum to answer such claim and costs. Upon due service of such notice the owner becomes liable to the extent of all money to become due upon the contract, and in the event that a notice of lien is afterwards duly recorded by the claimant his building is subjected to a lien as security for the just amount of the claim, and that notwithstanding he may have made a premature payment upon the contract price before the receipt of notice. But this is as far as the statute goes. It does not make the premature payment of an intermediate installment of the contract price invalid as to all materialmen, laborers, etc., but only when the effect of allowing it validity would be to defeat, diminish, or discharge a lien in favor of persons other than the contractor. So that if it is an essential condition prerequisite to the creation of a lien upon the building for any portion of a particular installment of the contract price that written notice of the claim should be served upon the owner before payment is due, and no such notice is served, a premature payment of such installment does not defeat, diminish, or discharge the lien—there is no lien to defeat or impair—and the failure of the security is due, not to the fault of the owner, but to the default of the claimant, who has omitted to take the step made essential by the statute for the acquisition of a lien. His lien has not been discharged or defeated or diminished by the premature payment, because it has never come into existence. If a payment is due on the 19th, and a materialman desires, for his better security, to have it withheld by the owner, he must give notice of his claim before the 19th, or the owner may make payment with perfect assurance that he will not have to pay again on account of the materialmen's claim, as the latter well knows. But if he with this knowledge omits to give the notice (the present case), what right then has he to complain that payment was made on the 17th? He is no worse off than he would have been if it had not been made till the 19th. His notice of lien subsequently filed attaches to the last payment due thirty-five days after completion of the building, but according to the intent, no less than the language of the statute, it does not attach to any previous installment not garnished by actual notice before it fell due.

"The decision in Sweeney v. Meyer resulted, in my opinion, from the assumption that the provisions of the statute as to notice to the owner and invalidity of premature payments are separate and independent. They are, indeed, separate, as every clause of every statute is necessarily separate from other clauses, but that they are independent I cannot admit. They are related parts of one general scheme, designed to be complete and harmonious, operating for the benefit of laborers, mechanics, and materialmen, without injustice to owners of property. Upon each class a duty is imposed, and the performance of this duty is the condition of enjoying the rights conferred. To intercept a payment and secure a lien notice of the claim must be served before the payment is due. To give the amplest opportunity for service of notice, the owner must make no payment until it is due according to the terms of his recorded contract. If he makes a premature payment he does it at the risk of having to pay twice, but he incurs this liability only in case of a timely notice. If no notice is given there is no lien, and to hold the payment valid harms no one."

Any other construction than that given by the Chief Justice would make the statute in question a highly penal statute. Courts are very averse to giving statutes a construction which will result in the imposition of a penalty not justly deserved. The construction given will afford a reasonable remedy to all prospective lien claimants who desire to reach the fund in the hands of the owner, and at the same time will protect the owner from being subjected to a second payment of the same installment. I am of the opinion that Sweeney v. Meyer should be overruled, and that the provision of section 1184, Code Civ. Proc., with respect to premature payments, should be held to be applicable only in cases where the lien claimant has given a notice to the owner to withhold the money due from the contractor, and such notice has been served prior to the time when the payment is made, or to cases where the lien is filed in the recorder's office before the premature payment has been made.

I concur: BEATTY, C. J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. While I have already concurred in the majority opinion, it is proper to add, in view of what is said in the concurring opinion, that, as stated by me in my dissenting opinion upon the former consideration of this case, I entirely concur in the views of the Chief Justice as to the construction which should have been placed on that portion of section 1184, Code Civ. Proc., relative to the effect of a premature payment, and in what is said in the concurring opinion in regard thereto, and am of the opinion that Sweeney v. Meyer, 124 Cal. 512, 57 Pac. 479, should be overruled.

SNEDIKER v. AYERS et al. (Sac. 1,119.)

CORPORATIONS—PURCHASE BY DIRECTORS ON EXECUTION SALE.

Civ. Code, § 2230, providing that a trustee or his agent may not take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he has an interest adverse to that of his beneficiary, does not, in the absence of fraud, invalidate the sale on execution of the property of a corporation to directors thereof under a judgment obtained by them on claims against it which they had bought with their own funds.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 12, Cent. Dig. Corporations, § 1387.]

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; F. T. Dillon, Judge.

Action by Emma S. Snediker against David P. Ayers and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank M. Parcells, for appellant. J. M. Walling, for respondents.

GRAY, C. This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover his interest in a certain mine known as the "Eagle Bird." It is alleged and found that one of the defendants, the Eagle Bird Mining Company (a corporation), and its trustees and agents, Ayers and Underwood, in working and developing said Eagle Bird mine, became legally indebted, and that two of the other defendants, Raeder and Powell, who were directors thereof, bought up the outstanding claims against the corporation, and, bringing suit thereon, obtained judgment and sold out the mine and the other property of the corporation under execution, and became the purchasers thereof at said sale. The plaintiff's contention is that this judgment and sale were fraudulent and void, and should be canceled. The judgment was for the defendants, and the appeal is by the plaintiff from said judgment.

The question presented for decision is, could the directors of the corporation legally purchase with their own funds claims against their corporation, and enforce payment thereof by suit and execution sale, purchasing the property themselves at said sale? It is found as follows: "Neither Ayers, Raeder, nor Powell have been guilty of any fraud or misrepresentations whatever, nor have they or either of them conspired to defraud plaintiff, or to prevent the development or sale of said mining claims. That, at the time of the purchase next hereinafter described, defendants Raeder and Powell were directors of said Eagle Bird Mining Company. The purchase of Raeder and Powell of claims against said Eagle Bird Mining Company, and the taking of assignments thereof to themselves, was done by them in good faith, and only for the purpose of protecting their interests in said property. That, before such purchase was made, plaintiff and all others interested were by the secretary of said corporation notified in writing of the financial condition of the company; the amount due from each; that, if payment was not made, the property would be lost; and that attachments had been levied upon the property by creditors thereof. Plaintiff failed and refused at all times to pay any amount whatever to liquidate the company indebtedness. No judgment was obtained by Raeder and Powell, or either of them, by collusion. The corporation made default for the reason it had no defense to the action. Ayers was not an officer of, and was not a representative of, said corporation, except that he held the title to said property in trust for said corporation. Ayers, Raeder, and Powell collectively did not, nor did either of them, at any time own a majority of interest in said corporation, nor did said parties, or either of them, control the board of directors of said corporation. Plaintiff had full knowledge of all proceedings taken by Raeder and Powell against said trustee and said corporation. After a sale of said mining claims under execution was had, and before the period of redemption thereof had expired, a stockholders' meeting was had, at which plaintiff was represented by proxy. At such meeting the condition of affairs of the company was considered, and each party interested was called on to contribute their proportion to redeem said mining claims. Plaintiff failed and refused to do so. That all claims held by Raeder and Powell against said corporation, and included in the judgment obtained by them against said corporation, were just and legal demands, due and unpaid, and were purchased by said Raeder and Powell at their full face value with their own private funds."

It is provided by section 2230 of the Civil Code that "neither a trustee nor any of his agents may take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he or any one for whom he acts as agent has an interest, present or contingent, adverse to that of his beneficiary." The above section applies to the directors of a corporation, but it was not intended thereby to make, nor is there anything in any other provision of the law which makes, a transaction between a director and his corporation in which the former has a personal interest ipso facto void. Such a transaction is subject to rigid scrutiny, and is voidable for any fraud or violation of the duties of their trust on the part of the directors. But it will not be held void where it is shown that the directors' actions were open and above board, and taken in good faith without any purpose of fraud. Schnittger v. Old Home, etc., Min. Co., 144 Cal. 603, 78 Pac. 9, and cases therein cited.

The plaintiff alleged fraud and collusion on the part of the directors, and the burden was on him to establish these allegations. The findings show the contrary. The findings also show that Raeder and Powell did not own a majority interest in the corporation, and did not control the board of directors. It is fair to presume, therefore, that the action of the corporation in reference to the suit was taken through the directors other than Raeder and Powell, and that the votes of the latter, if they voted at all, were not necessary to the action taken on behalf of the corporation. In Bonney v. Tilley, 109 Cal. 346, 42 Pac. 439, it was held that a director could recover against the corporation, on a note assigned to him, the amount which he paid for the note.

It violates no principle of law or equity to permit the judgment creditor, even though he be a director of the debtor corporation, to become the purchaser at the execution sale of the corporation property. Such a case is distinguishable from those cases where a director, with no personal interest in the action, becomes the purchaser under execution sale in a suit of a third party against the corporation. The findings support the judgment.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

In re PICHOIR'S ESTATE. (S. F. 3,897.)

ESTATES — DISTRIBUTION — JUDGMENTS—MODIFICATION—RES JUDICATA—APPEAL — REMITTITUR—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

1. Where, on appeal from a distribution decree, it was held that a certain trust was void as to the real estate only, and the trial court was directed to distribute the real property to the heir, and to use the personal property to carry out the trust, the trial court, after remittitur, had no jurisdiction to modify the Supreme Court decree by marshaling the assets of the estate so as to impose the expense of administration ratably on the real and personal property.

2. Where it was determined on appeal that a testamentary trust was void as to the real estate and valid as to the personalty, and a judgment was rendered that the real property should be distributed to the heir and the personal property to the trustee under the will, and a final order was thereafter entered settling the executor's accounts, such accounts were not subject to re-examination for the purpose of allowing to the heir as real estate rents collected therefrom which had been treated in the settlement as personalty, the heirs being entitled only to such portion of such rents as accrued since the settlement.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Judicial settlement of the estate of Henry Pichoir, deceased. From an order denying an application to resettle a distribution decree, Louise Mooser and others appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of the court in department:

VAN DYKE, J. By the will of Henry Pichoir, deceased, he devised and bequeathed all his property and estate to Antoine Borel, Ami Vignier, and Hamilton Smith, Jr., as joint tenants, and not as tenants in common with right of survivorship, in trust, to pay his sister, Ida Amadi, during the term of her natural life, the sum of $1,800 a year in semiannual installments, the same to be paid out of the income of his estate, and, if that should not be sufficient, then resort was to be had to the principal; and that if his estate in the hands of said trustees at the time of his death, or should at any time, exceed in value the sum of $25,000, they were directed to pay over to William Mooser, architect, residing in San Francisco, or, in case of his death, then to his wife, or, in case of her death, to their children, to be divided among them, share and share alike, the excess of his estate over $25,000, but not exceeding $5,000; and that upon the death of his sister, the said trustees should pay over such of his estate as then remained in their hands to said William Mooser, or, in case of his death, to his wife, in case she should then be living, or, if she should then not be living, then to his children as before stated. The trustees named were also appointed executors of the will, without bonds, with power to sell any or all of the estate, at public or private sale, as such trustees might see fit, and without the necessity of applying to the court for authority. The will bears date June 23, 1882. The testator, Henry Pichoir, died in San Francisco October 24, 1898, over 16 years after the will was executed. November 18, 1898, letters testamentary upon said will were issued to Ami Vignier, who qualified and acted as sole executor of the will of said deceased. Said executor, in due course of administration of said estate, paid, out of the personal property belonging to the same which came into his possession and control, all the debts of the deceased, and such payments appeared by the first account and the final account filed by him therein. The first account was filed November 13, 1899, and was settled and allowed November 27, 1899, on the application of said executor, and by the consent of Louise Mooser, the widow of William Mooser (he having previously died), and their six children. On the 19th day of January, 1900, the said executor filed his final account in said estate, which was in due course approved and confirmed February 1, 1900. Thereupon, upon the application of the executor and the members of the Mooser family before mentioned, an order was entered distributing and assigning the residue of the estate according to the directions of said will. The estate then consisted of real property of the value of about $10,000 and personal property of the value of about $142,000. From this decree of distribution Ida Amadi, the sole heir of said deceased, appealed. The contention of the appellant on that appeal was that the trust created by the will was a forbidden trust as far as it related to the real property, and that the real and personal property were so interwoven as to be inseparable, and therefore the whole trust failed; relying upon the authority of Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70.

It was held by this court that the will did contain a forbidden trust as to the real property of the testator, but further held that the real and personal property were not so inseparably connected as to render the disposition of the personal property given by the will invalid, as in the Fair Case; and the order appealed from was reversed, and the court below directed to make and enter an order distributing all the real property of the decedent to the appellant, Ida Amadi, and all the personal property to Antoine Borel and Ami Vignier in trust for the uses and purposes declared in the will of the said Henry Pichoir, deceased. 139 Cal. 682, 73 Pac. 606. Upon the going down of the remittitur, upon the application of Ida Amadi and Ami Vignier, the executor of the last will of said deceased, for distribution of said estate according to the direction of this court, the Mooser family, through their attorneys, appeared and asked the court to have the debts and expenses of administration distributed and the assets of the estate marshaled, so as to impose said expenses upon the real estate ratably with the other property. The court below denied the application upon the ground that the order settling the first and final accounts of the executors concluded the Moosers as to such matters, and entered an order distributing the estate according to the direction of this court. From this order, distributing the real property to Ida Amadi, the Moosers appeal.

There is no merit in the appeal. The court below had no power to grant the order requested by these appellants, or to make or enter any other order than the one it did in the premises. "No modification of the judgment or decree directed by the appellate tribunal can be made by the trial court, no provision can be ingrafted upon it, nor can any be taken from it." Elliott on Appellate Procedure, § 576. As said in Argenti v. Sawyer, 32 Cal. 415, the lower court "had no authority to enter a different judgment. The duty of that court was simply to enter a judgment in conformity with the order of this court. * * * The judgment of this court concludes the parties, and it is too late now to change it, and certainly the district court has no authority to modify, change, or disregard it in any respect." And in Chafoin v. Rich, 92 Cal. 471, 28 Pac. 488, it is said: "Where the Supreme Court directs a particular judgment to be entered, the court below must not retry the cause, but must enter the judgment directed, and the entry of a different judgment is void." See, further, the recent case of Cowdery v. London, etc., Bank, 139 Cal. 298, 73 Pac. 196, 96 Am. St. Rep. 115, where this rule is fully stated, and a large number of authorities cited in support of the same. The case being thus closed by the former decision of this court, as already stated, the order made and entered by the court below, in pursuance of the direction of this court, is final and conclusive on the parties. It is therefore unnecessary to further consider the matter on the line of the points and authorities made by appellant.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.

Lindley & Eickhoff (Charles W. Slack, of counsel), for appellants. Smith & Pringle (John A. Wright, of counsel), for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Upon a former appeal in the matter of this estate (Estate of Pichoir, 139 Cal. 682, 73 Pac. 606) it was decided that the trust in the will of the deceased as to the realty was void, while the trust as to personalty was valid. It was decreed by the judgment of this court that the real property should be distributed to the heir at law, while the personalty should be distributed to the trustees under the trust. Upon the going down of the remittitur, application was made by the beneficiaries of the trust for a marshaling of the assets, in order to impose upon the real property its proportionate share of the expenses of administration. The application was refused upon the ground that the accounts of the executor, showing payment of these expenses out of the personal property of the estate, had been settled, and had become a final adjudication of this question between the parties. The view of the court in probate in this regard was upheld in the opinion heretofore rendered on this appeal in Department 1, and to that extent the judgment is here affirmed.

But the court in probate, in attempting to follow the judgment of this court in the distribution of the realty, re-examined the accounts of the executor, and found that of the personal property shown by those accounts, some $3,593.61 represented the net amount of rents collected by the executor from the real property. It held these rents and issues of the realty to be a part of the realty itself, and, accordingly, ordered distribution to the heir at law of the real property and of this sum of $3,593.61. In this the court in probate erred. If the accounts of the executors were settled so as to conclude appellants upon the proposition that the personalty must bear the whole expense of administration, and if the accounts could not be looked into or revised for this purpose, it must equally follow that there could be no revision of them such as was here made. If the personal property shown in the accounts was personal property for one purpose, it was personal property for the other, and the judgment of this court ordering distribution of the realty to the heir at law must be construed as operating upon the estate in its condition at the time of the going down of the remittitur. In other words, there should have been distributed to the heir at law the realty of the estate, and the heir at law, equally with the appellants here, was estopped from reopening the executor's accounts to show that, of the personal property therein contained, some of it represented the rents and issues of the realty. The decree of distribution, therefore, should be modified by striking therefrom, as part of the description of the real property distributed to the heir at law, the following: "And also the sum of $3,593.61 in gold coin of the United States, being the net amount of rents appearing by the accounts of the said executor to have been received by him from the real property during his administration after deducting his expenses in the care and preservation of the said real property." But upon the other hand, there should be allowed to the heir at law, as part of the real estate, the net proceeds of the rents, issues, and profits of the real estate included in said sum of $3,593.61 which may have accrued since the settlement of the executor's accounts rendered prior to the former appeal.

It is therefore ordered that the decree of distribution be modified in accordance with the foregoing, and that upon the rehearing of the matter the court in probate shall allow to the heir at law, as part of the realty, whatever it may find to be the net proceeds of the realty by way of rents, issues, or profits which have accrued since the settlement of the executor's said accounts.

INJUNCTION—FERRY FRANCHISE—CONSTRUCTION OF WHARF—DANGER TO NAVIGATION.

Pol. Code, § 2919, provides, in relation to wharves and piers, that no authority may be granted to interfere with vested rights or grants made by state authority. Held that, though a city had authority under its charter to construct a wharf, and the necessity therefor had been determined by ordinance, the construction of the same so as to render navigation by a ferry operating under a franchise from the city dangerous unless the ferry company should expend thousands of dollars to meet the new conditions would be enjoined.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Suit by the Vallejo Ferry Company against the city of Vallejo and others. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. G. Harrier and J. M. Gregory, for appellants. F. W. Hall, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. This is an action to restrain the board of trustees of the city of Vallejo from constructing a wharf extending from the foot of Virginia street into Mare Island Straits, a navigable body of water lying between said city and Mare Island. The court decreed that defendants might proceed to erect the proposed wharf according to the prepared plans of defendants when modified in the manner designated in the decree, and so as not to interfere with the enjoyment by plaintiff of its ferry franchise. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The action was begun in 1897, and was tried in 1899, but for some unexplained reason was not brought here until in April, 1904. There is but little, if any, controversy concerning the facts as shown by the evidence. The disagreement is rather as to the legal effect of the facts. Georgia and Virginia streets in the city of Vallejo are parallel, and run due east and west, terminating on the west at the water front on Mare Island Straits; Georgia street being next south of Virginia street. Many years ago a wharf was extended from the foot of Virginia street several hundred feet across the flats to deep water, at the end of which was a landing place for vessels. This wharf, however, "had," as stated by defendants in their brief, "for a long time been practically deserted, and at the time of this action was really no wharf at all." On March 18, 1896, the city, after having advertised according to law for bids, sold, and by ordinance granted to one Whitney and his assigns, for the sum of $10,151 and the payment of a license tax of $40 monthly, a franchise to construct, keep, and take tolls upon a public ferry running between the city of Vallejo and Mare Island Navy Yard, for the term of 20 years. On March 28, 1896, Whitney conveyed all his rights under this franchise to plaintiff. The ordinances fixed the ferry landing on the Vallejo side where it had previously been for many years, and particularly described it as it there was and substantially still is, at the end of the wharf which extended out several hundred feet from the foot of Georgia street. The landing was owned by private persons, from whom plaintiff purchased it, and spent considerable money in improving it. The ordinance also described the slip on the Mare Island side established by the United States naval authorities, to which the ferry was to run. In June, 1897, the city decided, by resolution duly passed, to construct a new wharf at the foot of Virginia street in the place of the old wharf. It had plans prepared, which were adopted, and bids were invited to carry out such decision. These plans contemplated a wharf which would extend 150 feet further west into the straits than the old Virginia street wharf, and about 265 feet further west than the ferry slip on the Vallejo side of the straits, and was to terminate in a broad head or pier, one wing of which extended some feet south of the south line of the approach to the pier. The court found that this projecting arm of the pier, if constructed according to the proposed plans for the new wharf, "will extend in front of the entrance of said slip, and will interfere with and prevent free ingress and egress of said ferryboats of plaintiff to and from said ferry slip last mentioned, and will obstruct the use by said plaintiff of said ferry slip, and will daily, when the tide is strongly ebbing or flowing, entirely prevent plaintiff from carrying on said ferry business, and prevent plaintiff from conducting said ferry, and will inflict on plaintiff great and irreparable injury and damage, and plaintiff has no adequate relief or remedy at common law for said injury and damage." The general course of the straits is nearly northwest and southeast, and the current is strongest at flood tide on the Vallejo side. The ferry slip was constructed with its opening northwesterly for greater safety and ease in entering and departing with the ferryboat. The northeasterly side of the slip is 140 feet long, and at its extreme end is only about 125 feet from the southern wing of the proposed wharf on Virginia street. The distance between the Vallejo and Mare Island slips is about 1,500 feet. The evidence was without conflict that the current is strong in the straits because of the narrowness of the deep channel; that with the wind from the north or northwest, and on an ebb tide, or with the customary southerly wind and a flood tide, the ferryboat would collide with the south wing of the proposed wharf if built; that, owing to the prevailing winds and currents which the ferryboat must encounter, and owing to the fact that vessels are frequently anchored along the straits between Mare Island and Vallejo, the ferryboat cannot be confined to, nor can it take, a direct course from slip to slip, but must describe the arc of a circle to reach the Vallejo slip, thus bringing the boat in close proximity to the proposed new wharf, and subjecting it to imminent danger of collision with it. The opinion of witnesses, who are masters of vessels and pilots familiar with existing conditions, was uniformly to the effect that the ferryboat could not be safely operated from the Vallejo slip if the city should build the wharf upon the proposed plan. The evidence was also without conflict that the proposed plans for the Virginia street wharf could be modified to its advantage by omitting the southerly wing or L, and extending the wharf northerly instead. The defendants called but one witness—Mr. Otto Von Geldern, a civil engineer of long and wide experience. He testified: "I have made special examination of the situation with reference to the landing of the ferryboat at Georgia street wharf as it would be affected by the proposed wharf on Virginia street." He was shown a diagram representing the situation as it would be upon the completion of the new wharf, and was asked if the ferryboat could operate under the circumstances shown by the diagram. He testified: "Under these circumstances as existing now, the ferry slip pointed in this way, the wharf [the new wharf] extended 150 feet, making this a defined corner [referring to the south wing], I don't think that ferryboat could manipulate there.

* * * The flood tide and the wind as it generally blows on this coast would drive the ferryboat onto the corner of the extended wharf." He stated that the situation might be improved by changing the direction of the ferry slip so as to point directly across the current. He thought that would be feasible, but he added: "I do not want to make that definite statement. There are tides and winds when it might be different." He further testified that: "There is no apparent reason why the pier head of the proposed wharf should be carried out that way [i. e., by the south wing], when it will be just as well the other way. The conditions are rather crowded anyway." Again: "The crowded condition of affairs could be obviated by diverting the Virginia street wharf over to the northwest, starting at about the terminus of the present wharf. * * * In that case there would be no trouble at all to run the ferry." Plaintiff's is the only ferry crossing to Mare Island from Vallejo. Most of the government employés at the navy yard reside at Vallejo, the number varying from 500 to over 1,700, who cross, at different hours, daily by the ferry. There is, besides this, considerable miscellaneous traffic by the ferry. The service is conceded to be of considerable importance to the people of Vallejo, and also to the government. The evidence is that the service is satisfactory to plaintiff's patrons, and is adequate to the requirements of the traffic. Appellants' contention to the contrary finds no support in the evidence.

It is contended that the finding of the court is not supported by the evidence that the injury to plaintiff would be irreparable if allowed to build its proposed wharf, because, first, plaintiff could extend the northern arm of its slip; second, it could change the direction of its slip; and, third, it could improve its boat. There is no evidence that a different or other boat would change or improve matters. The other two means of avoiding the injury rest upon the testimony of Mr. Von Geldern. They were suggested by him as a possible solution in case the new wharf should be built upon the proposed plans, but he was not willing to testify definitely that it would be feasible to change the direction of the slip, and as to extending its north arm sufficiently to meet the proposed new situation his testimony was not that this was the best or proper thing to do. On the contrary, his opinion was that the problem would be best solved by extending the pier head of the Virginia street wharf north away from the ferry slip, rather than south toward it; and his reasons, as well as those of other experts, seem to have been satisfactory to the court. The evidence was that plaintiff could not, except by the expenditure of several thousand dollars, so change its slip as to make it safe to operate the ferry should defendants' plans be carried out. But appellants claim that the city has the right to build a wharf at the point proposed; that in passing the ordinance in pursuance of this right the city necessarily and conclusively determined that there existed a public necessity for the wharf; and that it was therefore no infringement of any right vested in plaintiff, but that it is plaintiff's duty, and is its only right, to adjust its means of enjoying its franchise to the needs of the city for the new wharf.

It cannot be doubted that the city has the right to construct a wharf at Virginia street water front (section 28, subd. 34, Charter of the City; St. 1899, p. 381), and it may be admitted that the necessity for establishing the wharf was determined by the ordinance authorizing its construction. But this does not mean that the city may, in the exercise of such right, interfere to the extent of destroying rights vested in others by the city, and that, too, without pretense of compensation. The city does not own the water front, and in building a wharf it proceeds under no general municipal powers to erect wharves, for it has none, and has only such as are given by its charter. Low v. Marysville, 5 Cal. 214; San Pedro v. Railroad, 101 Cal. 333, 35 Pac. 993. Section 2919 of the Political Code provides that "no authority must be granted under this chapter to interfere with vested rights, nor to interfere with or infringe grants heretofore made by state authority." It would seem reasonable that, if the city cannot grant wharf privileges which may interfere with vested rights, it could not itself build a wharf so as to interfere with such rights. The court said in San Pedro v. Railroad, supra: "The authority given in this section [a charter provision similar to that in the Vallejo charter] does not, however, clothe the plaintiff with an absolute right to construct a wharf at any point on its water front which it may select, irrespective of the rights of others; but it is intended to confer upon it the same authority to do the acts therein enumerated which a natural person would possess, and to give to its acts a sanction which it would not otherwise have." There is no evidence of any necessity for erecting the proposed wharf so as to interfere with plaintiff's rights. The evidence is that no necessity for such a structure exists. The decree does not prohibit the building of such a wharf as the evidence shows is required and is best for the city. The claim that, if the rights of plaintiff and defendants conflict, the right of the municipality must prevail, cannot be sustained in the present case. The authorities cited to the effect that the owner of a ferry franchise from the Legislature of a state has no property in the flow of a river, and has no claim to compensation for injuries caused to him by an improvement of the river by the United States, do not apply. The doctrine invoked relates to the power of the general government as sovereign over the navigable waters of our country, such as Mare Island Straits. The city of Vallejo has no such power.

So far as we can discover, the decree was just and equitable, and preserved to the city every right and privilege to which the evidence showed it has any reasonable or just claim.

It is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

REINER v. SCHRODER. (Sac. 1,105, 1,204.)*

(Supreme Court of California. March 22, 1905.)

QUIETING TITLE—MINING CLAIMS—OWNERSHIP —LOCATION—VALIDITY—QUESTIONS FOR JURY —INJUNCTION—SPECIAL FINDINGS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 580, providing that the court may grant any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced in the issues, where plaintiff in a suit to quiet title claimed ownership and right of possession, and prayed that he be adjudged such owner, and defendant denied such ownership, and asserted title in himself, the issue of ownership was presented; and, the jury having found for plaintiff, the court properly rendered judgment accordingly, and the fact that plaintiff made a claim for damages did not affect the issue, especially when no damages were awarded.

2. An owner of land need not necessarily be in possession to enable him to maintain an action to quiet title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 41, Cent. Dig. Quieting Title, §§ 8–11, 44, 74, 100.]

3. In a suit to quiet title, presenting an issue of ownership and possession of certain mining claims, evidence considered, and held to sustain a finding for the complainant.

4. Where the evidence as to discovery was not confined to what the locator found in the supposed limits of an existing mine, but he testified to having found quartz at different points outside the tunnel in which he was mining, the location was not invalid on the ground that his discovery was made while he was working in such mine, and that the same discovery cannot be used for two locations.

5. In a suit to quiet title to a mining claim, a decree finding that the land was chiefly valuable for its minerals, that defendant had unlawfully taken possession and ousted plaintiff, and removed from the mines gold-bearing earth and minerals, and restraining such interference, is supported by evidence of defendant's interference, though he claimed that whatever ore he mined was left either in the tunnel or on the dump, and instead of causing injury increased the value of the mines.

6. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 592, providing that where the action is for the recovery of specific property an issue of fact must be tried by the jury, where plaintiff alleged ownership and right of possession, and that defendant wrongfully ousted him, and defendant asserted title and right of possession in himself, plaintiff was entitled to a jury to try the issue of ownership, and their general verdict was conclusive on the court, save only the power to set it aside and grant a new trial.

7. The question of ownership having been determined in plaintiff's favor, and the court having so stated in the decree, and the facts sufficient to warrant an injunction appearing in the decree, it was not necessary that they should appear in findings separate from the decree.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeals from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by George J. Reiner against Henry C. Schroder. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. Lindley, H. R. Raynes, and John M. Magoffey, for appellant. R. S. Taylor and Gillis & Tapscott, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. There are two appeals in this case, taken by defendant at different times on separate transcripts—Sac. No. 1,105, an appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll, and Sac. No. 1,204, an appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial. Both appeals will be disposed of in this opinion.

Appeal from the Judgment. Plaintiff alleges in his complaint: "(1) That he is now, and ever since July 1, 1899, has been, the owner and entitled to the possession of certain real estate, described as 'Schroder Consolidated Quartz Mining Claim,' consisting of the Mountain Boy, Gold Medal, Wah Up Rosalie and the Windsor lode claims, and also that Mammoth mine and the Snow Flake mine particularly described in the complaint. (2) That all of said property is mining land, and valuable for its gold-bearing rock and earth. (3) That about November 3, 1900, defendant took forcible possession of that portion of said mining lands described as the 'Mammoth' mine and the 'Snow Flake' mine, and ousted and dispossessed plaintiff therefrom, and put up stakes around said lands, and recorded a mining location in the mining records of Siskiyou county, in his own name, under the name of the 'Enterprise' mine, describing the location. (4) That all of said mining land first above described constituted a group of mining claims, and the same were worked together as one mine by plaintiff herein. (5) That plaintiff was at the time deriving large profits from the part of said mine so taken as aforesaid from his possession, to wit, a profit of $50 per day; that there was exposed and available sufficient ore at said place to run said mill for a period of at least one year, and that by reason of said acts of defendant plaintiff has been deprived of the opportunity to mill said ore to his damage of $18,250." There is a second cause of action, consisting of the allegations set forth above, except the last, marked "5." It is further alleged that plaintiff purchased said mine to make a sale thereof, and that he received many offers for the same since defendant's said acts, but that by reason thereof he has been prevented from making any sale to his damage of $20,000; that defendant has been extracting and removing valuable ores and minerals from the said portion of the said mines so held by him, and, though notified and requested to desist from so doing, still continues to extract and remove the same; that said acts of defendant, if continued, will cause plaintiff irreparable damage and injury and render said property valueless. Plaintiff prays that he be adjudged to be the owner of said property, and that defendant has no right therein; that defendant be restrained from interfering with the same, or any part thereof; and for damages in the sum of $38,250, "and for such other or further relief as may be agreeable to equity."

In his answer defendant denies plaintiff's ownership or right of possession of said Schroder mine, or of any of said mining claims embraced therein. As to the said Mammoth mine, defendant denies plaintiff's ownership and right of possession, and alleges that the boundaries of said mine are coincident with the boundaries of said Rosalie quartz mine, which was prior in point of time to said Mammoth, and that the said Schroder Consolidated mine was patented March 2, 1898, and embraced all of said Mammoth location, and whatever title plaintiff has to the said Mammoth mine was merged in said Schroder Consolidated mine. As to the said Snow Flake mine, claimed by plaintiff, it is alleged by defendant that for reasons set forth the location thereof by plaintiff's grantor was not made in conformity to the laws of the United States, and was therefore void, and that prior thereto defendant made a legal and valid location thereof under the name of the "Mountain Treasure," and entered into immediate possession thereof, became and is now the owner and entitled to the exclusive possession. Defendant denies that he entered upon or took possession of the premises mentioned in the complaint as the Mammoth mine, or entered as alleged upon any of the ground described in the complaint except in and upon the said Mountain Treasure mine. Defendant then alleges that he, by a mistake of law, failed to record the notice of his location of said Mountain Treasure mine, and that he thereafter, to wit, November 5, 1900, relocated said ground under the name of the Enterprise mine, and duly recorded his notice of location prior to the recording of the location of said Snow Flake claim by plaintiff's predecessor, and that defendant is the owner and entitled to possession of said ground by virtue of his said locations of the said Mountain Treasure or Enterprise mine. Defendant denies specifically the allegations of damage and the alleged particular acts of trespass, and as a separate defense alleges that on January 18, 1901, plaintiff entered into a written contract with defendant to purchase said Mountain Treasure or Enterprise mine, and is estopped from asserting ownership to the land embraced therein. This defense, however, is not urged in defendant's brief. Defendant's prayer is that plaintiff take nothing by his action, for costs, and "for such other relief as may seem meet and equitable." The point urged by defendant is that "an action of this character cannot be maintained" where there has been "a complete ouster of plaintiff and defendant is in actual adverse possession of the land in dispute at the commencement of the action"; citing Raffeto v. Fiori, 50 Cal. 364; Heilbron v. Heinlen, 72 Cal. 374, 14 Pac. 22. To the point that the decree adjudging the plaintiff to be the owner and entitled to the possession of the land was erroneous and should be stricken out, defendant cites Berry v. Ivanice, 53 Cal. 653. It appears that the cause was tried on the complaint and answer, the issues were submitted to a jury, and a general verdict returned in favor of plaintiff, with "nominal damages assessed at $1."

The cases cited seem to hold to the technical common-law rule, as claimed by defendant, in actions for trespass quare clausum fregit (see Heilbron v. Heinlen, supra), that plaintiff must prove (1) possession at the time of the injury, and this rightly against defendant, and (2) that the injury was committed with force by defendant. We must judge of the case before us by the issues as made by the pleadings and as submitted to the jury. Plaintiff is entitled to any relief where there is an answer that is "consistent with the case made by the complaint and within the issue." Code Civ. Proc. § 580. Plaintiff distinctly claimed ownership and right of possession, and prayed that he be adjudged to be such owner. It is true that he did not, as is usual in complaints to quiet title, allege that defendant claimed some interest in the land, nor did he call upon defendant to set forth his title; but defendant met the complaint by a denial of plaintiff's ownership and an assertion of title in himself, and the issues thus formed were tried, and by the general verdict were decided in plaintiff's favor, and the court properly gave judgment accordingly. The fact that a claim for damages was made in the complaint cannot affect the result of the trial of the issue of ownership, especially as such claim was ignored by the jury, and no damages were awarded. We do not think the cases cited by defendant are applicable. McLaughlin v. Kelly, 22 Cal. 211, more nearly illustrates the principles governing the present case. See, also, Haggin v. Kelly, 136 Cal. 481, 69 Pac. 140. It is not now necessary that the owner of land should be in possession in order to enable him to maintain an action to quiet title. Casey v. Leggett, 125 Cal. 672, 58 Pac. 264. See, also, Landregan v. Peppin, 94 Cal. 465, 29 Pac. 771. The judgment, in our opinion, was proper, and the injunction was authorized.

Appeal from the Order. Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and judgment. In this group of mines the five first named in the complaint are patented, and the boundaries undisputed. These five claims and the Mammoth were purchased by plaintiff from defendant. The general direction of the claims was northeast and southwest, the Wah Up being the most westerly claim; the Rosalie adjoining on its easterly side, but extending about 350 feet further southerly. In the angle thus formed by these two claims, southerly from the Wah Up and westerly from the southerly end of the Rosalie, is the ground in dispute. This ground was being worked by plaintiff in the spring of 1900 under the impression that the tunnel in which he was working was covered by the Mammoth location, and there is evidence that while so engaged defendant stated to witness McLean, plaintiff's superintendent in charge, that it was Mammoth ground, and also for some distance beyond the workings, and belonged to plaintiff. Defendant was present and knew that this work was progressing, and knew that much valuable ore was being taken out, but made no claim to the ground. While taking out ore from the lode, and being ignorant of the exact location of the Mammoth lines, McLean became fearful that the pay ore was getting outside of the Mammoth boundaries, and he therefore, on April 15, 1900, located, for the benefit of plaintiff, what is called the Snow Flake, the east end of the claim abutting on the southeasterly side of the Rosalie. His purpose was to include whatever of the ledge might be found to be outside the lines of the Mammoth when ascertained. There was evidence tending to show that the ground taken in by the Snow Flake was ground which defendant had represented to belong to plaintiff. Defendant's contention is that the Mammoth location was substantially the same as the patented Rosalie; that the ground in dispute was outside the Mammoth boundaries, and that he located it as the Mountain Treasure in April, 1899, and relocated it in November, 1900, as the Enterprise; that when the Snow Flake was located, in April, 1900, it was not the subject of location because of defendant's prior said location. The controverted fact in the case relates to the ownership of this ground. The evidence is conflicting in many essential particulars. Defendant's evidence tended to show that the disputed ground was outside the boundaries of the Mammoth; that he made the alleged location of the Mountain Treasure in 1899, but, having failed to record his notice, he relocated the ground as the Enterprise in November, 1900. There was evidence, however, tending to show that his alleged location of the Mountain Treasure was a fiction, and was put forward in order to defeat the Snow Flake location, so as to give validity to the subsequent Enterprise location. Shortly after the location of the Snow Flake, McLean met defendant. McLean testified: "I told him I had located a claim there, and didn't want to record it until I had seen him. I told him where I had located it, and * * * asked him, 'Does the property—the rest of the property or ground—belong to the company?' and he said, 'Yes, it belonged to them clear up on the hill;' and I said, 'That is the reason I didn't record the claim; I didn't want to record it until I had seen you.' He said it was not necessary; that all the ground there belonged to the company." McLean testified that he could find no stakes around the claim, or evidence of any prior location, and defendant said nothing at that time about any prior location by him. It was not until the following November, when defendant took possession under the Enterprise location, that he claimed the property, so far as McLean knew. The jury manifestly disbelieved defendant's evidence and accepted plaintiff's, and with their conclusion we cannot interfere.

Defendant claims that McLean's location was invalid, because, as is contended, the evidence shows that his discovery of ore was made while he was working in the Mammoth mine; that the same discovery cannot be used for two locations; nor can a location be based upon a discovery made within the limits of another existing and valid location. Citing Lindley on Mines, § 337; Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. Ed. 735; Reynolds v. Pascoe (Utah) 66 Pac. 1064. The evidence as to McLean's discovery was not confined to what he found in the supposed limits of the Mammoth mine. He testified to having found quartz at different points on the ledge outside of the tunnel in which he was mining, and on ground not now claimed by defendant to have been in the Mammoth location. Furthermore, if the ground where McLean was mining ore was on the Mammoth, defendant could not consistently urge his Enterprise location to defeat McLean's location, which covered the same ground, for, as we understand the evidence, defendant's point of alleged discovery was in plaintiff's working tunnel. Indeed, it is fairly inferable from the evidence that it was upon information given by McLean to defendant as to the results of his mining in this tunnel and of his having located the ground that defendant afterwards made the Enterprise location. Defendant's contention that the Mammoth did not vary enough from the Rosalie to include the point where plaintiff was mining rests upon conflicting evidence. But conceding the fact, it cannot avail defendant, because the ground, if not in the Mammoth, was included in the Snow Flake, and the question presented to the jury was, is the Snow Flake title superior to that of the Enterprise? and the verdict was for the Snow Flake.

The court recited in the decree that the land was mining land, and chiefly valuable for its minerals, and that on November 3, 1900, defendant with force unlawfully took possession of the mining ground described as the Mammoth and Snow Flake mines, ousted and dispossessed plaintiff, and since said date has made excavations thereon, "and has removed from said mines the gold-bearing earth and minerals therein; that the acts of defendant, unless restrained, will cause plaintiff great and irreparable injury," etc. Defendant contends that he took possession of no ground except his own; that there is no evidence that he removed from the mines any earth or minerals; that whatever ore he mined was left either in the tunnel or on the dump; and such acts, instead of causing plaintiff injury, would increase the value of his mines, and put the ore in a position ready to be transported to plaintiff's mill. The decree has support in the evidence. Defendant cannot escape the consequences of his unauthorized acts by claiming that they resulted in plaintiff's benefit. In severing the ores there was injury to the freehold, and realty was converted into personalty. Whether defendant's acts resulted in actual damage is immaterial except as the result might affect the amount of damage awarded (and in this case none were given). Defendant had no right to interfere, as he was doing, with plaintiff's property, and he was properly restrained by the decree.

It is not necessary to consider the question of estoppel of defendant to which he refers in his brief. Plaintiff does not rely upon estoppel, although there was evidence tending, but perhaps insufficient, to establish it. The issue was squarely made between the relative priority of title under the two locations—the Snow Flake and the Enterprise—and was decided in favor of the former upon the validity of the locations themselves.

Defendant assigns several errors of law committed at the trial in ruling upon objections to testimony. Some of these rest upon defendant's view of the evidence, which is contrary to the verdict and findings of the court recited in the decree. Other objections were to the materiality of evidence, which it is apparent did no injury to defendant, if conceded to be immaterial. Still others related to the question of damages, of which none were awarded, and the evidence, if immaterial, was harmless. We do not deem it necessary to prolong the opinion by noticing these specifications in detail. We are satisfied that there was no prejudicial error in the rulings of the court.

Finally, it is contended that the findings do not support the judgment. There were no separate findings by the court, and findings were not waived. The court adopted the general verdict of the jury, and based its judgment of plaintiff's ownership and right of possession thereon. In a separate decree, two days later, the court recited the verdict, and referred to its judgment already made, and set forth the facts above quoted as to the unlawful acts of defendant in taking possession and removing ores, etc., and adjudged that defendant be enjoined "from entering upon or interfering with any part of the lands of plaintiff described as follows" (describing the Mammoth and Snow Flake mines). The contention is that the action was equitable in its nature, whether considered as an action for trespass coupled with an injunction, or an action to quiet title coupled with an injunction to prevent further claims; and that a general verdict of a jury will not support a judgment; citing Warring v. Freear, 64 Cal. 54, 28 Pac. 115; Learned v. Castle, 67 Cal. 41, 7 Pac. 34; Bell v. Marsh, 80 Cal. 411, 22 Pac. 170. These were cases of equitable cognizance solely, and may be said to fall within the provisions of the last clause of section 592, Code Civ. Proc. In the case of Donahoe v. Meister, 88 Cal. 121, 25 Pac. 1096, 22 Am. St. Rep. 283, it was decided that where a party was rightfully in possession, and was ousted by another, and wrongfully kept out of possession, upon the trial of those issues such party, whether defendant or plaintiff, is entitled to a jury trial. See, also, Newman v. Duane, 89 Cal. 597, 27 Pac. 66. In the present case plaintiff alleged ownership and right of possession, and that defendant wrongfully ousted him of such possession, and wrongfully withholds possession. Defendant met these issues by denial, and by an assertion of title and right of possession in himself. The Code provides that where the action is "for the recovery of specific real or personal property * * * an issue of fact must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial is waived." Code Civ. Proc. § 592. Plaintiff was, we think, clearly entitled as of right to a jury to try the issue of ownership. Their general verdict was conclusive on the court, save only the power to set it aside and grant a new trial; and no finding of the court could add to or take from its force, and this question of ownership was the principal issue in the case. See subject of right of jury discussed in Hughes v. Dunlap, 91 Cal. 385, 27 Pac. 642. An injunction might or might not have been granted, and was but ancillary to the main issue. The ownership having been determined to be in plaintiff, and the court having so stated in the decree, there remained only to be found by the court facts sufficient to warrant the injunction. These facts appear in the decree, and it was not necessary that they should appear in findings separate from the decree.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

GRAYBILL v. DE YOUNG. (S. F. 2,896.)

JURORS—COMPETENCY—BIAS — REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Whether a prospective juror is impartial is to be determined by the trial judge, and his determination will be interfered with on appeal only when the voir dire examination shows as a matter of law that the juror was biased.

2. In an action for libel a juror stated that he thought such actions speculative; felt that they were often unwarranted, and had the same opinion of any kind of damage suit; stated that his being a newspaper man and such opinion might create a prejudice, but that he would try the case upon the evidence and the law as declared by the court. Held, that the showing of bias was not such as to render the overruling of a challenge for cause reversible error.

Beatty, C. J., and Shaw, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' Decision. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by George D. Graybill against Michael H. De Young. From a judgment for plaintiff for less than his demand, he appeals. Affirmed.

Walter H. Linforth and Linforth & Whitaker, for appellant. Lloyd & Wood and P. F. Dunne, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This is an action for libel. The plaintiff had a verdict and judgment in his favor for the sum of $1. The appeal is by the plaintiff from an order denying him a new trial.

The appellant contends that the order should be reversed because his challenge to William V. Bryan on his examination touching his qualifications to act as a juror was denied, and he was therefore compelled to exercise a peremptory challenge on said Bryan, and this is the only point made for a reversal.

The challenge to Bryan was upon the ground "that he is in a state of mind evincing bias against the plaintiff," and was based on subdivisions 1, 7, § 602, Code Civ. Proc. The testimony of the juror was to the effect that he was in the newspaper business—was the editor and proprietor of the Traveler. He associated actions for libel "in somewhat the same character as speculations," and felt that in many instances they were unwarranted by the facts. He seemed to have this same opinion of "any kind of damage suit." He thought the fact of his being a newspaper man and his adverse opinion of damage suits might create a prejudice in his mind and make him unfit to act as a juror. He did, however, say in response to questions that he would try the case upon the evidence and upon the law given by the court; meaning no doubt that he would be guided by the instructions of the court as to the law of the case, and beyond this would consider only the evidence produced in court. He seems to have had no acquaintance with the parties to the suit and no knowledge of the facts involved in the case.

Whether a prospective juror is fair and impartial and should be allowed to sit in the case is a mixed question of law and fact, to be determined in the first instance by the trial judge. This court should interfere with the determination of that question only when the evidence adduced on the voir dire is of such a character that it can be said from it, as a matter of law, that the juror is so prejudiced or biased in the case that he will not be a fair juror. Reynolds v. United States, 98 U. S. 145, 25 L. Ed. 244; McCarthy v. Cass Av. Ry. Co., 92 Mo. 536, 4 S. W. 516; Baker v. Borello, 136 Cal. 160, 68 Pac. 591. In this connection we should not overlook the fact that the trial judge, with the proposed juror before him, is in a far better position to judge of his fairness, and of the probable effect that any alleged bias may have upon his decision, than this court can be placed in to judge of the same question. The trial judge sees as well as hears the juror; this court can only read what he has said. And while this court will set aside the action of the trial court in accepting an obviously unfair juror, we do not think the case before us is one of that kind. If what the juror evidently meant to say and in effect did say—that he would try the case on the evidence adduced in court uninfluenced by the fact that he was a newspaper man, and disregarding any feeling that this kind of a case was sometimes maintained for purposes of speculation—was true, then he was a fair juror, and if the trial judge believed from what he said, and the way in which he said it that he was not biased or prejudiced, then it was the duty of the trial judge to deny the challenge and there was no error in so doing. Several cases are cited in support of appellant's contention, but most of them are based upon facts entirely different from the present case. The case cited most nearly resembling this one is Quill v. Southern Pacific Co., 140 Cal. 268, 73 Pac. 991. In that case, however, the evidence of the prejudice of the jurors was much stronger than here, and besides the jurors there refused to state that they would be bound by the evidence as in ordinary cases, but thought on the contrary that their prejudice against the class of cases to which that case belonged would color their verdict. Here the answers of the juror tended to show that he would be bound by the evidence, and in that respect the two cases are clearly distinguishable.

We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

I concur: CHIPMAN, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed: VAN DYKE, J.; McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

ANGELLOTTI, . I concur in the judgment and in the views expressed in the opinion. The only possible ground for the contention that the juror was biased or prejudiced was his testimony relative to his feelings in regard to damage suits. He was a client of one of plaintiff's attorneys, did not know the parties, so far as appears had not heard or read of the case, and knew nothing about it. He gave some testimony tending to show that he had "some sort of prejudice" against not only actions for damages for alleged libels, but against any kind of damage suits. His answers to questions indicated that he believed that such actions were often unwarranted by the facts and "of the same character as speculations." While some of his expressions might be construed as indicating such a state of mind as would render him an unfair juror, taking the whole of his testimony into consideration, I cannot say that the judge of the court below, who saw the juror and heard him testify, was not warranted in finding that his feeling in regard to damage suits was not of such a nature and extent as to interfere at all with the proper discharge of his duties as a juror.

SHAW, J. I dissent. In answer to questions the juror said at the outset of his examination, "I have a sort of prejudice which might be removed by the evidence," and that if he were the plaintiff he would not like to have his cause tried by a jury of 12 men in the same frame of mind he was then in. He never denied or disclaimed the existence of this prejudice. In his subsequent examination he declared that if sworn as a juror he would try the case upon the evidence and upon the law given by the court. The last questions put to him were these: "Would you enter upon the trial of the case with a prejudice against the plaintiff?" Answer: "I think I would." "Would you try the case upon the evidence in court, and decide it according to the instructions of the court?" Answer: "I could not consistently do anything else." "Would you do that?" Answer: "Yes, sir." This closed the examination, and the answers quoted give the strongest statement he could make in favor of the plaintiff. He does not in those answers, wherein he says that he would try the case upon the evidence and the law as given by the court, deny or dispute the existence of the prejudice in his mind. A prejudiced man can and does try the case upon the law and the evidence in the case; for if he has no knowledge of the facts—and this juror had none—there is nothing else upon which his mind can operate. The real inquiry is not whether he will try the case upon the law and the evidence, but whether he can and will do so fairly and impartially; whether he can and will do so without the bias which is made ground for challenge by subdivision 7 of section 602 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The juror repeatedly said he could not do this. Nowhere in his examination does he say, either expressly or in substance, that he can lay aside this bias and try the case impartially. The plaintiff was entitled to exercise four peremptory challenges upon jurors not subject to challenge for cause, and by the denial of this challenge he was deprived of this right. I think the judgment should be reversed.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. A juror who goes into the box with a bias against either party, from whatever cause arising, cannot try the case fairly. The evidence of the juror Bryan showed clearly, and without any real qualification, that he was biased against the plaintiff. No distinction in principle can be made between his disqualifying admissions and those of the two jurors held to have been disqualified for bias in Quill v. So. Pac. Co., 140 Cal. 268, 73 Pac. 991. The evidence there may have been a little stronger, but it was the same in kind and proved only the same facts. Those jurors had a prejudice against actions for damages, and they admitted that if the case was their own they would be unwilling to submit the issues to jurors feeling as they did. In this case the examination of the juror Bryan closed with this question and answer: "Q. If you were the plaintiff in this cause, would you be willing to have your cause tried by a jury of twelve men in the same frame of mind you are now in? A. No, sir; I don't think I would." As an honest man he could not deny that he would be unwilling, if the cause was his, to submit it to jurors feeling as he did, and his previous answers only lend force to the admission.

PAYNE v. CUMMINGS, Sheriff, et al. (Sac. 1,100.)

HOMESTEADS—AREA—APPURTENANT WATER RIGHTS—ABANDONMENT—CONVEYANCE OF UNDIVIDED INTEREST.

1. Under Civ. Code, §§ 1237, 1260, providing for a homestead not exceeding $5,000 in value, to consist of the dwelling house and land on which it is situated, selected as provided by statute, there is no limit to a homestead except as to value, and a tract containing 524 acres of contiguous land is, if properly selected and of less value than $5,000, exempt, though part of it was acquired by pre-emption and part as a desert claim, and though it was unfenced.

2. Under the statute, water rights, ditches, etc., used appurtenant to the homestead, are a part of it and exempt.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 1243, declaring that a homestead can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment or a deed by both husband and wife, a deed of part of a homestead by a husband to his wife is no abandonment.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, providing that if the homestead is selected from community property it vests absolutely in the survivor on the death of husband or wife, a conveyance of an undivided interest in a homestead, made by a husband after the wife's death, does not destroy the exemption as to a debt contracted before the conveyance and before the death of the wife.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by H. G. Payne against J. W. Cummings and others. From the judgment both parties appeal. Judgment reversed upon plaintiff's appeal, and defendants' appeal dismissed.

J. H. Stewart, E. C. Bonner, and G. F. Harris, for plaintiff. Spencer & Raker and Clarence A. Raker, for defendants.

GRAY, C. This is an action for an injunction to restrain an execution sale of plaintiff's homestead. The homestead was declared upon and covered 523.94 acres of contiguous land situated in Modoc county, of the value of $3,000. Of this land 160 acres constituted what was known as the "Payne Pre-emption," and the rest was known as the "Desert Claim." The declaration of homestead also included certain water rights, reservoirs, and ditches in which plaintiff had a joint interest, and which interest was appurtenant to the lands in question.

The findings and judgment are to the effect that the defendants do not intend to sell and have not advertised for sale the Payne preemption. It is also found and adjudged that there is no homestead upon any portion of the desert claim. It is further adjudged that the water rights, ditches, dams, reservoirs, flumes, etc., are subject to the lien of the judgment, and are not exempt from execution on account of the homestead.

The plaintiff, Payne, on June 7, 1897, by deed conveyed to J. H. Stewart and D. W. Jenks a one-third undivided interest in the desert claim, and the water rights, ditches, etc., appurtenant thereto. It is decreed that whatever right, title, or interest was conveyed by said deed is not affected by the judgment, and that only the interest in said desert claim and the appurtenances thereto remaining in plaintiff be sold under the execution. The plaintiff appeals from the whole judgment, and the defendants appeal from that portion only which declares that the deed to Stewart and Jenks conveyed a one-third interest in the property, and exempts the interest so conveyed from the execution sale.

The Appeal of Plaintiff. The declaration of homestead was in due form and was duly executed and filed by plaintiff on the 2d day of October, 1888. It described and claimed the whole property, including the pre-emption, the desert claim and the water rights, reservoir, reservoir sites, ditches, dams, and flumes, as a homestead, and declared the value of the whole to be $3,000. At that date the plaintiff was, with his family, living in a house on the pre-emption claim, and all the property was the community property of plaintiff and his wife. Plaintiff's title was that of pre-emption and desert land claimant, which claims he afterwards perfected and obtained patents to all the land. Thereafter, and on the 9th day of March, 1890, the plaintiff executed to the Siskiyou County Bank, one of the defendants herein, his promissory note. On the 9th day of November, 1893, the wife of plaintiff died. In December, 1895, the said bank recovered judgment against plaintiff on said note. Thereafter, in January, 1896, the said bank caused execution to issue on said judgment, and caused the same to be levied upon the desert claim, water right, reservoir site, ditches, etc., appurtenant thereto.

The homestead, embracing the desert claim as it did, had the effect to exempt the same from execution. The water rights, ditches, reservoir site, etc., appurtenant to said desert claim, were also part of said homestead and likewise exempt. The findings and conclusions of the court to the contrary are based upon a wrong theory and are erroneous. The land was contiguous, and although it had been obtained from the government by different titles it constituted but one tract of land all resided upon, and in the possession and occupancy of the plaintiff. It was not necessary that it should be inclosed with a fence. Ditches had been built and water conducted by plaintiff upon the desert claim during the year 1888 and a part of 1889, and plaintiff's house where he resided being on the pre-emption claim evidenced a residence upon and occupancy of the entire tract, including the desert claim. He included the whole tract in his declaration and claimed it all as his homestead. The entire property is conceded to be under the $5,000 limit of value allowed by law to the homestead claimant. It was not necessary to show that the desert claim was devoted to any particular or profitable use by plaintiff. Nor was it necessary to show that he devoted it to any use at all other than as a part of his home place or homestead. It was sufficient to show that it was devoted to that purpose, so resided upon, so occupied, so declared upon, and not used in any manner inconsistent with its use as a homestead. Those cases applying to city or other property used altogether or chiefly for business purposes have no application to a case of this character, where the property is situated in a rural district where farming or grazing is the only useful purpose it can be devoted to in addition to making a home of it. Our Code places no limit on the amount of property that may be claimed as a homestead except to confine it to the value of $5,000. "The homestead consists of the dwelling house in which the claimant resides and the land on which the same is situated, selected as in this title provided." Section 1237, Civ. Code. There is nothing to be found in the above section or elsewhere in the Code that can properly be construed into a limitation of the area of the homestead as applied to property here in question. The homestead declared upon may embrace an area even greater in value than the $5,000 homestead exemption allowed by section 1260 of the Civil Code. In such a case the homestead is not void, but proceedings must be had under section 1245 et seq. of the Civil Code for the appraisement and division or sale of the property. Let the area be ever so large, no division, even, can be had in court except for excess in value. A careful examination of all the cases in this state wherein it has been held that the homestead declaration covered property that could not be properly treated as a part of the homestead will disclose that in every such case the property excluded from the homestead was either occupied as the home of some person other than the homestead claimant, or had on it a house in which an independent business was carried on, or was devoted to some other purpose entirely foreign to and inconsistent with its use as a homestead. In many cases in this state hundreds of acres of land in the country, fenced and cross-fenced, have been held to be properly embraced in the homestead. In one case (Ornbaum v. His Creditors, 61 Cal. 455) a homestead was declared upon 1,100 acres of land, 300 acres of which was inclosed with a fence, and the rest, uninclosed, used by the homestead claimant in conjunction with his neighbors as grazing land, the dwelling house being situated on the inclosed part, and it was held that the whole property was impressed with the character of a homestead. It was also held that the fact that title to much of the uninclosed portion of the land was subsequently acquired by the claimant from third parties who had pre-empted the same did not affect the homestead. The court said in that case: "Now it is objected that Ornbaum had no actual residence on the land outside of his inclosure at the time the declaration of homestead was filed. His residence within the inclosure was sufficient upon the facts as found. He had title to and exercised control over all the land. The evidential facts inserted in the findings of fact (we refer to those as to the neighbors grazing the uninclosed portion, and the taking up of pre-emption claims on the land) have no proper place there, but they, with the other facts found, and which follow them in order in the findings, sustain the judgment of the court." The fact that the land here was desert and presumably unfit for agricultural purposes is no good reason why it could not be claimed as and with the pre-emption claim devoted to the uses of a homestead until it could be reclaimed and made fit for grazing or some other agricultural purpose. The question of "use" as applied to the homestead relates always, as will be seen from an examination of the cases, to the use of the property as a home. If it is used as a home or as a part of the home place it is immaterial whether it is farmed, grazed, or devoted to no agricultural use at all. The material thing to be shown is that it is devoted to use as a home for the claimant and his family, and that no part of it is applied to any use inconsistent therewith. It is plain that land may be used to live on solely without being devoted to any other use at all, and still be a homestead.

The interest in the water rights, ditches, etc., though it was but a partial interest in an entire water system held jointly or in common with others, yet as it was obtained specially for use upon the lands claimed as a homestead, and was necessary and appurtenant thereto, it became part and parcel of the homestead. Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 477, 14 Pac. 198. No part of the entire property can be subjected to execution in the absence of a showing that it exceeds in value the statutory exemption. The homestead was not abandoned as to any portion of the desert claim by the deed of the plaintiff to his wife in her lifetime of the pre-emption claim. For section 1243 of the Civil Code provides: "A homestead can be abandoned only by a declaration of abandonment, or a grant thereof, executed and acknowledged: (1) By the husband and wife if the claimant is married." A deed by the husband alone is not a grant executed and acknowledged by the husband and wife. Freiermuth v. Steigleman, 130 Cal. 392, 62 Pac. 615.

Nor did any subsequent deed of the husband of any moiety or part of any portion or the entire property have the effect to abandon or nullify the homestead exemption as against the execution in question. When the wife died, the homestead, so far as it related to the desert claim, having been selected from the community property, vested absolutely in the surviving husband, the plaintiff herein, and it continued free and exempt from all previous debts, including plaintiff's debt theretofore accrued to the bank. Code Civ. Proc. § 1474. The sale by him of any interest, joint or several, in any part or parcel of the property thereafter, could have no effect upon his right to claim this exemption. He had the right thereafter to deal with the property any way he chose, without regard to his previous debts. So far, at least, as those previous debts were concerned, the property was exempt, and no sale of any mere interest in the property could waive that exemption, and, of course, his grantees took title from him free from all lien or liability against the property on account of such debts. The cases like Carroll v. Ellis, 63 Cal. 440, in which it has been held that a homestead should be treated as abandoned where the husband and wife joined in a deed of an undivided interest in the property to a third person, are not governed by the same principle as this case. In those cases both spouses were living and joined in the deed. Here one of the spouses was dead, and the deed of the undivided interest was made by the surviving spouse alone. As said in Dickey v. Gibson, 113 Cal. 31, 45 Pac. 16, 54 Am. St. Rep. 321: "By the death of the first wife the homestead property vested absolutely in the surviving husband, Samuel Gibson. As far as the legal title is concerned, it vested in him as fully and perfectly as though no homestead had ever been carved out of it. The limitations and immunities which accompanied the enjoyment of the property under such title modified, not the title, but its enjoyment, and were only such as the statute imposed." The interest of plaintiff in the property, after his wife's death, became something different and greater than it was in her lifetime. He had then not only the absolute title, but also the absolute right of exemption in the property from all former debts, as well as the right to dispose of it in any way he saw fit.

By reason of their claims against plaintiff the defendants had no interest whatever in the property, as it was absolutely exempt from such claims. They could not be injured nor could any right of theirs be prejudiced by any disposition that the plaintiff might see fit to make of the property. Therefore there is no good reason for extending the doctrine of those cases which hold that a homestead cannot affect an undivided interest in land, and that a subsequent sale of such interest is an abandonment of the homestead, to a case like this, where the undivided interest has not been conveyed until after the death of one of the spouses, and the whole title to the homestead has "vested absolutely" in the survivor. The facts found are sufficient to warrant a decree as demanded by plaintiff.

The Appeal of Defendants. From what has already been said, it is apparent that the interest in the desert claim conveyed to Jenks was at all times and still is exempt from defendants' judgment.

The appeal of defendants should be dismissed. The judgment should be reversed upon plaintiff's appeal, and the court below should be directed to enter a decree upon the findings forever enjoining and restraining the defendants from selling any portion of the property under the judgment or execution in question.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; SMITH, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal of defendants is dismissed, the judgment is reversed upon plaintiff's appeal, and the court below directed to enter a decree upon the findings forever enjoining and restraining the defendants from selling any portion of the property under the judgment or execution in question: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; SHAW, J.

POGUE v. COLLINS et al. (S. F. 1,328.)

WATER RIGHTS — CONVEYANCES—WHAT PASSES —EXECUTION.

Under Civ. Code, § 1104, providing that a transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto, and section 662, providing that a thing is deemed appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, and section 801, providing that the right to receive water from or discharge water on another's land is an "easement," a conveyance of a water ditch, with a right to convey water therein, and "all the rights, privileges, immunities, franchises, and easements" thereto belonging, conveys an extension of the ditch made by the grantor for the purpose of using the same as an easement and as an appurtenant to the ditch, and the extension was not subject to levy under an execution against the grantor.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by J. W. C. Pogue against W. W. Collins and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John D. Pope, for appellants. Alfred Daggett, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was prosecuted against the sheriff and other to enjoin them from enforcing an execution against any part of a certain irrigation ditch which had been constructed by the Kaweah Power & Water Company. Plaintiff obtained judgment, and defendants appeal upon the judgment roll alone.

The findings are voluminous, and from those findings it appears that plaintiff had conveyed a ditch, with certain water rights and rights of way, to the Kaweah Power & Water Company, under contract whereby, for the failure to do certain things, the Kaweah Power & Water Company was to reconvey these properties to the plaintiff in this action. Plaintiff brought an action against the Kaweah Power & Water Company to obtain a specific performance of this agreement, and a reconveyance was decreed by the court. An appeal to this court was taken, and the judgment was affirmed and became absolute on the 23d day of April, 1903. Pogue v. Kaweah Power & Water Company, 138 Cal. 664, 72 Pac. 144. A reconveyance was thus made to Pogue.

Edwin Meredith and William Meredith, as executors of the estate of George Meredith, deceased, brought an action upon the 13th day of May, 1899, and recovered a judgment in the superior court against the Kaweah Power & Water Company. They proceeded to have execution levied upon a portion of the ditch which they here contend was not embraced in the reconveyance by the Kaweah Power & Water Company to Pogue. This forms the sole contention upon this appeal. Upon the other hand, plaintiff insists, and the court found, that this extension of the original ditch constructed by the Kaweah Power & Water Company, while it held the property, was a part of the property necessarily reconveyed to plaintiff herein, and therefore not liable to execution, levy, and sale at the instance of defendants.

The ditch conveyed by plaintiff to the Kaweah Power & Water Company is known and designated in the findings as the "Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch." The court found, referring to the extension here in dispute, as follows: "This last extension of the said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch across said section 19, last referred to, was made for the express purpose of being used with and attached to said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch as an easement and as an appurtenance thereto, and the only use that could be made, and the only use that was ever made, of said extension of said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch, as the same was extended across said section 19, was for the distribution of water for irrigation, which water was diverted from the Kaweah river into and through said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch down to the south line of said section 18, in township 19 south, range 27 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian, and from thence carried further on and distributed for the purposes of irrigation through said extension of said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch, which was made, as above stated, across said section 19, township 19 south, range 27 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian. That the only source of supply of water to said extension of said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch, across said section 19, is now, and always has been, from the said Kaweah river through the head of said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch." Still further, the court found: "That by the deed of grant executed on the 5th day of May, 1903, by said Kaweah Power & Water Company to the said plaintiff, J. W. C. Pogue, under and in pursuance to the commands contained in said judgment rendered in said action No. 4,618, a copy of which said judgment is set out in the fifth paragraph of plaintiff's complaint herein, the said Kaweah Power & Water Company conveyed to the said plaintiff, in fee simple absolute, the said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch, being the same ditch that was constructed and in existence on the 4th day of May, 1897, when said contract, set out in the second paragraph of plaintiff's complaint, was executed, and also all rights, privileges, immunities, franchises, and easements thereunto belonging, together with eight cubic feet of water per second, being a one-half interest in and to the water appropriated by and flowing, or that may flow, from the Kaweah river into said ditch known as the Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch, and the right to the use and flow thereof in and through that other water ditch which has its head about 100 yards below the said head of the said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch, and unites with the said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch below the head gate of said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch, and the right to the use and flow of one-half of the waters appropriated by means of, or flowing in, either or both of said ditches from the said Kaweah river, which said deed conveyed to said plaintiff, J. W. C. Pogue, in fee simple and absolute, all of the property owned or claimed by said Kaweah Power & Water Company in and to said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch, the water right belonging thereto, and each and all of the rights, privileges, immunities, franchises, easements, rights of way, and appurtenances belonging to or used in connection with said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch." The Kaweah Power & Water Company reconveyed to Pogue as follows: "Also all the right, title, and interest of the said defendant Kaweah Power & Water Company in and to the said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch, the same being the ditch that was constructed and in existence on the 4th day of May, 1897, when the contract between plaintiff and defendant set out in the fourteenth paragraph of the amended complaint was executed, and all extensions thereof on the right of way, described in the deed of plaintiff to the Kaweah Irrigation & Power Company, dated August 15, 1895, and set out in the tenth paragraph of the amended complaint; also in the other ditch leading out of Kaweah river below the original head gate of the said Pogue, Wallace & Crocker Ditch, and leading into said ditch below said head gate; also all the rights, privileges, immunities, franchises, and easements thereunto, or unto either of said ditches, belonging; also all right of way described in said agreement of May 4th."

These findings amply support the judgment which the court rendered. The Kaweah Power & Water Company, in extending the ditch, and in contracting to supply water through this extension, incurred obligations which could never be fulfilled by them or by their successors, except by regarding the extension of the ditch as a necessary right of way incidental to the main ditch. And, this being so, the extension unquestionably passed with the conveyance of the Kaweah Power & Water Company to the plaintiff of "all the rights, privileges, immunities, franchises and easements unto either of the said ditches belonging." A transfer of real property passes all easements attached thereto, and creates in favor thereof an easement to use other real property of the person whose estate is transferred, in the same manner and to the same extent as such property was obviously and permanently used by the person whose estate is transferred, for the benefit thereof, at the time when the transfer was agreed upon or completed. Civ. Code, § 1104. A thing is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, as in the case of a way or water course. Civ. Code, § 662. And the right of receiving water from or discharging water upon another's land is amongst the land burdens and servitudes permitted by law and designated as easements. Civ. Code, § 801.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

SCHINDLER v. SCHROTH et al. (Sac. 368.)

PERSONAL INJURIES—OPENINGS IN SIDEWALKS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—MATERIAL ERROR.

1. In an action for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while removing furniture from a house to his wagon in the street by reason of falling into an opening in the sidewalk, maintained by defendants in front of their premises, it was material error to instruct that, to avoid the imputation of contributory negligence, a higher degree of care is required of one using the sidewalk in front of another's premises for business purposes than is required of him when using such walk for ordinary pedestrianism.

2. The use of a sidewalk by the owner of a lot for purposes of communicating with the street is equally legitimate, and equally an ordinary use, as that of passing longitudinally along it.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Action by C. Schindler against George Schroth and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. A. De Ligue, A. L. Shinn, and A. J. runer, for appellant. W. E. Kleinsorge and Albert M. & Hiram W. Johnson, for respondents.

SMITH, C. This is a suit brought for damages suffered by plaintiff from falling into an opening maintained by defendants in the sidewalk of J street in Sacramento. The opening in question was used by defendants for the purpose of communication with their cellar, and was protected at the time of the accident by two iron doors standing erect at the east and west ends of the opening, with connecting rods between them on the north and south sides. The defendants' premises were on the south side of the street, and on the east, and adjacent to them, are the premises of one Gregory. The plaintiff had come to Gregory's place for the purpose of removing a wardrobe therefrom, and, owing to circumstances explained by him, had stopped his horse and wagon in front of the dividing line between the two lots. The wardrobe was of such weight and size that he could move it only by pulling it after him as he walked backward toward the street, and from there westward to a point opposite the tail of the wagon, and in thus moving it he fell over the upright door of the opening, and was thereby injured. He testifies that when he drove up and tied his horse he did not see the opening or the doors in the sidewalk, and did not know of their existence until the accident occurred. The verdict of the jury was for defendant, and the appeal is from the judgment thereon entered. On the trial the court, after instructing the jury as to the doctrine of contributory negligence and other matters, further instructed them that, "if a man is engaged in using the sidewalk in front of another's premises for business purposes, or for purposes other than ordinary pedestrianism, it is incumbent upon him to use a higher degree of care than is required of him if he is a mere pedestrian and he is simply passing over the sidewalk as such." In this instruction the court distinguishes between the use of sidewalk for "ordinary pedestrianism" and its use for other purposes, and instructs the jury that in the latter case, to avoid the imputation of contributory negligence, "a higher degree of care" is required than in the former. But we do not think this distinction can be maintained. The use of a sidewalk by the owner of a lot for purposes of communication with the street is equally legitimate, and equally an ordinary use, as that of passing longitudinally along it. Clifford v. Dam, 81 N. Y. 52; McGuire v. Spence, 91 N. Y. 303, 43 Am. Rep. 668; Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 375; Id. § 352, note 4. The only authority cited by the respondent to support the proposition in the instruction is Smith v. City of Leavenworth, 15 Kan. 85, 86. But in that case the language of the court is: "The only legitimate use that can be made of a street or sidewalk by any private person is for passing and repassing upon the same." But this would equally include the case of the plaintiff here as that of any other pedestrian, and accordingly the court adds, "A lot owner or any person under him has a right to use any portion of a street in front of his lot in passing to or from his lot," etc. We also think that the error was material.

We advise that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HARRISON, C.

POHLMAN v. WILCOX et al. (L. A. 1,672.)

CONTRACTS—ACCEPTANCE OF ORDERS—CONDITIONS—PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT.

1. A promise by a contractor, on acceptance of a subcontractor's order, to pay to a third person a certain sum out of moneys due the subcontractor under his contract for the stone work on a building, when the money is due him, is conditional on the performance of the contract by the subcontractor, and, until the performance, any question as to payments to the subcontractor is immaterial.

2. Where a contractor accepted an order of a subcontractor, and agreed to pay plaintiff a certain sum out of money due the subcontractor on performance of his contract, testimony was immaterial, in an action on the agreement, that the money borrowed by the subcontractor from plaintiff was used in the work under the contract.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; J. S. Noyes, Judge.

Action by Phillip Pohlman against W. W. Wilcox and others. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harris & Swanwick, for appellant. Purrington & Adair, for respondents.

SMITH, C. This is a suit to recover the sum of $500, with interest, alleged to be due from the defendants on a written contract. The defendants had judgment, from which, and from an order denying his motion for new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

The case is: The defendants were under contract to construct a certain building for the government of the United States, and one Craig had contracted with them to furnish the stone for it for the sum of $2,700. Craig assigned to the plaintiff "all of [his] interest in the last payment to be made to [him] under the * * * contract," which was 25 per cent. of the contract price; and thereupon the defendants executed to the plaintiff the written promise sued on, which is as follows: "Los Angeles, August 7, 1901. Phillip Pohlman—Sir: We will pay you the amount of five hundred dollars ($500) on M. Craig's order, out of the moneys due him from us in his contract with us for the stone work on the Sherman Institute, to be built at Riverside, when said money is due him." This promise was repeated by a subsequent letter to the plaintiff, of date September 5, 1901, wherein the defendants say: "We will hold the $500 out of the last payment due Mr. Craig for you, as you request."

It is found by the court, in effect, that Craig abandoned his contract "before there was any money payable on defendants' said promise," and it is claimed by the appellant that this finding is not supported by the evidence. But the only dispute on this point is as to the date of the abandonment; and it is not disputed that this took place, if not before, at least on, the 17th day of May, 1902, at which time, it is also admitted, the contract had not been performed; and it also appears without contradiction that the completion of it cost the defendant $1,500 more than the contract price. But the position of the appellant is that at the time of the abandonment the defendants had paid the full amount of the contract price, and that the defendants' promise to pay had thus become absolute. As to the fact asserted, we are not satisfied that it appears. Craig had, indeed, then received the aggregate sum of $3,653; but it does not appear how much of this was on account of the original contract price, and how much on account of the additional sums of $600 and $500, which, in order to induce him to go on with his contract, the plaintiffs had been compelled to promise him; and on this point, if material, the burden of proof was on the plaintiff. But, however this may be, the fact is, we think, immaterial. The promise of the defendants was conditional upon the performance of the contract by Craig, and we know of no principle that would justify us in substituting for this the condition of payment of the contract price in advance of performance. Had Craig completed his contract, the plaintiff could have recovered, without regard to the payments made by the defendants to Craig and others; and hence such payments were matters that in no way affected him. The evidence of such payments might, indeed, in some cases, be material to an issue as to performance, or as to fraudulent combination between the parties. But here nothing of the kind is pretended; but the payments were made for the purpose of inducing Craig to perform his contract, and were, therefore, equally for the benefit of the plaintiff as for that of the defendants.

Another point urged by the appellant is the alleged error of the court in excluding testimony to prove that the money borrowed by Craig from plaintiff was used by the former, with the knowledge of the latter, in the work under the contract. But the testimony, we think, was immaterial.

CREED et ux. v. McCOMBS et al. (L. A. 1,231.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — STREET IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENTS — APPEAL TO COUNCIL—SUFFICIENCY — POWER TO RESCIND ACTION — ATTEMPTED RESCISSION — EFFECT — BONDS — INVALIDITY — EFFECT—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

1. Under St. 1885, p. 156, c. 153, § 11, providing that a ground of appeal to a city council in relation to street improvement is "that the work has not been performed according to the contract in a good and substantial manner," and that an appeal may be taken by briefly stating the objections in writing and filing the same with the clerk of the council, a written protest, signed by property owners affected, and filed with the clerk of the council, simply stating, after setting forth their interest in the matter, that they protest against the acceptance by the council of the work done on the street in question, for the reason that the work has not been performed according to the specifications and terms of the contract, operates as an appeal.

2. Where a city council has sustained an appeal by property owners affected by a street improvement on the ground that the work had not been performed according to the contract under St. 1885, p. 156, c. 153, § 11, authorizing such appeals, and granting the council power to set aside the assessment, to require the work to be completed according to its own directions, and to direct the superintendent of streets either to correct the assessment already made or to make and issue a new one, it is without power to rescind the action; and hence bonds issued on an assessment which was vacated by an appeal, but attempted to be reinstated as of its original date by the council rescinding its action sustaining the appeal, are void.

3. The attempt by a city council to rescind its action sustaining an appeal by property owners from a street improvement assessment under St. 1885, p. 156, c. 153, § 11, being void, leaves the proceeding still pending before the council on the appeal, with power, on completion of the work, to direct a new assessment or the reissuance of the former one with the accompanying diagram and warrant.

4. The invalidity of bonds for street improvements arising from an erroneous act of the city council in attempting, without power so to do, to rescind its action in sustaining on appeal under St. 1885, p. 156, c. 153, § 11, and to reinstate an assessment vacated, in sustaining the appeal, as of its original date, on which the bonds were issued, though depriving the bondholders of an active subsisting lien on the lots affected thereby, does not deprive them of their right to acquire a lien on proper proceedings.

5. Under the amendment of 1899 (St. 1899, p. 41, c. 42) to Street Bond Act (St. 1893, p. 33, c. 21) § 4, providing that as to proceedings thereafter had the issuance of the bonds should be only prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings, instead of conclusive evidence, as theretofore, the effect of the issuance of the bonds is simply to change the burden of proof as to irregularities; and where the record is produced, showing what was actually done, it has no curative effect as to irregularities appearing thereon.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Hass & Garrett, for appellants. Dunn & Crutcher, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title. The defendant Security Loan & Trust Company of Southern California filed its separate answer to the complaint, claiming an interest in the property in question as owner and holder by assignment of certain street assessment bonds issued against said property. The other defendants defaulted. The judgment was in favor of the defendant answering, and declares the validity of the bonds, and that they constitute a lien upon the said property. The plaintiffs appeal from the judgment.

The case was tried upon an agreed statement, from which we glean the following: The plaintiffs owned certain lots in the city of Los Angeles fronting on Clanton street. Proceedings were had under the Vrooman act for the improvement of said street, including that portion of it whereon said lots abutted. A contract was let by the said city to defendant McCombs for said street work, and within the agreed time the work was completed to the satisfaction of the street superintendent of said city, who thereupon accepted said work and issued to McCombs an assessment, warrant and diagram in due form under said act. Certain owners of lots benefited by said work and involved in said assessment thereupon filed with the clerk of the council of said city a protest, signed by A. D. Westbrook et al., which reads as follows: "We, the undersigned citizens of the city of Los Angeles, and property owners on Clanton street between the west line of Central avenue west three blocks to east line of Griffith avenue, do hereby protest against the acceptance by your honorable body of the street improvement work done upon said street, for the reason that said work has not been performed according to the specifications and terms of said contract." This protest was treated as an appeal from the action of the street superintendent to the city council, and was duly heard as such on June 4, 1900, and the minutes of the said council in regard thereto recite as follows: "The matter of the appeal of A. D. Westbrook et al., No. 317, from the acts and determinations of the superintendent of streets in accepting the work of the improvement of Clanton street between San Pedro street and Central avenue, and in issuing his assessment warrant therefor, having been continued until this hour, the same was taken up for hearing. G. J. Leovy, Esq., appeared on behalf of the appellants. Mr. Toll moved that said appeal be sustained, and that said acts and determinations of the street superintendent in accepting said work and in issuing said assessment warrant and diagram be reversed and set aside, and that the contractor for said work be required to do such work to the satisfaction of the city council, and in accordance with the plans and specifications; which motion was seconded by Mr. Baker and carried." Between the time of filing the protest and the 18th day of June, 1900, following, the contractor did additional work upon said street in the way of placing more gravel thereon, repairing curbs and the like, and on the last-mentioned date all those who had signed the protest signed and filed with the council a written request that said council should rescind its previous action as to the protest and "deny said protest and said appeal from the said acts and determinations of the said street superintendent." It was recited in said request "that such arrangements have been made and had between your said protestants, and each of them, and the contractor who performed said contract No. 972, as that all disagreements have been amicably adjusted, and to the satisfaction of said protestants." The plaintiffs did not sign either the protest or the written request. It seems, however, to be conceded that the order sustaining the appeal had the same effect upon plaintiffs' rights as it would have had if they also had signed the protest. This written request was referred by the council to its board of public works, and said board reported and recommended that the request be granted. This report was duly adopted by the council, and it then denied, or attempted to deny, the previous appeal, and confirmed the action of the street superintendent in accepting said work and issuing said assessment and warrant. It was upon the theory that this last decision of the council was valid that the trial court refused to quiet plaintiffs' title to their said lots, and adjudged the assessment bond subsequently issued to be a lien on the property. Respondents make two points in support of the action of the court.

1. They say that the protest filed with the council did not constitute an appeal. This contention cannot be upheld. One ground of appeal to the council given by the statute is "that the work has not been performed according to the contract in a good and substantial manner." St. 1885, p. 156, c. 153, § 11. The statute also provides in the same section that the appeal may be taken "by briefly stating their objections in writing and filing the same with the clerk of said council." It was, therefore, sufficient to briefly state in writing that "said work has not been performed according to the specifications and terms of said contract" as a ground of protest, and file the same with the clerk. This would be readily understood as an appeal from the action of the street superintendent, and was in fact so understood and acted upon by the council and all parties concerned, and no one was in any way misled to their prejudice by the form of the appeal. Girvin v. Simon, 127 Cal. 491, 59 Pac. 945; Belser v. Hoffschneider, 104 Cal. 455, 38 Pac. 312. The foregoing is taken from an opinion prepared by Commissioner Gray in this case while it was pending in department, and is now adopted as the opinion of the court.

2. In Williams v. Bergin, 108 Cal. 169, 41 Pac. 287, and Belser v. Hoffschneider, supra, it was held that when in proceedings to improve a street the city council has sustained an appeal taken in pursuance of section 11 of the Vrooman act (St. 1885, p. 156, c. 153), it has no power thereafter to rescind its action in that respect. That portion of the action of the council, upon the request of the property owners, which purports to rescind its previous action in sustaining the appeal, is therefore ineffectual and void. The council had no power to rescind or vacate its previous action in the matter. The only ground of the appeal to the council was that the work had not been performed according to the contract. By section 11 of the Vrooman act the council upon such an appeal has power to set aside the assessment and require the work to be completed according to its own directions, and to direct the superintendent of streets either to correct the assessment already made or to make and issue a new one. The appeal did not attack the assessment in any particular, but, as it appeared that on April 25, 1900, the work had not been fully performed, its issuance on that date was premature, and the council, when it sustained the appeal, very properly set aside the assessment. But, so far as its form and the amounts of the several liens thereby declared are concerned, its accuracy and sufficiency was not, and has not been, questioned. Doubtless, under section 11 aforesaid, at any time after sustaining the appeal, the council, upon ascertaining to its satisfaction that the work was really done according to the contract, and finding the previously prepared assessment ready to its hand and correct in all respects, could have adopted it, and ordered that it be issued as the assessment for the completed work; or it could have ordered that a new assessment be made and issued, and if, in that case, the street superintendent had redated and reissued the former one, it would have been valid. But it is clear from the record that the council did not take, nor attempt or intend to take, either of these courses. Its intention, as plainly expressed, was to rescind its order sustaining the appeal, and thereupon to deny the appeal, treat the case as if there had been no appeal, and allow the previous act of the street superintendent to stand confirmed and valid from the beginning. Its intention was that the assessment should be effective as of its original date, and as issued on April 25, 1900. That this was the understanding of all the parties concerned, including the respondent, is shown by their subsequent action. It was on June 18, 1900, that the council attempted to confirm the previous assessment. If this could be treated as, in substance, a reissuance of the old assessment in lieu of making a new one, it could not take effect as a valid assessment until the day it was so reissued. Yet we find that the street superintendent, treating the assessment as having been issued on April 25, 1900, and the return made thereon by the contractor on May 23, 1900, as a valid and effectual return, issued to the city treasurer on June 25, 1900, a certified list of all assessments which had remained unpaid for 30 days, including the assessment on the plaintiffs' lots, and on the same day the treasurer issued the bonds to the respondent company for the assessment on these lots. If the assessment had been reissued on June 18th, the owner would have had until and including July 17th to notify the treasurer not to issue the bonds. The council was without power thus to infuse life and validity into the former assessment, and make it effective from its date. The assessment stands vacated, and the bonds of the respondent company are necessarily void. The proceeding is still pending before the council on the appeal, and, if the work is completed, that body still has power to direct a new assessment, or the reissuance of the former one, with the accompanying diagram and warrant. The bondholder, as assignee of the contractor, is possessed of all his rights to receive payments of the assessments when issued, and to demand bonds if payment is not made for 30 days; but until said assessment is issued it has no active subsisting lien on the lots. The plaintiffs were therefore entitled to have their title quieted as against any lien claimed by the respondent company in virtue of the assessment or bonds set forth in the answer. This would not affect its right to acquire a lien upon proper proceedings.

The proceedings here involved took place in the year 1900. By the amendment of 1899 (St. 1899, p. 41, c. 42) to section 4 of the street bond act (St. 1893, p. 33, c. 21) it was provided that as to proceedings thereafter had the issuance of the bond should be only prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings, instead of conclusive evidence, as theretofore. Being prima facie evidence only, its effect is simply to change the burden of proof as to irregularities, and where the record is produced showing what was actually done it has no curative effect as to irregularities appearing thereon.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiffs on the agreed statement of facts, in accordance with this opinion.

PEOPLE v. CHIN NON. (Cr. 1,163.)

CRIMINAL LAW — TRIAL — JURY — READING OF NEWSPAPERS BY JURY — MISCONDUCT—AFFIDAVITS OF JURORS—IMPEACHING VERDICT.

1. The reading by jurors in a criminal case of articles in newspapers insinuating that certain witnesses for the defense had committed perjury, stating that one of them had been arrested for perjury, and that a person interested in the defense had been excluded from the courtroom for signaling a witness, was misconduct.

2. On such misconduct being shown, the jurors could not be heard to deny its prejudicial influence.

3. Affidavits based on information and belief are not competent to support charges of misconduct on the part of jurors.

4. Where, in a criminal case, the defense charged misconduct on the part of jurors in reading newspapers, affidavits to the effect that they had read the papers, and stating that such conduct had no prejudicial effect, the affidavits being offered by the prosecuting attorney in order to sustain a conviction, were not within the rule that affidavits of jurors cannot be considered to impeach their verdict.

Henshaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; E. C. Hart, Judge.

Chin Non was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed.

Charles T. Jones and Hiram W. Johnson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., and A. M. Seymour, Dist. Atty., for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant is one of five Chinamen who were jointly accused of the murder of Jeong Him. One of his codefendants—Sing Yow—was first tried, convicted, and sentenced to death; and the opinion of this court affirming that judgment will be found reported in 78 Pac. 236. This defendant was afterwards convicted on the same charge, and his appeal is based in part upon assignments of error which were held insufficient in the former case. As to those matters nothing further need be said here.

The remaining points, so far as they require discussion, will be made clearer by a preliminary statement of the case in its more general aspects.

The homicide occurred in the town of Walnut Grove, on the Sacramento river, a place containing a population of several hundred Chinese. About 9 o'clock in the morning Jeong Him came out of the Chinese restaurant, where he had been eating breakfast. As soon as he appeared on the street three Chinamen who had been waiting there opened fire upon him with their pistols. He fled, apparently wounded, through a part of Chinatown and down the bank of the river, closely pursued by two or three Chinamen, who soon came up with him at a point where he had fallen and fired five or six shots into his prostrate body. All the witnesses, white and Chinese alike, testify to these facts, making it a clear case of deliberate murder. But as to the identity of the murderers the case is far from clear. Not one of the white witnesses recognized this defendant or either of his codefendants as one of the two or three Chinamen who pursued the deceased to the point where he fell and was shot to death. A number of Chinese witnesses, however, positively identified this defendant and two of his codefendants as those who were in at the death, and two others as among those who fired at deceased as he left the restaurant. On the other hand, about an equal number of Chinese witnesses swore just as positively that only two men joined in the pursuit (on which point they were corroborated by some of the white witnesses), that they knew those men as well as the defendants, and that it was not the defendants, but others, whose names they gave, who followed and killed the deceased. Other Chinese witnesses testified that at the very time of the murder this defendant and some of his codefendants were at places remote from the scene of the homicide. In short, the case presents all the family features of the ordinary Chinese murder case, in which one tong is prosecuting and another defending; features with which the courts of this state have become so painfully familiar. We have one set of witnesses testifying to one state of facts, and another set in about equal numbers contradicting them point blank, under circumstances which prove to a demonstration that deliberate perjury has been committed on one side or the other, but which furnish very insufficient criteria for determining where the truth lies. It is apparent that in such a case any unwarranted action by the court or unauthorized communication to the jury, having a tendency to convince them, or to arouse a violent suspicion, that any of the witnesses for the defense were swearing falsely, must be highly, if not fatally, prejudicial.

It happened in this case that one Lee Bin, a former resident of Fresno, was one of the principal witnesses for the prosecution, to prove the identity of the murderers. For the defense witnesses were called to prove that on and after the day of the homicide Lee Bin was still in Fresno. One of these witnesses was Lee Sam, a Chinaman, and another was E. B. Bradley, a police officer of Fresno. The last-named witness testified to seeing Lee Bin in Fresno subsequent to the date at which he swore he had left that city, and his testimony tended to prove that he was still in Fresno at the date of the homicide. Lee Sam testified even more positively to the same effect. As soon as Lee Sam left the witness stand he was by direction of the district attorney arrested in the hall of the courthouse and just outside of the courtroom. It is not clear that the arrest was witnessed by any of the jurors, but it does appear that they, or some of them, wese informed of the arrest almost immediately after it occurred, and that the arrest was made on a charge of perjury. The next morning, and while the trial was still in progress, the following article appeared in the Record-Union, a daily newspaper published at Sacramento, where the cause was on trial:

"Chinese Witness Arrested.

"Lee Sam Accused of Perjury in Murder Trial.

"The trial of Chin Non, charged with the murder of Jeong Him in Walnut Grove the twenty-first of last month, rises above the dead level of generalities. It is a stupendous battle between rival tongs, and, upon comparing the testimony given by the witnesses of one side with that given by those of the other, it is apparent that somebody has got wrong on facts. The trial is replete with incidents. Last Wednesday one of the bosses interested in the defense was barred from the courtroom and cited to appear to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. His offense consisted in signaling to witnesses on the stand, apparently coaching them as to their answers to questions, and Judge Hart caught him in the act.

"Lee Sam was a witness for the defense yesterday morning, and his testimony got him into trouble. He now occupies a cell in the county jail with a charge of perjury hanging over him.

"Lee Sam's testimony was intended to impeach Lee Bin, one of the chief witnesses for the prosecution. Bin testified that he was in Walnut Grove at the time of the shooting, and his testimony was considered to be strong. According to his testimony he left Fresno November fifth last for San Francisco, and that he subsequently went to Walnut Grove and was present when the shooting was done. Sam yesterday testified that Bin was in Fresno from the 1st to the 28th of February last, inclusive, and was not in Walnut Grove at all. He was emphatic in his statement, and as the district attorney has evidence that he deems conclusive that shows Bin left Fresno November 5th, and was in Walnut Grove at the time of the shooting, he acted promptly.

"Assistant District Attorney Yell quietly left the courtroom, and when Sam stepped down from the witness chair and walked out into the corridor he was arrested and locked up on a charge of perjury.

"To a Record-Union reporter District Attorney Seymour said: 'We do not desire to do a thing that would influence anybody regarding the trial one way or the other, but they are carrying this thing too far, and it has got to stop.' With the evidence on hand it is the intention of the district attorney's office to prosecute Sam to a finish after the Chinese murder cases shall have been disposed of. * * *"

And while the cause was still on trial the News, a weekly paper published in Sacramento, appeared with the following:

"A Policemen's Peril.

"Policeman John Bradley of Fresno will have to battle to keep out of the penitentiary, if information said to be in possession of District Attorney Seymour is correct. Bradley is a witness for the defense in the trial of a Chinese for murder in the superior court here. He swore that between November 5th and 15th Lee Bin was in Fresno. Bin is a main witness for the people, and declares that he witnessed the murder at Walnut Grove on November 5th, when Bradley claims to have seen him in Fresno.

"The district attorney is understood to have learned that Bin withdrew his deposit in the First National Bank in Fresno before the date named by Bradley, and that the coolie left Fresno on the same day.

"Already one witness for the defense, a Chinese, has been arrested for perjury, and is now in the county jail."

Both of these articles were read during the trial by several of the jurors. Of this fact there can be no doubt, because we have in the record the affidavits of the jurors themselves, admitting that they read one or both of the articles, but claiming that they made no impression on their minds, and did not in the least influence them in arriving at their verdict, etc. The reading of these articles by the jurors was grave misconduct, and, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, must have prejudiced the defense. People v. Stokes, 103 Cal. 196, 37 Pac. 207, 42 Am. St. Rep. 102. And, the misconduct being admitted, the jurors cannot be heard to deny its prejudicial influence. People v. Stokes, supra; People v. Azoff, 105 Cal. 634, 39 Pac. 59.

The only question arising in this connection is one not raised by the Attorney General, but suggested in the discussion here. The sole evidence offered by defendant to prove that the jurors read the newspaper articles consisted of affidavits based on information and belief, and it has been held that such affidavits are not competent evidence to support charges of misconduct. The only positive evidence of the misconduct here alleged is supplied by the affidavits of the jurors themselves, and it has been many times decided upon grounds of public policy that a juror cannot be allowed to impeach his own verdict by evidence of misconduct on the part of himself or his fellows. But these decisions were all made in cases in which the evidence was offered by the party against whom the verdict was given, and the considerations of public policy upon which they were based have no application where the evidence is offered by the party who gained by the verdict and is seeking to sustain it. Such a case is not within the reason of the rule, and does not involve the mischief to be prevented. Especially in a criminal case it is not to be supposed that the district attorney—a sworn public officer charged by law with the duty of protecting the interests of the people—will exert any influence upon jurors to elicit evidence that will impeach a verdict for the people.

And this, also, is to be considered: It is not the duty of the district attorney to sustain a verdict for the people by denying or suppressing any fact which he knows to exist. Here the district attorney seems to have ascertained by inquiry among the jurors that they had read the objectionable publications. Being convinced of the fact, he chose, and in my opinion, properly chose, to waive the technical rule by which he might have excluded the evidence offered on the part of the defendant, and thereby suppress what he knew to be the truth. Instead of this, he produced the affidavits of the jurors themselves, by which he in effect admitted the facts and sought to excuse them, so far as he could. To such a case the rule against allowing jurors to impeach their own verdict ought not to be applied. In Missouri it has been held that the affidavit of a juror impeaching the verdict, if admitted without objection when offered by the losing party, must be considered. Winn v. Reed, 61 Mo. App. 625. A fortiori it must be considered when offered by the prevailing party. For the misconduct of the jurors the judgment and order of the superior court must be reversed.

Of the numerous rulings of the court upon which errors are assigned, we find only two or three requiring comment. We think the court should have allowed a fuller cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution on the subject of their relations to and dependence upon the Bing Kong Tong. And we think the circumstances as shown by this record hardly warranted the trial judge in citing the defendant's interpreter in the presence of the jury to answer a charge that he had been signaling to the witnesses for the defense while they were testifying.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — OFFICERS—RECALL —PROCEDURE—MANDAMUS—SCOPE OF WRIT.

1. Under the "recall" amendment to the Los Angeles city charter, authorizing the removal of elective officers by a procedure instituted by a petition signed by a certain percentage of the electors entitled to vote for a successor to the officer sought to be removed, to be determined by an examination of the great register, the only qualified signers of a petition for removal are those whose names appear on the great register, and their qualifications cannot be determined by comparison of their names as appearing on the petition with affidavits of registration.

2. Where a petitioner's right to an office from which he was illegally ousted is not established until after the expiration of his term of office, the writ of mandate for which he applied to establish such right will direct the payment of his salary from the time of the ouster until the expiration of the term, but will not direct his recognition as an officer.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Petition by J. P. Davenport for a writ of mandate against the city council and other city officers of the city of Los Angeles. Writ awarded.

A. B. McCutchen and J. S. Chapman, for petitioner. W. B. Mathews and Herbert J. Goudge, for defendants.

McFARLAND, J. This is an original petition here by the above-named J. P. Davenport for a writ of mandate requiring certain named respondents who are members of the city council of the city of Los Angeles to allow petitioner to take his seat in that body and perform the duties of the office of councilman from the Sixth Ward of said city, and requiring other named respondents, who are auditor and treasurer of said city, to issue and pay a warrant for petitioner's salary as such councilman for the month of September, 1904.

The material facts in the case are these: In the year 1902, and prior thereto, and continuously to the present time, the city of Los Angeles was and is a municipality existing under what is generally known as a "freeholders' charter." Its charter—down to the time of a certain election which took place on December 1, 1902, hereinafter mentioned—provided that the legislative power of the city should be vested in a council consisting of one councilman to be elected in and by the electors of each ward of the city, who should hold his office for the term of two years from the first Monday of January next succeeding his election. An election for city officers was regularly held on December 1, 1902, at which election the petitioner, Davenport, was duly elected a member of the city council from the Sixth Ward, and on the first Monday of January, 1903, having duly qualified, he took his seat as such member of the council, and continued to hold said office and perform its duties until the month of September, 1904, at which latter time the respondents, who are members of the council, refused to further recognize him as a councilman, and installed in his place and stead one Arthur D. Houghton, and from that time the other respondents refused to draw or pay any warrant for petitioner's salary. This, of course, was before the expiration of the two-years term for which petitioner had been elected.

The reasons for the above acts of respondents are based on these facts: At the said election of December 1, 1902, at which petitioner was elected, the electors of the city of Los Angeles voted upon and adopted three certain amendments to the city charter, called, respectively, the "initiative," the "referendum," and the "recall," which amendments were ratified by the Legislature of the state on the 23d day of January, 1903. We are concerned here only with the amendment designated as the "recall"; neither the "initiative" nor "referendum" is here involved. The "recall" amendment, so far as material here, is as follows: "Section 198c. The Recall. The holder of any elective office may be removed at any time by the electors qualified to vote for a successor of such incumbent. The procedure to effect the removal of an incumbent of an elective office shall be as follows: A petition signed by electors entitled to vote for a successor to the incumbent sought to be removed, equal in number to at least twenty-five per centum of the entire vote for all candidates for the office, the incumbent of which is sought to be removed, cast at the last preceding general municipal election, demanding an election of a successor of the person sought to be removed, shall be filed with the city clerk; provided, that the petition sent to the council shall contain a general statement of the grounds for which the removal is sought. * * * Within ten days from the date of filing such petition the city clerk shall examine and from the great register ascertain whether or not said petition is signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, and if necessary the council shall allow him extra help for that purpose, and he shall attach to the said petition his certificate showing the result of said examination. * * * If the petition shall be found to be sufficient the clerk shall submit the same to the council without delay. If the petition shall be found to be sufficient the city council shall order, and fix a date for holding the said election, not less than thirty days nor more than forty days from the date of the clerk's certificate to the council that a sufficient petition is filed." St. 1903, p. 574. (The italics are ours.) It is further provided in this section that an election shall be called, and if any person other than the incumbent shall have received the highest number of votes for the office "the incumbent shall thereupon be deemed removed from the office upon qualification of his successor." It is further provided that, if the incumbent receive the highest number of votes he shall continue in office.

Pursuant to the amendment above mentioned there was filed with the city clerk on August 1, 1904, a petition purporting to be signed by more than 25 per cent. of the electors of the Sixth Ward entitled to vote for a successor to petitioner, praying for his removal. No cause was assigned in the petition for his removal, except that he had voted for two certain ordinances. It contained no charge of corruption or misdemeanor in office, or any official misconduct. On August 8, 1904, the city clerk delivered the petition to the city council with the following certificate:

"August 8, 1904. To the Honorable Council of the City of Los Angeles—Gentlemen: I beg to report that on the 1st day of August, 1904, a petition was filed with me demanding the recall of J. P. Davenport, a member of the city council for the Sixth Ward. The entire vote cast for all candidates for office of councilman in the Sixth Ward at the last general municipal election was 2864. That I have examined and from the Great Register ascertained whether or not said petition was signed by the requisite number of qualified electors, and as a result of said examination I find that said petition is signed by 784 electors entitled to vote for a successor to said councilman in the Sixth Ward, and I hereby certify that said amended petition is sufficient. The 514 names were compared with the duplicate affidavits of registration and the balance with the originals. Respectfully, H. J. Lelande, City Clerk."

Thereafter the said council ordered an election to be held on September 16, 1904, in the said Sixth Ward, for the purpose of removing petitioner and electing his successor, and such election was held on said date, and at said election said Arthur D. Houghton received the largest number of votes as councilman from said Sixth Ward. On September 20, 1904, the council canvassed the votes cast at such election, and declared said Houghton elected, and since then the council have recognized Houghton as councilman for the Sixth Ward in place of petitioner, and have refused the latter a seat as a member of their body, and defendants the auditor and treasurer have refused to draw a warrant or to pay the same for petitioner's salary for said September. Under the charter the salary of a councilman is $1,200 per annum, payable in monthly installments of $100. The charter provides that the qualifications of an elector for a city office shall be the same as those prescribed by the state laws for electors at a general election, and that the city elections shall be held and conducted in accordance with the provisions of the laws of the state for holding general elections.

Upon the facts and conditions above stated, petitioner, by his counsel, contends on many grounds that his attempted removal from his said office was unauthorized, illegal, and abortive. He attacks the constitutionality of the "recall" amendment, and contends, not only that it has no place in the general system of the American republican form of representative government, and undertakes to give to a part of the people in their primitive capacity the power to make laws, which resides only in the Legislature, but also that it expressly violates certain specific provisions of the state Constitution which he "lays his finger upon." He also contends that the recall, even if valid, is not retroactive, and does not apply to the petitioner, who was elected and installed in office before the amendment went into effect at the date of its ratification by the State Legislature; and that for the reasons stated it cannot, in the nature of things, apply to members of the city council. Other contentions are also made, which need not be here enumerated. But, in our view of the case, it is not necessary to examine the positions taken by petitioner above stated, because, in our opinion, we must sustain his further contention that the proceedings by which he was removed were void—even assuming the recall amendment to be valid—for the reason that the city clerk did not examine the great register, and therefrom ascertain that the petition for removal contained the requisite number of persons authorized to sign such petition, and because it appears that it was not so signed. It appears from the pleadings and a stipulation in the case, as well as from the briefs, that the petition was not signed by the requisite number of persons whose names were on the great register; although it appears that, in addition to 339 of such persons who were on the great register, there were enough of other persons who had made affidavits of registration during the year 1904, which affidavits had been bound together and indexed by the county clerk, to constitute the 25 per cent. of voters. It is contended by respondents that, notwithstanding these facts, the certificate of the city clerk must be taken as conclusive that he did examine the great register and ascertain therefrom, etc.; but it is not necessary to discuss the question whether a clerk's certificate that he did ascertain the necessary facts from the great register should be considered as conclusive, because the clerk's certificate in the case at bar is, on its face, substantially the same as the stipulation. The first part of the certificate is ambiguous, but the subsequent clause, to wit, "The 514 names were compared with the duplicate affidavits of registration and the balance with the originals," shows what he did, and that he did not ascertain the requisite facts from the great register.

The question involved here is not whether persons had properly voted at a certain election without being on the great register if they had made their affidavits of registration. There is no question here as to the right to vote at an election under section 1 of article 2 of the state Constitution, or as to how far the constitutional right might be controlled by a registry law. This is not an election contest involving the qualification of certain persons who had voted at such election. The question here is the sufficiency of a certain procedure leading up to proceedings for the removal of an officer already duly elected and installed in office. In order to inaugurate that procedure so as to give jurisdictional character to the proceedings which are to follow, there must be a compliance with the provision of the law which authorizes the procedure. The provision in the recall amendment, which is the provision of law that governs in the case at bar, is that the petition for removal must be signed by a certain number of electors whose names are ascertained by the city clerk to be on the great register, and the Constitution does not vest in any person the right to sign such petition. There is no room left for ascertaining in any way other than by an inspection of the great register who the petitioners must be. Their names must be on the great register, and ascertained by the clerk to be there, otherwise they are not qualified signers of the petition, no matter what other qualifications they may have. In Huston v. Anderson (Cal.) 78 Pac. 626, and People v. Worswick, 142 Cal. 71, 75 Pac. 663, as well as in other cases, it is definitely settled that the great register is the same now as it was before certain amendments of the Political Code made in 1899, and that affidavits of registration are not a part of said great register. We need not inquire into the purpose of the provision that the signers of the petition must be persons who are on the great register. It may have been intended that newcomers into a district should not be encouraged to try to upset a former election; but, whatever the reason may have been, we must take the provision as it stands, and it clearly provides that the petitioners must be persons whose names are on the great register.

Under the foregoing facts we are of opinion that the said petitioner was not legally removed from his said office; that he should have been recognized by the respondents as a member of the city council until the expiration of the term of office for which he had been elected; and that the respondent the city auditor should have drawn his warrant for petitioner's salary for said month of September, 1904, and respondent, the said treasurer, should have paid the same. However, as petitioner's term of office has expired, a writ of mandate as prayed for to the respondents who are members of the city council could now have no effect, and will not be now ordered. But petitioner is entitled to his salary for the month of September, 1904, and also, of course, for subsequent months until the end of his term; and it is ordered that a writ of mandate issue from this court in this proceeding, requiring and commanding the auditor of said city of Los Angeles to draw his warrant in due form of law in favor of petitioner herein for $100 for his salary as said councilman for the said Sixth Ward in said city for the month of September, 1904, and commanding the treasurer of said city to pay said warrant.

We concur: SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. None of the constitutional questions affecting the validity of the recall amendment to the Los Angeles charter are decided by the court, and I shall not discuss them. But assuming, as the court does, for the purposes of the decision, that the amendment is valid, I wish merely to point out what I deem to be the error in the conclusion of the court from its own premises. It is held to be essential to the jurisdiction of the council to order an election, that the petition of the electors shall be accompanied by a certificate of the clerk that the petition is sufficient, and that this certificate must show that it is based upon a comparison of the signatures with the entries in the great register (meaning thereby, in this instance, the completed great register of 1902, and ignoring the nearly completed great register of 1904). I do not concur in this view, but, conceding for the present that it is correct, it is plain to my mind that the clerk's certificate, even on the view of the court, is in full compliance with the charter. It is quoted in the opinion of the court, and the criticism upon it is that the first part of it is ambiguous, but that the subsequent clause shows what the clerk did. I think, on the contrary, that nothing could be clearer, more direct or unequivocal, than the first part of the certificate down to and including the words, "and I hereby certify that the amended petition is sufficient." So far it is in exact and literal compliance with the charter, and contains everything that the charter requires. There is no ambiguity and no deficiency. It shows, that is to say, that he has examined the great register, and from that ascertained that the petition is signed by the requisite number of electors entitled to vote for the successor, etc. Where is the ambiguity to which the court refers? I certainly can discover none, and, unless the following clause contains something inconsistent or contradictory, it may and must be treated as mere surplusage. I am equally unable to discover the assumed inconsistency or contradiction. All that appears from the last clause is that the names were compared with the original and duplicate affidavits of registration—a statement not in the slightest degree inconsistent with the first part of the certificate. For every name on the great register there is a corresponding affidavit on file, and a statement that such affidavits have been compared does not, on any known principle of construction, invalidate a certificate that the register has been examined. Both statements may be entirely and literally true, and, if the first satisfies the law, the latter is merely superfluous and harmless. If this view is correct, the certificate was sufficient on its face, and as against this collateral attack upon the order of the council that is conclusive in favor of the jurisdiction. It is of no consequence what may be alleged to the contrary in the pleadings, or stipulated by the parties, or stated in the briefs. If the certificate was sufficient on its face, the jurisdiction of the board cannot be assailed. If the record shows jurisdiction, it cannot be impeached by allegation or proof aliunde. For these reasons it seems clear to me that the opinion of the court fails to sustain itself on the purely technical grounds upon which it is rested.

I am also of the opinion that if the clerk's certificate could be construed to mean what it is held to mean, and what is said to be the fact, viz., that he did not find the requisite number of names of petitioners on the completed great register, and could only find them by resorting to the affidavits of registration from which the register of 1904 was to be made up, the council still had jurisdiction to order the election. The sole qualification of a petitioner is the right to vote for a successor to the incumbent whose removal is demanded, and the council derives its jurisdiction to order the election from the filing of a petition by the requisite number of electors so qualified. This petition must, it is true, go first to the clerk, who, before he submits it to the council, must satisfy himself that it is sufficient. But his decision upon its sufficiency is not final, or binding upon the council, and only determines whether it shall be submitted for their consideration, for, when so submitted, they are empowered, and it is therefore their duty, to determine for themselves whether it is sufficient. St. 1903, p. 575. If this is what the statute means (and it is the construction for which petitioner contends) the clerk's certificate would seem to be of very little practical consequence as affecting the jurisdiction.

But, conceding that the clerk's certificate is essential, and that it must show that he has found the requisite number of names on "the great register," the important question remains: What is the great register to which this charter provision refers? On the 1st of January of every even-numbered year the clerk or registrar commences the registration of voters for the ensuing general election, and the work of registration goes on continuously until 40 days previous to such election. The great register for that year is then completed, and after the general election in November becomes functus officio except for the purpose of determining the right to vote at ensuing local or special elections occurring prior to the close of registration in the next even-numbered year. In case of any such election, inscription in this old register secures to the elector the right to vote, although a new registration may be in progress, and he may not have registered again. People v. Worswick, 142 Cal. 171, 75 Pac. 663. But an elector whose name is not on the old register is also entitled to vote if he has complied with the registration law by filing the proper affidavit, and this right to vote is unaffected by the failure of the clerk —if he has failed—to perform the simple and imperative clerical duty of entering his name in a book of registration. In legal contemplation his name is on the great register when he has complied with the law by doing everything he could do, and when in due performance of official duty it ought to be there. Especially is this so in view of the fact that no delay in inscribing his name in the register affects or impairs his right to vote, or the legality of his vote when cast. His ballot must be received by the election officers if his name is on the precinct register, and the file of affidavits constitutes the precinct register, which is all-sufficient for the purposes of the election, whether the substance of the affidavits has been transcribed in the great register or not.

In view of these conditions it must be assumed that the freeholders of Los Angeles and the members of the Legislature in adopting and ratifying this recall amendment to the charter foresaw, and intended to provide for, the contingency out of which this controversy has arisen; the contingency, that is to say, of a recall petition being filed at a time when the right of some electors to vote for a successor to the incumbent would be shown by the old great register completed in a former year, and the right of others to vote could only be shown by reference to the incomplete great register of the current year. What, then, did they mean by directing the clerk to examine the great register for the purpose of determining the sufficiency of the petition? Did they mean that he was to confine his examination to a book which would afford only partial information, and would not disclose the names of all electors entitled to vote, or that he was to examine everything answering to the description of great register from which the requisite information could be obtained? The sole object of the examination being the ascertainment of the number of qualified electors signing the petition, it is my opinion that not only the old register, but the new register, was intended, and that it was the right and duty of the clerk to take account not only of the names actually inscribed in the new register, but of every name which legally and of right should be there. This is the liberal and beneficial construction which is justly applied to all laws affecting the elective franchise. I do not think we are called upon or justified in construing the law in any other spirit. The people of Los Angeles have chosen to make an experiment in municipal government by applying to municipal business a principle and a practice which obtains universally in the conduct of private business. They propose to appoint their agents not absolutely for a fixed term, but for a term of two years, subject to the condition that their authority may be revoked whenever they have forfeited public confidence by any failure of diligence or lack of capacity in dealing with the matters confided to their discretion.

The success or failure of this experiment is exclusively the affair of the people, who have chosen to make it, and if it is not an infringement of the Constitution it is the business of the courts to let it have a fair trial. It may prove a wise departure or the reverse. If found to involve evil consequences, no doubt it will be repealed; but in the meantime its policy or impolicy is a question with which the courts are not concerned.

O'CONNOR v. GRAND LODGE A. O. U. W. OF CALIFORNIA. (S. F. 3,835.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE — CONTRACT — CONFLICTING PROVISIONS — CONSTRUCTION — APPLICATION — WILLFULLY ERRONEOUS ANSWER — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY — MATERIALITY OF ANSWER—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

1. The constitution and by-laws of a benefit society are a part of the contract of insurance, where the benefit certificate provides that it is issued subject to the laws of the order, and the use of the term "warranty" in the application for insurance in such society, in relation to the effect to be given the answers of the applicant, is not conclusive that the answers are warranties.

2. The rule that all the provisions of the contract of insurance will be liberally construed in favor of the assured and against the insurer is applicable to the contracts of insurance between a benefit society and its members.

3. Where the medical examination on an application for membership in a benefit society made the answers of the applicant warranties, and the constitution of the society provided that the certificate should be void if the applicant should willfully make any erroneous statement, or should intentionally conceal any material fact, the provisions of the contract were conflicting, leaving it in doubt whether it was intended that the answers should be literally true, or only that they should not be willfully erroneous, and, as the doubt was created by the society, the assured was relieved from the obligation of a strict warranty.

4. In an action on a benefit certificate, evidence examined, and held to show that insured's answer in his application that he had not been afflicted with rheumatism was willfully false.

5. Where the parties to a contract of insurance have made the matter material as to an applicant, at the time of making application, having been affected by rheumatism, the only question for the jury is whether he had been, in fact, so affected, and, if so, whether his unqualified denial of the fact was a willfully erroneous misstatement.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Mary J. O'Connor against the Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen of California. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

D. D. Hirshberg, for appellant. W. H. Bodfish, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $1,000 claimed by plaintiff as beneficiary under a certificate issued by the defendant to her son, Richard J. McKeown, on September 3, 1900. The assured died January 1, 1902. Defendant contested the right of plaintiff to recover solely upon the ground that in his examination by the medical examiner of defendant her son gave false answers as to his own health and that of one of his brothers, which false statements it is insisted under the terms of the contract of insurance rendered it void. The case was tried before a jury, a verdict rendered in favor of plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon in her favor defendant appeals upon a bill of exceptions.

The answers relied upon as being false are the answer "No" to the question whether he had ever been affected with the disease or condition of rheumatism, and to the question, "Give as accurately as possible the items of family history," to which he responded, under the item "Brother's age," as follows: "31; health good, living; 33, health good, living." At the time these answers were made the evidence conclusively shows that one of his brothers (Thomas) was sick with pulmonary consumption, and died a month later of that disease; but there was evidence from which the jury would be warranted in finding that the assured did not know, at the time he gave his answer relative to this brother's condition of health, that he was afflicted with the disease. There was also evidence to the effect that in January and February, 1900, and prior to August 27th of that year, which was the date when the medical examination took place, the assured had been afflicted with rheumatism. The evidence upon this subject will be discussed later. Upon the trial the contention of appellant was that under the contract of insurance between the defendant corporation and the assured the answers to these questions contained in the medical examination for membership, and which were also attached to the application for a beneficiary certificate as a part thereof, were warranties, and requested the court to instruct the jury that, if it found that these answers, or either of them, to the questions asked, were in fact untrue, it should return a verdict for the defendant; that under the terms of the contract, as the assured warranted the truthfulness of his answers, the jury was only concerned with the question whether such answers were true or untrue; that, if it found they were in fact untrue, it was immaterial whether they were willfully or intentionally so: that, if untrue in fact, plaintiff could not recover. The court refused to take this view of the contract, or to give such instructions, but, on the contrary, instructed them as follows: "The view that I take of the law upon the subject is this: Any erroneous statement made by the applicant, or any matter which he conceals or omits to disclose, does not, if he is otherwise entitled to recover, operate to defeat recovery of the plaintiff, unless said statement was willfully made, or unless said concealment or omission to disclose the facts suppressed was an intentional concealment or omission." Referring to the alleged facts as to the applicant having had rheumatism and his brother consumption, the court further said: "If you are satisfied that such misrepresentation was so made, and willfully made, or intentionally made, then the plaintiff, his mother, is not entitled to recover. But, if you are not satisfied of that fact, then your verdict should be for plaintiff for the amount claimed."

The first question presented for consideration, and the main point on this appeal, is as to the accuracy of these instructions so given, and this must be determined from a consideration of the terms of the contract of insurance entered into between the assured and the defendant corporation. As bearing on this question it appears that the constitution of the defendant grand lodge provided that no member of the order could receive the benefits of the order—a right to participate in the beneficiary fund evidenced by the issuance of a beneficiary certificate —except on taking the workman degree in a subordinate lodge. In applying for membership in such subordinate lodge it was required that the applicant should submit to a medical examination, make answer to certain questions concerning his health and that of members of his family, and enter into certain written agreements. Pursuant to these requirements, in his application for membership in the local lodge (Harmony Lodge, No. 9, of San Francisco) August 27, 1900, the applicant, McKeown, declared in writing that, "having become acquainted with the objects of your order, I hereby make application for membership in your lodge, and do declare upon my honor as a man that the statements by me subscribed herein are each and every one of them true. * * * I do hereby warrant the truthfulness of the statements in this application, and consent and agree that any untrue or fraudulent statement made therein, or to the medical examiner, or any concealment of facts by me in this application, * * * shall forfeit the right of myself and my family, or dependents, or beneficiaries, to all benefits and privileges therein." Accompanying this application to the local lodge, and constituting part of it, were the questions and answers asked and given upon the medical examination (including those in dispute), signed by the applicant, and certified to by the medical examiner of the local lodge; and this application, thus signed, certified, and also approved by the grand medical examiner, formed the basis for an application to the grand lodge for the issuance of a beneficiary certificate after the applicant had received the workman degree in the local lodge. This application for a beneficiary certificate is made to, and, if granted, is issued by, the grand lodge, and with reference to the application therefor it is provided in the constitution of said grand lodge: "Application for Beneficiary Certificate. Each member receiving the junior workman degree, and applying for the workman degree, shall make application for the rights, privileges, and benefits of the order, and in substance as follows, which shall be attested by the recorder of the subordinate lodge, with the seal attached. Such application shall constitute part of the contract of each member with the order, and if the applicant shall willfully make any erroneous statements therein, or shall intentionally conceal, or omit to disclose, any fact material thereto, his beneficiary certificate shall be void." This provision of the constitution also sets forth the form of application to be used in applying for said beneficiary certificate, and was the one used by McKeown in making his application to the grand lodge. In it the applicant agrees "that compliance on his part with all the laws, regulations, and requirements which are or may be enacted by said order is the express condition upon which" he is "to be entitled to participate in the beneficiary fund." It also contains the following: "I certify that the answers made by me to the questions as propounded by the medical examiner of this lodge, which are attached to this application and form a part thereof, are true, and if it should thereafter appear that I have made false statements in any particular, notwithstanding that I may in the meantime pay all my regular assessments, it is hereby agreed on my part that said false statements shall render null and void forever my beneficiary certificate, to be hereafter issued upon the basis of this agreement and the medical examiner's report attached to this application." Under this form of application the only statements which the applicant makes are that he has applied for the workman degree in a local lodge, and that the answers to the questions propounded by the medical examiner of such lodge, and which are attached to the application for the beneficiary certificate and form a part of it, are true. There are no statements of any other facts made or provided for in the application. The beneficiary certificate which is issued upon such application by the grand lodge recites that "this certificate is issued subject to, and is to be construed and controlled by, the laws of the order." In such certificate there is no reference made to the application, or to any of the matters contained in it; nor is reference made to any particular law of the order which is to control it, or under which it is to be construed. These are the only matters pertinent to a consideration of what the contract between the parties was as affecting the question whether the instructions which the court gave to the jury were or were not correct.

It is insisted by the appellant that the contract of insurance consists of the application for membership in the local lodge, which embraced the medical examination as a part thereof, the application for the beneficiary certificate, which is attached to such medical examiner's report, and the beneficiary certificate. So contending, it is claimed that as he "warranted the truthfulness of his statements," which included those that he had never been affected with the disease or condition of rheumatism, and that the health of his brother Thomas was good, he was bound by the literal truth of his answers in those particulars; that his warranty as to the truth of all answers was the essential and agreed basis of the contract of insurance, and that the only matter for consideration by the jury was whether or not the answers to the questions so warranted were true in point of fact; that under the warranty the truth of the facts warranted was a condition precedent to recovery, and that it was a false quantity and wholly unimportant whether such statements were willfully or intentionally untrue when made by the applicant, or not; and that, under the warranty in the contract, inquiry upon this latter point was foreclosed. We make no question but that, if the contract of insurance is to be discovered from an examination solely of the matters referred to by applicant, its contention as to the scope of inquiry proper for the jury might be correct, and that only the question of the truth of the statements could be inquired into. Parties to insurance contracts, as in other contracts, are at liberty to agree to such terms and conditions as they please, and the courts can only give effect to the contracts as they make them; so that where, in a contract of insurance, the applicant warrants the truthfulness of his statements, and such warranty forms the sole basis for the contract, and it is stipulated that any untrue statement shall avoid the policy, his right to recovery will be defeated, should it appear that such statements are in fact untrue. Under such circumstances it is immaterial that the applicant believed his statements to be true, or that they were made in good faith; and it is equally unimportant whether such misrepresentations were either intentionally or accidentally made. He warranted their truthfulness and is bound by the warranty. Bacon on Benefit Societies, vol. 2 (3d Ed.) § 197.

But the contract of insurance in the case at bar is not made up solely of the documents referred to by appellant. There also enter into it, as an important and substantial element, the constitution and by-laws of the order. This is apparent from the language of the beneficiary certificate itself, which provides that it "is issued subject to, and is to be construed and controlled by, the laws of the order." But, even if there were no such express provision, the general rule of law is that, in contracts between benefit societies and their members, such laws enter into and are considered as a part of them. Niblack on Benefit Societies, § 136; Bacon on Benefit Societies (3d Ed.) § 161; Haas v. Mutual Relief Association, 118 Cal. 9, 49 Pac. 1056; Grand Lodge A. O. U. W. v. Gandy, 63 N. J. Eq. 692, 53 Atl. 142; A. O. U. W. v. Jesse, 50 Ill. App. 105; Robson v. United Order of Foresters (Minn.) 100 N. W. 381; Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 3, p. 1081. So that, in construing the contract in question, there must be taken into consideration, not only the matters referred to by counsel for appellant as constituting the contract, but also the constitution of the grand lodge as the law of the order and as part of the contract. All these papers are in pari materia, and are to be read together as constituting the entire contract. When so considered, we think it is apparent that, in determining the rights of the assured under the beneficiary certificate, it was not intended that the statements made in the medical examination, and which accompanied his application therefor to the grand lodge, were to be considered as warranties, although so denominated. The use of the term "warranty" in the application in the medical examination, and which constitutes only part of the contract, is not conclusive; and even though the declaration is made therein that the statements shall be deemed warranties, yet, if it appears from other parts of the contract that a strict warranty was not intended, such parts must govern. Warranties, on account of their stringent character, are not favored at law. No construction will be indulged in by courts to support them. On the contrary, where the terms of the contract are conflicting, or inconsistent, or are such as to render it doubtful whether it was intended by the parties that the assured should be bound by the literal truth of his statements, no construction will be indulged in which has that effect. The clearest and most unequivocal language is necessary to create a warranty. As the courts are strongly inclined against forfeitures, all the provisions of the contract will be liberally construed in favor of the assured and against the insurer. As is said in National Bank v. Ins. Co., 95 U. S. 673, 24 L. Ed. 563: "When the policy of insurance contains contradictory provisions, or has been so framed as to leave room for construction, rendering it doubtful whether the parties intended the exact truth of the applicant's statements to be a condition precedent to any binding contract, the court should lean against that construction which imposes upon the assured the obligation of a warranty. The company cannot justly complain of such a rule. Its officers prepared the policy for the purpose, we shall assume, both of protecting the company against fraud and of securing the just rights of the assured under a valid contract of insurance. It is its language which the court is invited to interpret, and it is both reasonable and just that its own words should be construed most strongly against itself." While this language was used in considering a policy of fire insurance, the same rule of interpretation applies with relation to life insurance contracts. Bacon, Benevolent Societies (3d Ed.) §§ 198, 199; Niblack, Mutual Benevolent Societies, § 143; Ætna Ins. Co. v. Simmons, 49 Neb. 811, 69 N. W. 125 (cases cited); Fitch v. Am. Life Ins. Co., 59 N. Y. 566, 17 Am. Rep. 372; Price v. Phœnix M. Ins. Co., 17 Minn. 497 (Gil. 473), 10 Am. Rep. 166; Miller v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co., 31 Iowa, 228, 7 Am. Rep. 122; Jennings v. Supreme Council L. A. B. (Sup.) 81 N. Y. S. 99; Robson v. United Order of Foresters (Minn.) 100 N. W. 381; Mouler v. Am. Life Ins. Co., 111 U. S. 341, 4 Sup. Ct. 466, 28 L. Ed. 447.

Applying this rule to the construction of the contract here involved, it must be held that, taking into consideration all its provisions, it was not intended by the grand lodge that the literal exact truthfulness of the answers of the assured to the medical examination should be a condition precedent to the validity of the beneficiary certificate which it issued. Conceding that the warranty contained in the medical examination which accompanied McKeown's application for membership to the local lodge was carried into the contract with the defendant grand lodge, though it may be mentioned in passing as a somewhat significant fact that the word "warranty" is not found or carried forward in the language employed in the form of application for a beneficiary certificate provided in the constitution of the order, yet this was only a part of the contract. Another part of the contract was the laws of the order. While the warranty stipulated for the literal truth of the statements in the medical examination as part of the application to the grand lodge for a beneficiary certificate, and the applicant agreed that any false statement therein should render such beneficiary certificate void, the constitution of the order provided that such certificate should only be void for erroneous statements willfully made, or for intentional concealment of or omission to declare material facts, and the certificate issued provided that the rights of the parties under it were to be construed and controlled by such laws. Thus we have a contract containing inconsistent provisions, one part stipulating that the answers are literally and absolutely true, and the contract void if they are found to be false, while it is elsewhere stipulated that the contract shall be void only if they are willfully erroneous. The provisions of the contract are, therefore, inconsistent and conflicting, leaving it in doubt as to what the intention of the parties was—whether it was intended that the answers should be literally and exactly true as a condition precedent to recovery upon the certificate, or only that they should not be willfully erroneous. This doubt as to the intention of the parties is created by the defendant company, which prepared the terms of the contract, and, under the familiar rule of construction which is supported by all the authorities, this doubt must be resolved against it, as the party whose language it becomes necessary to interpret, and such a construction must prevail as relieves the assured from the obligation arising from a strict warranty. We are satisfied, from these considerations, that the lower court properly construed the contract between the parties, and that the instructions as given were correct.

It is insisted by appellant that the constitution of the order did not prevent it from entering into a contract requiring and providing for the enforcement of a warranty. This contention could only apply if the constitution of the order did not enter into the contract between the assured and the grand lodge as part of it. But, as we have shown that it does so enter, and that the constitutional provision particularly referred to by its language qualifies the express warranty, which, but for such provision, would otherwise control, there is no force in the point.

We have discussed the proper construction of this contract, and the correctness of the instructions given by the lower court, in view of a new trial which must be ordered. The issue submitted to the jury was whether the assured had given willfully erroneous answers at the medical examination concerning the condition of his brother's health and his own previous condition as to having been affected with rheumatism. The jury by a verdict in favor of plaintiff necessarily found in her favor that the assured had, at least, not willfully made erroneous statements as to either of these matters. As far as the statement concerning the health of his brother is concerned, as we have heretofore said, the jury was warranted, under the evidence on that point, in concluding that the assured, when he answered the question, did not know or believe that his brother was in ill health or afflicted with the disease of which he died, and hence his statement to the contrary was not willfully erroneous. Upon the other matter, as to whether the assured had himself been affected with rheumatism in January and February prior to the date of the medical examination, the evidence presents an entirely different situation. In that regard, it is urged by appellant that the verdict of the jury, in as far as it assumed to find that the assured had not been, in fact, affected with rheumatism, or that his answer that he had not been so affected was not willfully erroneous, was contrary to the evidence. We think this contention must be sustained. Upon the fact that he had been so affected and knew it the evidence is all one way. There is no conflict. The assured lived with his mother, the plaintiff beneficiary, and the evidence shows, both from the admissions of the assured and the statement of his mother, that he had been affected with rheumatism during the period claimed, and that he had gone to Byron Springs for relief. There was also evidence that in January and February, 1900, he received sick benefits for several weeks from another order to which he belonged, and that he informed visiting brothers of such order that he was afflicted with rheumatism. Under these facts, if the verdict of the jury is to be considered as a finding that the assured made truthful answer when he stated that he had not been affected with rheumatism, the verdict of the jury is contrary to the uncontradicted evidence upon this point.

Neither can the verdict be sustained on the theory that the jury found that, notwithstanding he did have rheumatism, his statement to the contrary was not willfully erroneous. There was no warrant in the evidence for such a finding. The burden, it is true, was upon the defendant corporation to show, not only that his statement was erroneously made, but that it was willfully so. Bacon on Ben. Soc. vol. 2 (3d Ed.) § 469; Supreme Lodge K. & L. of H. v. Wollschlager, 22 Colo. 213, 44 Pac. 598; Ins. Co. v. Brown, 57 Miss. 308, 34 Am. Rep. 446; Ins. Co. v. Ewing, 92 U. S. 377, 23 L. Ed. 610; Clapp v. Mass. Ben. Ass'n, 146 Mass. 526, 16 N. E. 433. In making such proof it was not essential to offer positive and direct evidence upon the subject. Whether a misstatement is willfully made is to be determined from the facts and circumstances surrounding or accompanying the declaration, the directness and clearness of the question, and the knowledge of the declarant upon the subject of the inquiry. The evidence at bar shows that the medical examiner made particular inquiry upon all of the questions contained in the medical examination, and, among others, as to whether the assured had been affected with rheumatism, and that he answered, "No." It shows that as a fact he had been affected with it for some weeks, and within the year prior to the examination, and that he knew that he had been so affected. It was a matter about which, from his positive knowledge upon the subject, he could not be mistaken, and concerning which he was directly interrogated, and to which his attention was particularly drawn. There was nothing in the evidence from which the jury could infer that his statement relative to this matter was not willfully erroneous. On the contrary, the uncontradicted evidence presented a situation where no other reasonable or logical inference could be deduced than that the statement was willfully erroneous. The statement was erroneous in point of fact, and erroneous to the knowledge of the assured, and the evidence offered no warrant for the conclusion that, although the assured knew the fact, and misstated it in the face of such knowledge, he merely unintentionally did so.

The court will not disturb a verdict where there is some evidence to sustain it, but this is not the situation here. Here there is not only no evidence to sustain the verdict, but it is against the uncontradicted evidence on the subject. The verdict was doubtless rendered upon the assumption by the jury that the statement of the assured relative to rheumatism was concerning a matter not material to the risk—that it was unimportant. But with this the jury had nothing to do. The parties to the contract had made it material, and the only question for the jury was whether the assured had been in fact so affected, and, if he had been, was his unqualified and square denial of the fact a willfully erroneous misstatement?

Some errors predicated upon rulings of the court as to the admission and rejection of testimony are also urged by appellant as grounds for a reversal. The rulings were clearly right, and no particular discussion concerning them is necessary.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HENSHAW, J.

ANGELLOTTI and SHAW, JJ. (concurring). Upon further consideration, we have reached the conclusion that the instructions of the court below as to the effect of erroneous statements made by the insured in his answers to questions of the medical examiner, attached to his application for a beneficiary certificate, were correct. We concur in the opinion and in the judgment.

I concur in the judgment: VAN DYKE, J.

STORY v. NIDIFFER. (S. F. 3,672.)

CROSS-EXAMINATION—ADMISSIONS — COMPARISON—OBJECTION NOT MADE BELOW.

1. Defendant may not, on cross-examination, ask questions as to a matter in regard to which the witnesses did not testify in chief, and the purpose of which is not to test the correctness of their testimony, but to draw out facts which are matters of defense.

2. The purpose of the evidence being to show an admission of defendant that his cattle had done the damage to plaintiff's crop, and having gone no further, testimony that defendant had told witness that he had offered plaintiff a certain amount for damages committed by his cattle was properly admitted.

3. Testimony offered by defendant, in an action for the destruction by his cattle of growing Indian corn on plaintiff's land, to institute a comparison between the corn grown on the adjoining land of B. and plaintiff's crop, is properly excluded; B. having, without being contradicted, testified that his land, with the exception of a part on which he had sowed Egyptian corn, was unlike plaintiff's land.

4. Defendant, in an action for destruction of growing corn, not having objected to evidence of the value of a matured crop, and not having excepted to the instruction placing the damages at the value of the crop when matured, less the cost of caring for and harvesting it, and not having asked for any other instruction, may not, on appeal, for the first time, complain that a wrong rule of damages was given.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by T. L. Story against J. M. Nidiffer. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Welsh, for appellant. J. O. Traber, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Trespass. The cause was tried to a jury, and plaintiff had a verdict for $325. Judgment passed accordingly, from which defendant appeals, and also from the order refusing his motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff was in possession of 40 acres of land in Fresno county under a contract to purchase. He planted about 35 acres to Indian corn. The complaint charges that the defendant's cattle in the early part of July, 1902, "ran and trespassed upon said land, and ate and entirely destroyed said corn, so that the same will not mature and produce a crop, and the same is now entirely valueless." The complaint was filed July 12, 1902. There was evidence tending to show that plaintiff prepared his land for planting corn, and planted the land in such manner and at such time, its quality considered, as would ordinarily have produced an average crop without further attention. There was much testimony touching this matter, and the evidence of plaintiff that the methods of husbandry adopted by him would have given him a crop was controverted by defendant's witnesses; thus producing a conflict on the vital question—whether or not plaintiff would have had a crop, barring the alleged trespass. There was evidence that defendant's cattle did enter upon, tramp down, and eat off the corn in the early days of July, when it was about 2 or 2½ feet high, and in a thrifty and growing condition, and did so far destroy it as to make it impossible for the corn to revive and mature a crop. This evidence was also strongly controverted and disputed by defendant's witnesses. Under such conditions of the record, this court, as has been frequently held, cannot disturb the implied findings of the jury.

Defendant assigned certain errors of law committed at the trial in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence. The first six exceptions arose on the cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses. The objection was that the questions were not proper on cross-examination, and, we think, was rightly sustained. The questions related to the kind of land belonging to one Bridges, adjoining plaintiff's land, and the crop grown thereon. Nothing was said in chief about Bridges' land by the witnesses cross-examined. The questions might have had a tendency, by comparison, to prove defendant's defense, but it was not permissible for defendant to establish his defense in this manner, in violation of settled rules governing cross-examinations. Defendant's purpose seems to have been not so much to test the correctness of the witnesses' testimony as to draw out facts which were matters of defense.

Exception No. 7 was taken on defendant's motion to strike out the statement of the witness that in a conversation with defendant he told witness that he had offered plaintiff a hundred dollars for damages committed by his cattle. Defendant's point is that the conversation related to a compromise, and hence was inadmissible. Such was not the purport of the statement made by defendant. The purpose of the evidence was to show an admission that defendant's cattle had done the damage, and the evidence went no further. There was other evidence that defendant's cattle caused the injury. To exception 9 it may be answered that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury at the close of plaintiff's case in chief, and the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

Exceptions 10, 11, 12, and 13 arose out of plaintiff's objection to certain testimony offered by defendant to institute a comparison between the corn grown on Bridges' land, above referred to, and plaintiff's crop. Bridges had testified (which was uncontradicted) that his land was unlike plaintiff's land, except a portion which was similar, but on this land he sowed Egyptian corn—not Indian corn, such as plaintiff planted. The balance of his land was planted in Indian corn, but was a different character of soil, requiring different treatment, as fully appeared. It was not error, therefore, to exclude the evidence, for it furnished no just or fair standard of comparison.

The remaining point urged by the defendant is that the court gave an erroneous instruction to the jury, as follows: "You are instructed that, if you find from the evidence that defendant's cattle destroyed the crop of corn owned by plaintiff, that the value of the corn when it would have matured, less the cost of caring for and harvesting the same, would be the detriment proximately caused by the destruction thereof." It appears from the record that plaintiff was permitted, without objection, to introduce testimony to show, among other facts, the value of the crop when matured, as a guide to the jury in determining the damage. There was no exception taken to this instruction, which seems to have been given pursuant to the theory on which plaintiff was permitted to present his case. And defendant asked for no instruction presenting any different measure of damages. In his specification of errors of law, defendant made no reference to this instruction. In his specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence, the points are that there is no proof that defendant owned or controlled the trespassing cattle, and that the failure of plaintiff's corn to mature was due to his failure to properly plant, cultivate, and care for the corn. There was no specification that there was any failure of proof as to the value of a matured crop, and other facts referred to in the instruction, except as above stated. Instructions must be excepted to in order to enable the appellant to take advantage of errors in them, if such exist. Instructions in civil cases are not deemed to have been excepted to. Code Civ. Proc. § 647. We do not think defendant should be heard now to raise the question for the first time as to the correctness of the instruction, even though plaintiff seems to be willing to meet the point without urging the objection that defendant failed to note an exception to the instruction. Defendant could have saved his point at the trial by objecting to testimony as to the value of a matured crop. Not having done so, and not having excepted to the instruction given in harmony with the theory on which the evidence went to the jury, we do not think the appellate court should now concern itself with the question. To do so would give sanction to a practice which would abrogate well-settled rules of procedure, and make it competent for the parties to cause alleged errors of the lower court, committed at the trial, to be reviewed here, which that court was given no opportunity to correct by timely objection or exception.

It is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HARRISON, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; SHAW, J.

COATS v. COATS. (Sac. 1,373.)

APPEALS—RULES OF COURT—FAILURE TO FILE POINTS AND AUTHORITIES—DISMISSAL OF APPEAL.

An appeal will be dismissed where appellant fails without excuse shown to file his points and authorities within thirty days after filing the transcript, as required by Supreme Court Rule 2, subd. 4 (64 Pac. vii).

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Anna J. Coats against A. H. Coats. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

E. T. Cosper, for appellant. Dixon L. Phillips, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, upon the ground that he failed to serve or file his points and authorities within 30 days after filing the transcript in this court.

The transcript was filed January 3, 1905. The service of notice of this motion and of the papers in connection therewith was made upon appellant's attorney on February 4, 1905, and the points and authorities subsequently filed by appellant February 6, 1905. It is provided in rule 2, subd. 4 (64 Pac. vii), of this court that "thirty days after filing of the transcript the appellant shall file with the clerk his printed points and authorities, and with it proof of the service of one copy thereof upon the attorney * * * of each respondent who shall have appeared separately in the Supreme Court"; and subdivision 1 of rule 5 provides: "If the * * * appellant's points and authorities be not filed within the time prescribed the appeal may be dismissed, on motion upon notice given. If * * * the points and authorities though not filed within the time prescribed, be on file at the time such notice is given, that fact shall be sufficient answer to the motion." The appellant's points and authorities were not filed within 30 days after filing the transcript, and were not on file when the notice of this motion was given. No order was made, or stipulation given, extending the time. No unavoidable accident or excusable mistake is shown. Not only this, but no answer or points and authorities are filed here in opposition to this motion.

Rules of court are made for the orderly and proper dispatch of business, and must be enforced. Where a party willfully fails to comply with them, his appeal will be dismissed. Shain v. People's Lumber Co., 98 Cal. 120, 32 Pac. 878; McCabe v. Healey, 139 Cal. 30, 32, 72 Pac. 359; Brooks et al. v. Union Trust & Realty Co. (filed Feb. 28, 1905) 79 Pac. 843.

The appeal should be dismissed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the appeal is dismissed: VAN DYKE, J.; SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

McGLEW v. McDADE. (S. F. 3,901.)

VOLUNTARY PAYMENT—RIGHT OF RECOVERY.

One who voluntarily pays the debt of another, without his request or promise of repayment, cannot recover therefor of him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 35, Cent. Dig. Money Paid, §§ 1, 13.]

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Action by J. B. McGlew against John J. McDade, administrator of Anastasia McGlew, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Grant A. Laughlin, for appellant. Chas. H. Hubbs, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Plaintiff brought this action to recover upon a claim against the estate of his deceased sister for $1,234. He recovered the sum of $364, which included the following item: "To amount paid Dr. D. E. Barger by claimant, for professional services rendered to decedent, $325." Defendant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial, and the only dispute is as to the quoted item. It appears from the testimony of Dr. Barger that he performed professional services for deceased from October, 1899, to October 30, 1901, the date of her death, and that $325 was the reasonable value of said services; that he had a claim against the estate for such services, but that it was paid by plaintiff. Plaintiff testified that the doctor wanted some money, and he paid him. Plaintiff did not even require an itemized bill, nor did he have any information as to the correctness of the bill. He paid it without request, and as a mere volunteer. In such case the law will not allow the person making the voluntary payment to recover. The estate was not bound to accept the plaintiff as its creditor without its consent. If a claim existed in favor of Dr. Barger, he should have made it out in proper form, and verified and presented it to the executors of the estate for allowance, or he could have assigned it to plaintiff. In such case the law would not have allowed Dr. Barger to testify as to any matter of fact that occurred before the death of deceased. Code Civ. Proc. subd. 3, § 1880. Here he was permitted to testify in favor of plaintiff. There can be no recovery for the voluntary payment of the debt of a third party without request, and with no promise of repayment by the party whose debt is paid. Parsons on Contracts, vol. 1, p. 471; McGee v. City of San Jose, 68 Cal. 91, 8 Pac. 641; Curtis v. Parks, 55 Cal. 106; Huddleston v. Washington, 136 Cal. 519, 69 Pac. 146.

We advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; SMITH, C.

GLENN COUNTY v. JONES et al. (Sac. 1,322.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—CONTRACTOR'S BOND—RELEASE OF SURETY.

1. Civ. Code, § 2840, provides that a surety is exonerated in like manner with a guarantor. Section 2819 provides that a guarantor is exonerated if by any act of the creditor, without his consent, the original obligation is altered in any respect, etc. Under a contract for the erection of a schoolhouse, the contractor was to be paid one-third of the contract price when all the materials were delivered on the building site. The contractor's bond was conditioned on the performance by him of all things necessary to the erection of the building, according to the contract. Held, that the premature payment of the first installment by the county supervisors, without the sureties' consent, before all the materials were delivered, released the latter.

2. The sureties were entirely released, and not only to the extent of the premature payment.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Oval Pirkey, Judge.

Action by the county of Glenn, in the state of California, against I. A. Jones, Milton French, and H. J. Summers. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants French and Summers appeal. Reversed.

Frank Moody and Wm. M. Finch, for appellants. R. L. Clifton and Thos. Rutledge, for respondents.

COOPER, C. Action to recover damages against a contractor and his sureties for failure to build a schoolhouse according to contract. Findings were filed, upon which judgment was entered against the sureties for the penal sum of the bond. From the judgment they have appealed on the judgment roll, accompanied by a bill of exceptions.

The facts are in substance as follows: In October, 1902, defendant Jones entered into a written contract with plaintiff, by the terms of which Jones was to furnish all material and construct for plaintiff a high-school building in the town of Willows, in the said county, for the sum of $5,580, to be paid as follows: $1,860 when Jones shall have delivered all material for said building on the building site; $1,860 when the roof is on; and the balance, $1,860, on full completion and acceptance of the building. Plaintiff required and Jones gave a bond in the sum of $2,500, with appellants as sureties. This bond referred to the contract, plans, and specifications, and was conditioned that Jones should "do and perform all things necessary to the erection of said high-school building according to the said plans and specifications above referred to, and according to the contract of even date herewith." In November, 1902, Jones had delivered the rough lumber and a portion of the materials on the building site, and he then applied to plaintiff, through its board of supervisors, and was paid the first payment, $1,860. This payment was prematurely made without the consent of appellants; and, at the time it was made, the materials that had been delivered on the site did not exceed in value $1,900, and the total value of the materials necessary for the construction of the building was about $5,000. The chairman of plaintiff's board of supervisors testified that Jones came before the board and wanted the contract changed. "He asked the board if there could not be some change made, wherein he would not have to place it [the material] there. My recollection is that the board agreed with him, and wanted to assist him along with the work, and agreed with him that they would make a payment when the rough material was all on the ground." After the payment, Jones pocketed the money, abandoned the contract, and left the materials upon the site unpaid for, most of which were afterwards taken and sold under attachment suits by the materialmen. Plaintiff lost the amount paid, and had to again advertise and let the contract, at an increased cost of $1,070 over the original contract.

The only question that need be discussed is, did the premature payment made by plaintiff release the sureties?

The contract of suretyship imports entire good faith and confidence between the parties as to the whole transaction. The creditor is bound to observe good faith with the surety. He must withhold nothing, conceal nothing, release nothing which will possibly benefit the surety. He must not do any act injurious to the surety or inconsistent with his rights. He must not omit to do any act required by the surety which duty enjoins him to do, if such omission injures the surety. The liability of a surety is not to be extended by implication beyond the terms of his contract. To the extent and in the manner and under the circumstances pointed out in his obligation he is bound, and no farther. He has a right to stand on its very terms. 1 Story, Eq. §§ 324, 325; Tally v. Parsons, 131 Cal. 518, 63 Pac. 833; Carter v. Mulrein, 82 Cal. 169, 22 Pac. 1086, 16 Am. St. Rep. 99. A surety is exonerated in like manner with a guarantor. Civ. Code, § 2840. "A guarantor is exonerated, except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal, in respect thereto, in any way impaired or suspended." Civ. Code, § 2819.

In our opinion, the obligation of the principal was altered in a material respect without the consent of the sureties. The contractor was under the obligation of placing all the materials on the building site before he was entitled to any money under the terms of his contract. By the payment to him before he had done so, he secured the money before performing his obligation. The pressure which would have been exerted upon him to continue in the performance of his contract, and place all the materials on the site, was removed when he received the money. He received it before he was entitled to it, without the consent of the sureties. The sureties had bound themselves upon the assumption that the plaintiff would keep its contract in good faith. We can see no difference in principle if the whole of the contract price had been paid before any of the materials were placed on the ground. In such case could any one doubt that the sureties would have been exonerated? The risk of guarantying the construction of a building, to be paid for when completed and accepted, is quite different from the risk of guarantying its construction if the whole contract price should be paid in advance. In the one case the contractor can only get the money by performing his contract, while in the other he would only pay out the money already received, in performing it. In this case the sureties agreed and guarantied that Jones would place all the materials on the building site, on condition that he was to receive no money until he had done so. They did not agree that, if paid in advance, he would place such materials on the site. By the payment, the hope of reward for further performance was lost, and the temptation to act dishonestly was increased.

It is said in Brandt on Suretyship & Guaranty (2d Ed.) vol. 2, § 397: "A surety for the completion of work to be performed by the principal, when, by the terms of the contract, the principal is to be paid by installments, is discharged if the principal is paid faster than the contract provides. The surety is thereby deprived of the inducement which the principal would have to perform the contract in due time."

The leading case, which has since been followed by the courts almost without exception, is Calvert v. The London Dock Co., 2 Keenes, Chan. 639. There the contractor undertook to perform certain work, and it was agreed that three-fourths of the work, as finished, should be paid for every two months, and the remaining one-fourth upon the completion of the whole work. It was held that the sureties were released by reason of payments exceeding three-fourths of the work done having, without the consent of the sureties, been made to the contractor before the completion of the whole work. The opinion was delivered by Lord Langdale, the Master of the Rolls, in which he said: "What the company did was perhaps calculated to make it easier for Streather to complete the work, if he acted with prudence and good faith, but it also took away that particular sort of pressure by which the contract was intended to be applied to him. And the company, instead of keeping themselves in the situation of debtors, having in their hands one-fourth of the value of the work done, became creditors to a large amount, without any security; and, under the circumstances, I think that their situation with respect to Streather was so far altered that the sureties must be considered to be discharged from their suretyship." The leading case was followed in this country in the early case of Taylor v. Jeter, 23 Mo. 244. There the owner paid to the contractor the contract price before the completion of the building, and it was held that such payment exonerated the sureties. The court said: "The owner, having notice of them [liens], and paying what by the substantial terms of the contract he was entitled to retain until they were removed, voluntarily abandoned a fund which, according to the conditions of the contract, was to accumulate in his own hands as the primary security for its due performance, and which the surety had an equal interest with himself. He must therefore bear the loss occasioned by his own negligence or folly." The cases of Calvert v. The London Dock Co. and Taylor v. Jeter were followed and quoted with approval by this court in Bragg v. Shain, 49 Cal. 131, where it was held that a payment of more than 75 per cent. of the contract price, where the contract provided that 25 per cent. should be paid when the work was completed, had the effect to release the sureties; and in the latter and similar case of Kiessig v. Allspaugh, 91 Cal. 231, 27 Pac. 655, 13 L. R. A. 418, the same rule was adhered to. The question is extensively discussed in a case very similar to this (Board of Commissioners v. Branham [C. C.] 57 Fed. 179), and it was held that where a payment not to exceed $7,840 was to be made when a building was half completed, and a payment was made in the sum of $10,046.68, the sureties were released. To the same effect, see Truckee Lodge v. Wood, 14 Nev. 293; Carson Opera House Association v. Miller, 16 Nev. 327; Simonson v. Grant, 36 Minn. 439, 31 N. W. 861; Ryan v. Morton, 65 Tex. 259; Peters et al. v. Mackay et al., 20 Wash. 172, 54 Pac. 1122; Wehrung et al. v. Denham et al., 42 Or. 386, 71 Pac. 133; Mayhew v. Boyd, 5 Md. 102, 59 Am. Dec. 101; General Steam Navigation Co. v. Rolt, 6 J. Scott (N. S.) 549.

Respondent relies upon certain cases which it claims sustains its theory, but, after a careful examination of them, we are of opinion that they are either erroneous or not in point. The principal one is Hand Mfg. Co. v. Marks, 36 Or. 523, 52 Pac. 512, 53 Pac. 1072, 59 Pac. 549. In that case the first payment of $2,000 was to be made when the basement was built and the first-story rough floor laid. The owner let the contractor have $500 on his duebill and paid him $300 before the payment was due. The contractor built the basement and laid the first-story floor, and received the architect's certificate, at which time the duebill was surrendered, and the settlement for the first payment made in full. The court, in its opinion, quotes with approval Calvert v. London Dock Co., supra, and said that, while the owner "may have been guilty of a technical breach of his contract in making the advances, yet it did not operate to the impairment of any reserved security, of which the sureties could complain. * * * All the money thus advanced was applied on account for materials furnished and used in the structure." In the present case the materials were never placed upon the site, nor was the money advanced used in the purchase of materials for the structure. The fund which the plaintiff should have held as security was given up without the consent of the sureties. There is an expression in Meyers v. Wood, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 591, 65 S. W. 671, which supports respondent, but the facts of the case are not clearly stated. It does not appear that the question was argued before the court, and the opinion cites no authority in support of the statement therein made. The same may be substantially said as to Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland v. Robertson, 136 Ala. 379, 34 South. 933. No authority is cited, and no reason given for the statement contained in the opinion. The case of Leonard v. County Court, 25 W. Va. 52, is cited, but it does not sustain respondent's position. On the contrary, it is said in the opinion: "A surety is discharged by any dealings by the creditor with the principal which amounts to a departure from the terms and conditions of the contract. Thus, where the contract is for work or improvement to be paid for by installments, if the principal is paid faster than the contract provides, the surety shall be discharged."

Finally respondent contends that, if the rule be applied as we have endeavored to show it should be, the sureties could only be released to the extent of the premature payment. We do not think the facts of this case warrant the application of such rule. The contract might have been fully performed by Jones if the plaintiff had not given him money before it was due. After he had received more money than he could possibly have made as profit by continuing his contract, the pressure that should have continued to keep him honest was entirely removed, and he was left, without compass or rudder, to follow his own dishonest inclinations. We think it the better rule in a case like this to hold that the sureties are entirely released. Where plaintiff willfully departed from its contract, and gave the contractor money not due him, and the damages occurred by reason thereof, we do not feel called upon to enter the field of conjecture as to whether or not the loss should be shared by the parties.

The judgment should be reversed.

LAGOMARSINO v. GIANNINI. (S. F. 3,401.)

GUARANTY—CONSIDERATION.

Plaintiff applied to defendant's husband for payment of his note, but he was unable to pay it; and, without any agreement in regard to the note, plaintiff then loaned defendant $100. Thereafter, without any release of defendant's liability for the $100, or other consideration, defendant guarantied payment of the note. Held, the guaranty was void for want of consideration.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by Guiseppe Lagomarsino against Rosa Giannini, formerly Rosa Lagomarsino. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jas. F. Cavagnaro, for appellant. Devoto & Richardson, for respondent.

GRAY, C. The plaintiff sets forth in his complaint a promissory note for the principal sum of $350, executed by the husband of the defendant in his lifetime to the plaintiff. He alleges, further, that he demanded payment and threatened suit against the maker of said note, and that thereupon the defendant promised that, if the plaintiff would pay to her the sum of $100 and not commence the suit, the defendant would guaranty the payment of the said note of $350 and the further sum of $100; that thereupon the said plaintiff paid to defendant $100, and the defendant wrote her name across the back of said note and placed figures thereon as follows, to wit: "Mrs. Rosa Lagomarsino, $450." The plaintiff demanded judgment for $450 and interest. On a trial before a jury plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment for $350. The defendant appeals from an order denying her a new trial.

One of the defenses made at the trial was that the signature of the defendant upon the back of the note was made without consideration. We think the undisputed evidence taken at the trial established this defense. The note executed by defendant's husband was dated January 1, 1898, and was due "on demand." The plaintiff visited his cousin, the husband of defendant, about January 1, 1900, finding him sick in bed, and demanded payment of the note. The cousin replied that he had no money, and his wife, the defendant, asked for a further loan of $100. The plaintiff agreed to make the loan and to deliver the money to defendant's brother. Some two or three days thereafter defendant's brother called on plaintiff and received the $100. This must have been either the day before or on the same day that defendant's husband died, for the latter died on January 3, 1900. In none of those conversations does it appear that anything was said or agreed to the effect that the defendant would pay either her husband's note or the $100 that was then loaned. Some time thereafter, the evidence as to the date varying from a month and a half to a year and a half after the death of the husband, the plaintiff came to the defendant and induced her to sign her name on the back of the note and write the figures thereon, "$450." The defendant testifies that the plaintiff "came there so often that at last I signed it to satisfy him, so he would not bother me." She further says: "I didn't get a cent for signing that note." She denies, and says that it is not true, that she promised that, if plaintiff would lend her $100 and would not commence suit, she would pay plaintiff the whole amount. She declares she said nothing of that kind. There is no evidence that she did say anything of that kind at any time.

Conceding that the $100 was loaned to defendant, and not to her deceased husband, still at the time of that loan nothing was said about defendant signing any note or becoming liable on the note in any way. When defendant did place her name on the back of the note, nothing was said about relinquishing any right to the $100 that had been loaned her. If she was ever liable on an implied contract for this $100, she remained liable therefor still, after she placed her name on the note. Wherein did the consideration for her act in placing her name there consist? What did the plaintiff give up, or what did the defendant receive for her signature? There was no talk then concerning it, and no promise ever made that plaintiff would refrain from bringing suit on the note for any length of time, or at all. There was no consideration for this act of the wife in placing her name upon the note. The case is similar to Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 211, 41 Pac. 1028, wherein it was held that a mortgage given by the wife upon her separate property to secure her husband's antecedent debt, without any new consideration received by either the husband or wife, or moving from the creditor, is not obligatory for want of a consideration. Conceding, without deciding, that this signature on the back of the note was, as respondent contends, a guaranty in writing of the payment of the note, still it was accompanied with no new consideration. "Where a guaranty is entered into at the same time with the original obligation or with the acceptance of the latter by the guarantee, and forms with that obligation a part of the consideration to him, no other consideration need exist. In all other cases there must be a consideration distinct from that of the original obligation." Civ. Code, § 2792.

The guaranty that the plaintiff seeks here to uphold was of the husband's antecedent debt. "No new consideration was given at the time it was executed. The wife received nothing; the husband received nothing; the creditor parted with nothing. The instrument was, therefore, no more than a collateral security given for an old debt of the husband." Chaffee v. Browne, supra. If it were shown that the wife, by placing her signature upon the note, had secured the cancellation of her indebtedness for the $100 loaned, then there might be some ground for saying that there was a consideration for her act; but this is not shown. Neither is it shown that the signature and the loan of the $100 were parts of the same transaction; but, on the contrary, the evidence shows that they were entirely separate and distinct, and, further, that defendant has in no way been released from any part of the obligation she may have been under to pay the $100 loaned.

The cases of Humboldt Sav., etc., Soc. v. Dowd, 137 Cal. 408, 70 Pac. 274, and Whelan v. Swain, 132 Cal. 390, 64 Pac. 560, are to be distinguished from the case at bar in this: In the first of these cases there was an application in writing to plaintiff "for a renewal loan of $3,500 for the term of two years." This application was granted, and the opinion in the case proceeds upon the theory that the new note and mortgage in effect extinguished the old note and mortgage. The court says: "If the plaintiff had attempted to bring suit upon the original note before the maturity of the note in the suit at bar, the court would have held that the transaction as to the new note and mortgage was an agreement to forbear." Of course, the "renewal" of the note and mortgage consisted in giving a new note and mortgage, and had the effect to extinguish the old note and mortgage. The extinguishment of one obligation is always a good consideration for another obligation. So in the second case (Whelan v. Swain, supra) the old note was surrendered, and this was held to be a good consideration. Nothing was surrendered in the case at bar. No obligation was extinguished, and no right to bring immediate action relinquished.

In the foregoing opinion we have assumed that the $100 was loaned by plaintiff to defendant, but this assumption was only for the purposes of the argument. It is unnecessary to decide appellant's contention that the $100 was loaned to the husband, and not to the wife, and we do not in this opinion mean to intimate what our decision would be if we were forced to decide that question. Nor do we wish to be understood as holding that in law the writing of defendant's name on the back of her husband's note amounted to a guaranty of the note, even if a consideration had been shown. We only assume the law in these respects to be as contended by respondent, and, notwithstanding this assumption, for the other reasons given, advise that the order denying a new trial be reversed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; HARRISON, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order denying a new trial is reversed: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; SHAW, J.

COTHRAN v. COOK, Auditor. (Sac. 1,235.)

CENSUS—TAKING BY COUNTY SUPERVISORS—JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—SALARY.

1. County Government Act, § 25, subd. 12½ (St. 1897, p. 460, c. 277), authorizing the board of supervisors to cause the census of a township to be taken, and providing that upon compliance with certain conditions such census shall be the official census of the township, does not empower the board of supervisors to declare by ordinance that the population of a township is a certain number, without any previous census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the township, and such an ordinance is not evidence of the population of the township in respect to which it is enacted.

2. Under the County Government Act, § 196, subd. 13 (St. 1901, p. 775, c. 234), fixing the salaries of justices of the peace of counties of the thirty-ninth class in townships having a population of less than 3,500 and over 2,000 at $75 per month, a justice of the peace in a township in a thirty-ninth class county having at the last decennial census a population of about 3,200 is entitled to receive but $75 per month, in the absence of evidence showing an increase in the population of the township subsequent to the census.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by C. S. Cothran against W. H. Cook, as auditor of Merced county. From a judgment denying the writ, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. S. Wilson and J. F. McSwain, for appellant. Frank H. Farrar, for respondent.

HARRISON, C. The appellant was the duly elected and acting justice of the peace of Judicial Township No. 3 of the county of Merced from the first Monday after the 1st day of January, 1903, and performed the duties of that office during the month of April of that year. On the 1st day of May he demanded of the respondent, who was the auditor of that county, that he draw his warrant upon the treasurer in his favor for the sum of $100, as payment of his salary during the month of April. Upon the refusal of the auditor to comply with his demand except in the amount of $75, he instituted the present proceeding to compel the issuance of the warrant demanded by him. The superior court denied his application, and he has appealed from its judgment.

Merced county belongs to the thirty-ninth class of counties, and section 196, subd. 13 of the county government act in force during the year 1903 (St. 1901, p. 775, c. 234), provides that justices of the peace of counties of that class in townships having a population of more than 3,500 shall receive a salary, for all services rendered by them in criminal cases, of $100 per month, payable monthly; and in townships having a population of less than 3,500 and more than 2,000, $75 per month. At the hearing in the superior court it was admitted that the census taken by the United States in 1900 showed the population of judicial township No. 3 to be 3,233, and that no census of its population had since been taken; that on June 12, 1901, said township was by an ordinance of the board of supervisors of the county divided, and that out of a portion of its territory another judicial township had been formed, and had since existed as so formed. March 11, 1903, the board of supervisors passed the following ordinance, viz.: "An ordinance fixing and determining the population of Judicial Township No. 3, county of Merced, state of California. The board of supervisors of Merced county do ordain as follows: The population of Judicial Township No. 3 of the county of Merced, state of California, is by the board of supervisors of the county of Merced, state of California, found and declared to have been 3,525 on the 31st day of October, A. D. 1902, and it is further by said board found and declared that the population of said Judicial Township No. 3 ever since said date has been and is now of a greater number than 3,525." It is admitted that prior to the passage of this ordinance no petition had been presented to the board of supervisors for taking the census of said township for the purpose of ascertaining its population, and it was also admitted that the above ordinance was adopted without any census of said township having first been taken, and that the population thereof, as declared by said ordinance, was based solely and alone upon the opinions of the members of said board of supervisors as to what the population of said township then was. The petitioner offered the above ordinance in evidence, and it was excluded by the court upon the objection of the defendant that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and that the board of supervisors had no jurisdiction to pass an ordinance declaring the population of said township, without first causing a census thereof to be taken.

Section 25, subd. 12½, of the county government act then in force (St. 1897, p. 460, c. 277), authorizes a board of supervisors under certain circumstances to cause the census of a township to be taken, and declares that upon compliance with the conditions therein stated such census shall be the "official" census of the township; but we have not been cited to any statutory provision under which a board of supervisors may determine or declare by its ordinance the population of a township without any previous census or enumeration of the inhabitants of such township; and it is very clear that without such authority an ordinance of that nature is entitled to no more consideration as evidence of the population of such township than would be a similar declaration by any other body of individuals. It would have no higher rank as evidence than hearsay. The action of the court in excluding the ordinance from evidence must therefore be sustained.

By the terms of the county government act the appellant was not entitled to receive a salary of $100 a month unless the township for which he was elected had a population of 3,500. It was therefore an essential element, in establishing his right to the relief which he seeks in this proceeding, to show that the population of the township amounted to that number. The only evidence before the court upon this point was that afforded by the census of 1900, which showed that in that year its population was only 3,233. There is no presumption that the population of the township was any greater during the month of April, 1903, or at the date of the aforesaid ordinance, than it was at the time of the census in 1900, and the admission that since that date another judicial township had been carved out of its territory would lead to the inference that the population, as shown by that census, had been diminished. Upon the evidence before the court it could have rendered no other judgment than to deny the plaintiff's application.

The right of the appellant to receive a salary of $75 per month is not involved in this proceeding.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; SHAW, J.

In re SEAMAN'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,302.)

ALBRIGHT et al. v. NORTH et al.

WILLS—EXECUTION—SUBSCRIPTION BY TESTATOR—SUBSCRIPTION AT THE END—STATUTES—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

1. For the purpose of determining whether a will has been executed in proper manner, the intention of the testator in executing it is entitled to no consideration.

2. An alleged will was written on a printed form consisting of four pages folded in the middle, as ordinary legal cap. The dispositive parts of the will were written on the blank portion of the first page, and on about one-fourth of the blank portion of the second page. The printed form was prepared to be twice folded from the top to the bottom, and across the face of the paper, as so folded, and at the top thereof, was testator's signature. Held, that the will was invalid, as not fulfilling the requirements of Civ. Code, § 1276, requiring every will, other than nuncupative or olographic, to be subscribed at the end thereof by the testator.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Proceedings for the probate of a paper purporting to be the last will and testament of Henry Seaman, deceased. From a judgment denying the application for probate, Louisa Albright and others appeal. Affirmed.

N. A. Hawkins and Phil Bruton, for appellants. H. H. North, E. M. North, George R. Lovejoy, G. V. Martin, Geo. Clark, and W. A. Anderson, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. A document purporting to be the last will and testament of Henry Seaman, deceased, was presented to the superior court, and an application for its probate was denied upon the ground that it had not been properly executed, in that the name of the testator was not subscribed at the end thereof. From the judgment thus entered, the present appeal has been taken.

The instrument was written upon a printed form or blank consisting of four pages folded in the middle, like ordinary legal cap. Upon the upper portion of the first page was a printed heading and introduction, occupying about one-fourth of the page. In the printed form the remainder of that page and the entire second page were left blank. The dispositive parts of the will were written upon the blank portion of the first page and about one-fourth of the blank portion of the second page, and at the close thereof a line was drawn in red ink transversely to the bottom of the second page. At the top of the third page there was printed a form for the appointment of an executor, and a clause revoking all former wills, and immediately after this a testimonium clause, underneath which, and extending to a little below the middle of the page, was printed an attestation clause. The blanks left for the name of an executor and for the attestation of the will were left unfilled. The remainder of the third page and the first or upper half of the fourth page are blank. The printed form was prepared to be twice folded from the bottom to the top, and across the face of the paper as thus folded, and at the top thereof, were the printed words: "The Last Will And Testament of," under which the scrivener had written, "Henry Seaman." Blank forms for a date and for filing the instrument with the clerk were printed underneath this, the whole occupying the upper half of this outside face of the paper when folded. Underneath this printed matter was written, "Henry Seaman," and underneath his name the word "witness," and underneath that the names, "M. O. Wyatt, J. H. Wright." The remainder of the fourth page was blank. It was shown at the hearing that the decedent had written his name at that place in intended execution of his will, and that at his request Messrs. Wyatt and Wright had signed their names as witnesses thereto. It was also shown that, with the exception of these signatures, the instrument is in the same condition as it was when the decedent signed his name thereto.

The right to make a testamentary disposition of one's property is purely of statutory creation, and is available only upon a compliance with the requirements of the statute. The formalities which the Legislature has prescribed for the execution of a will are essential to its validity, and cannot be disregarded. The mode so prescribed is the measure for the exercise of the right, and the heir can be deprived of his inheritance only by a compliance with this mode. For the purpose of determining whether a will has been properly executed, the intention of the testator in executing it is entitled to no consideration. For that purpose only the intention of the Legislature, as expressed in the language of the statute, can be considered by the court, and whether the will, as presented, shows a compliance with the statute. Estate of Walker, 110 Cal. 387, 42 Pac. 815, 30 L. R. A. 460, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104.

Section 1276, Civ. Code, requires every will, other than nuncupative or olographic, to be "subscribed at the end thereof" by the testator, in the presence of two attesting witnesses, each of whom must, in his presence and at his request, sign his name as a witness "at the end of the will." This section is from the Revised Statutes of New York, adopted by that state in 1830. These provisions are incorporated into the Civil Code prepared for adoption by that state by David Dudley Field, and, in their report of a Civil Code to the Legislature of 1871, the code commissioners of this state refer to this Code as the source of the section. In considering the section the decisions of that state upon the same question are therefore entitled to great consideration. A similar statute was enacted in England in 1837 (St. 1 Vic. c. 26), but the decisions under that statute as to what constitutes the "end" of a will are inconsistent and contradictory. In the earlier cases the statute received a very liberal construction in reference to the amount or extent of blank space that might be left between the termination of the will and the signature of the testator, but afterwards the same judge who gave this construction, as did also the Privy Council in affirming his judgment, stated that he felt it necessary to construe the act more strictly, on the ground that the provision was intended to prevent any addition being made to the will after the deceased had executed it (Smee v. Bryer, 1 Robt. Eccl. 616; Williams on Executors, *67); and the statute was construed as requiring the name to be written immediately after the termination of the testamentary provisions, without any space whatever between them. It was in view of these different constructions of the statute that in 1852 Parliament passed an explanatory act (St. 15 Vic. c. 24) known as "Lord St. Leonard's Act," which provided that the will should be valid "if the signature be so placed at or after or following or under or beside or opposite to the end of the will, that it should be apparent on the face of the will that the testator intended to give effect by such his signature to the writing signed as his will," and that no such will should be affected by the circumstance that "a blank space shall intervene between the concluding end of the will and the signature," etc.; thus permitting an inquiry into the intention of the testator, contrary to the rule on that subject in this state. The provisions of this act are so directly opposed to section 1276, Civ. Code, that the decisions thereunder are not entitled to any consideration in interpreting the section. Estate of Walker, 110 Cal. 387, 42 Pac. 815, 30 L. R. A. 460, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104. See, also, Matter of Conway's Will, 124 N. Y. 455, 26 N. E. 1028, 11 L. R. A. 796.

The provision that the will must be subscribed at the end thereof requires the testator's name to be written at the termination of the testamentary provisions which he makes in the instrument. The "will" at whose end the name is to be subscribed is not the sheet of paper or other material upon which these testamentary provisions are written, but it is the declaration which the testator has written thereon for such testamentary disposition, and the "end thereof" is not the foot or physical end of the sheet of paper upon which the "will" is written, but is the physical termination of the testamentary provisions which constitute the will. "The act of authentication must take place at the termination of the testamentary disposition." McGuire v. Kerr, 2 Bradf. Sur. 244. "To say that, where the name is, there is the end of the will, is not to observe the statute. That requires that, where the end of the will is, there shall be the name. It is to make a new law to say that, when we find the name, there is the end of the will. The instrument offered is to be scanned to learn where is the end of it, as a completed whole, and at the end thus found must the name of the testator be subscribed." Sisters of Charity v. Kelly, 67 N. Y. 409; Matter of O'Neil's Will, 91 N. Y. 522; Matter of Andrews, 162 N. Y. 1, 56 N. E. 529, 48 L. R. A. 662, 76 Am. St. Rep. 294.

The requirement that the name shall be subscribed "at" the end of the will is not satisfied by having that name written at any place "after" the termination of the written matter, irrespective of the relation which such place bears to the concluding portion of the will. This provision does not, however, of necessity, require that it shall be in immediate juxtaposition with the concluding words of the instrument, but that it shall be so near thereto as to afford a reasonable inference that the testator thereby intended to indicate an authentication of the instrument as a completed expression of his testamentary purposes. It must appear upon the face of the instrument not only that he intended to place it at the end of his testamentary provisions, but that he has in fact placed it in such proximity thereto as to constitute a substantial compliance with this requirement of the statute. While a slight space, such as a single line, or even more, might be left blank between the written matter and the name, without impairing the validity of the will, yet to leave blank an entire page between the two would indicate a disregard of the requirements of the statute, whether resulting from ignorance or intention, which would prevent its admission to probate. See Soward v. Soward, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 126.

Appellants have cited the case of Gilman's Will, 38 Barb. 364, in which the written matter of the will terminated four lines above the bottom of the page where the testator signed his name, and in which the court said: "An instrument is signed at the end when nothing intervenes between the instrument and the subscription. The place named in the statute is the end. The end of an instrument in writing commences and continues until something else or some other writing occurs." This language may have been appropriate to the will then before the court, but, as a construction to be given to the statute, it does not meet with our approval, and is, moreover, inconsistent with the construction given in the above cases cited from the Court of Appeals of that state. Particularly do we dissent from the definition of "end" as given in the last sentence of the quotation.

The formalities which the Legislature has prescribed for the execution of wills are to provide against false and fraudulent wills, and to afford means of determining their authenticity. A very evident purpose of requiring the testator's name to be subscribed at the end of the will is not only that it may thereby appear upon the face of the instrument that the testamentary purpose which is expressed therein is a completed act, but also to prevent any opportunity for fraudulent or other interpolations between the written matter and the signature. McGuire v. Kerr, 2 Bradf. Sur. 244; Matter of O'Neil's Will, 91 N. Y. 516; Matter of Andrews' Will, 43 App. Div. 394, 60 N. Y. Supp. 141; s. c., affirmed, 162 N. Y. 1, 56 N. E. 529, 48 L. R. A. 662, 76 Am. St. Rep. 294; Matter of Hewitt's Will, 91 N. Y. 261; Matter of Conway's Will, 124 N. Y. 455, 26 N. E. 1028, 11 L. R. A. 796; Soward v. Soward, 1 Duv. (Ky.) 126; Ramsey v. Ramsey, 13 Grat. 664, 70 Am. Dec. 438; Warwick v. Warwick, 86 Va. 596, 10 S. E. 843, 6 L. R. A. 775; Wineland's Appeal, 118 Pa. 37, 12 Atl. 301, 4 Am. St. Rep. 571.

"The statutory provision requiring the subscription of the name to be at the end is a wholesome one, and was adopted to remedy real or threatened evils. It should not be frittered away by exceptions" (Sisters of Charity v. Kelly, 67 N. Y. 409) "or by judicial construction" (Matter of Whitney, 153 N. Y. 259, 47 N. E. 272, 60 Am. St. Rep. 616), "or defeated by lax interpretation" (Glancy v. Glancy, 17 Ohio St. 134). "The purpose of the law which requires the subscription to be at the end of the will is to prevent fraudulent additions to a will before or after its execution, and the statute should be so construed as to accomplish this purpose." Younger v. Duffie, 94 N. Y. 535, 46 Am. Rep. 156.

It is immaterial that there is no charge of fraud in any particular case. A failure to comply with the formalities required by a statute enacted for the prevention of fraud is not excused by showing that in the particular case under consideration there was no fraud. The statute in question was enacted to protect the wills of the dead from alteration. If opportunity for such alteration is permitted, the fraud may be so deftly accomplished as to prevent its discovery, and for this reason the construction to be given the statute should be such as will control the execution of all wills. "The legislative intent was doubtless to guard against fraud and uncertainty in the testamentary disposition of property by prescribing fixed and certain rules by which to determine the validity of all instruments purporting to be wills of deceased persons." Matter of the Will of O'Neil, 91 N. Y. 516.

It is true, as suggested by the appellants, that there is the same opportunity for fraudulent interpolations in the will if the testator should leave sufficient space therefor between the several items of his will. But it is a sufficient answer to this suggestion that the form in which the provisions of a will are drafted is no part of its execution, and that the Legislature has not attempted to prescribed the form in which the testator shall express his testamentary purpose, or in which the will shall be drafted, but only the form in which it is to be "executed and attested." See Heady's Will, 15 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 211; Matter of Collins, 5 Redf. Sur. 20. In Estate of Blake, 136 Cal. 306, 68 Pac. 827, 89 Am. St. Rep. 135, the testator left a blank space of several lines between the items in which he disposed of his property and the items appointing an executor and revoking his former will. These last items were, however, testamentary provisions (Sisters of Charity v. Kelly, 67 N. Y. 415); and, as they constituted a part of his will, the end thereof was not reached until they had been written upon the paper, and, as his name was subscribed to the testamentary clause, which immediately followed these items, it was held that it was subscribed at the end of the will.

A question similar to the one involved herein was presented in Soward v. Soward, 1 Duv. 126. The statute of Kentucky required the witnesses, as well as the testator, to "subscribe" the will with their names, which the courts of that state construed to mean that they should write their names at the close of the will. In the will then before the court the witnesses wrote their names, as did the testator in the present case, on the outside or fourth page of the sheet after it had been folded, and across it as so folded. The court held that this was not a compliance with the statute, saying: "So far from subscribing their names to the will, it may be said with much more propriety and accuracy of speech that they merely indorsed the paper enveloping and inclosing the will, without any accompanying writing or memorandum to indicate the purpose of the indorsement, or showing any connection whatever between the indorsement and the will." In Roy v. Roy's Ex'r, 16 Grat. 418, 84 Am. Dec. 696, the sheet of paper upon which the will was written was folded in the form of a letter, and the words, "David M. Roy's Will," were indorsed upon the back in the handwriting of the deceased at about the middle of the third page when the paper was unfolded. His name was not signed at the end of the writing. The court held that it was not entitled to probate, saying: "It is an unusual mode of signing or authenticating a paper as a concluded act by indorsing the name of the person executing it on the back. Such indorsement is usually made as a label or mark to distinguish it from other papers, and probably it never occurred to the deceased that it was to have any other function in this case." The same rule was followed in Warwick v. Warwick, 86 Va. 596, 10 S. E. 843, 6 L. R. A. 775; Patterson v. Ransom, 55 Ind. 402.

Whether the deceased intended to execute his will in conformity with the requirements of the statute cannot be shown by parol or extrinsic evidence. Parol evidence cannot be admitted to show that the testator intended the space signed by him to be the end of the will, if, upon an inspection of the instrument, it appears that it is not in fact at the end. Evidence will not be received for the purpose of showing that he intended to comply with the requirements of the statute if it appears upon the face of the instrument that he had not in fact so complied. It must appear upon the face of the will itself that its physical execution is in accordance with these requirements. Matter of Hewitt's Will, 91 N. Y. 261; Warwick v. Warwick, 86 Va. 596, 10 S. E. 843, 6 L. R. A. 775; Patterson v. Ransom, 55 Ind. 402.

Under these considerations, it must be held that the testator did not comply with the requirements of the statute in the execution of his will, and the judgment of the superior court is therefore affirmed.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur, and desire only to note a point strongly urged in the argument of counsel for appellants, but not specially adverted to in the opinion of the court. He insists that section 1276 of the Civil Code, like the rest of its provisions, must be liberally construed, "with a view to effect its objects and promote justice." Civ. Code, § 4. I fully agree with him on this proposition; but I apply it differently. His argument is, in effect, that we should give a liberal construction to wills which deviate from the statute in the mode of their execution, for the purpose of sustaining them, whereas a proper application of the principle requires us to give a liberal construction and full effect to every provision of the statute designed to prevent the probate of spurious wills, although in so doing we may in a particular instance defeat an honest attempt on the part of a decedent to make a testamentary disposition of his estate. The evil of occasionally defeating such an attempt is far less serious than the establishment of a precedent which would open the door to the frauds which the statute was designed to prevent. Every statute of frauds is designed to promote justice by requiring wills and contracts to be executed with such formalities and indicia of genuineness as to make simulated and fraudulent writings of the classes defined impossible, or at least very difficult. Such statutes, in the long run, promote justice—which is their sole object—by shutting out opportunities of fraud. Where they defeat one honest purpose, they prevent unnumbered frauds which in their absence would be feasible and measurably safe. It would not, therefore, be a proper application of the principle invoked to weaken by construction the requirements of our statute prescribing the requisities of a valid will. By so doing we should, no doubt, be dealing most liberally with the efforts of decedents who have disregarded the law, but we should not be construing the law liberally to effect its objects. And unless we are to set ourselves up as better judges of the true policy of the law than the Legislature, we should not be promoting justice.

As our law now stands, two witnesses are sufficient, so far as witnesses are concerned, for the due authentication of a will. Suppose that the law should be so changed as to require three witnesses, and suppose a will offered for probate attested only by two. If they were perfectly trustworthy witnesses, every one might be entirely satisfied of the genuineness of the instrument, but could any court admit it to probate? Our law does not require three witnesses, but, in place of a third witness, it requires something else, which itself is a test of authenticity, viz., the signature of the alleged testator at the end of the will, and this can no more be dispensed with than the third witness, if three witnesses were required.

In determining what is the end of a particular will, no doubt, the principle of liberal construction may be applied, but even liberality has its limits. Counsel for appellants is, it is true, able to cite us to a number of cases which sustain his contention that a signature is at the end of a will, no matter how far from the end of the writing, if it is not followed by any dispositive clause. I think, however, that the cases which hold otherwise, and especially the New York cases, are supported by the better reason. The true test to determine whether a decedent has subscribed his name at the end of a will is to take the document as it left his hand, and then, disregarding the signatures of the witnesses, and all evidence aliunde, to see whether it is apparent that his name was placed where it appears for the purpose of execution. Applying that test in the present instance, it is very far from being apparent to me that the name of Henry Seaman was indorsed on the back of this will for the purpose of executing it. In the course of my experience, I have seen hundreds of wills, deeds, and other written contracts. I have frequently seen the names of the parties indorsed on the back of such papers before execution, and I cannot recall a single instance in which any of such documents was so indorsed for the purpose of executing it. The testimony in this case shows that in fact Henry Seaman attempted to execute his will in that way, but this testimony cannot be considered for the purpose of determining whether the statute has been complied with. And, indeed, what the testimony shows is that he wrote his name on the back of the paper because of his opinion that his signature at the end of the will was not necessary. It is unfortunate to the intended objects of his bounty that he was not better informed, but it would be more unfortunate if the courts, out of sympathy for them, should relax the wholesome stringency of the law governing the authentication of wills.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I concur. I am of the opinion that the true test by which to determine whether the requirement of our law that the testator shall subscribe his name at the end of the will has been complied with, and the will, therefore, in that respect, executed, is as stated in the concurring opinion of the Chief Justice. To comply with the statute, the name must, of course, be subscribed after the termination of the testamentary provisions; and, where it is so placed, the mere extent of space between such termination and the subscription ought not to affect the question as to whether the statute has been complied with, if the document, on its face, disregarding the signatures of the witnesses and all evidence aliunde, fairly indicates that the name was so placed by the testator as a subscription, and for the purpose of execution. The extent of space is, of course, material upon the question as to what the document does indicate upon its face. The document in question does not measure up to this requirement.

WILHOIT v. SALMON et al. (Sac. 1,097.)

DEEDS—DELIVERY IN ESCROW—TITLE OF GRANTEE—RIGHT TO GROWING CROP.

1. The delivery of a deed in escrow, to be delivered to the grantee on the grantor's death, immediately vests the title in the grantee, qualified only by the life estate of the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 16, Cent. Dig. Deeds, §§ 140, 141.]

2. A deed conveying land, and the "rents, issues, and profits thereof," was deposited with a third person in escrow, to be delivered to the grantee on the grantor's death. The grantor leased the land for a share of the crops. Held that, on the grantor's death while the crops were growing on the land, the grantee was entitled to the share agreed on as rent.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Edward I. Jones, Judge.

Nicol, Orr & Nutter, for appellants. A. H. Ashley, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action is brought to recover certain wheat and barley, or its value. The case was tried below upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that on November 21, 1895, Jane Salmon, plaintiff's testatrix, owned certain farming lands in San Joaquin county, and on that day made, executed, and acknowledged a deed of said lands in favor of two of the defendants, her son and daughter. This deed was delivered to and deposited with one W. B. Nutter in escrow, to be by him delivered to her grantees therein upon her death. This deed conveyed to each of said grantees a one-half interest in said land, and, following the description therein, contained the usual words, "together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in anywise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues and profits thereof." On August 24, 1898, said Jane Salmon leased said farming land, described in said escrow deed, to one of the defendants, George Salmon, for one year, the lease providing that he should deliver to her one-half of the crops to be raised on said land as rental therefor. The lessee took possession under said lease, and in due season sowed the premises to wheat and barley. On January 20, 1899, while the crops so sown were standing and growing on the premises, Jane Salmon died testate. On the next day W. B. Nutter delivered the said deed held by him in escrow to the grantees therein, who immediately recorded it. The crops were harvested by the tenant in August, 1899, and thereupon the plaintiff, who had been duly appointed executor of the last will of said Jane Salmon, deceased, demanded of the tenant as the agreed rental of said land, and as belonging to the estate of decedent, one-half of the grain raised on said premises. The grantees in said deed likewise demanded said grain as rental of said premises, and as belonging to them under the terms of their conveyance from the testatrix, and the tenant, acceding to the latter demand, turned said grain over to them. The plaintiff, as such executor, then brought this action against the grantees under the deed, to recover possession of the grain, or its value, and, the court having rendered judgment in his favor, said grantees appeal from said judgment.

The only question on this appeal is, who became entitled to the one-half of the grain —rental of said premises—upon the demise of Jane Salmon? Did it go to her executor, as emblements at common law, which, by reason of her tenancy for life of the premises, he was entitled, as her legal representative, to control as part of her estate, or did it pass to her grantees, under her deed to them wherein she conveyed the premises, "together with the rents, issues and profits thereof"? There is no question made in the case as to the validity of the conveyance from Jane Salmon to the appellants. The effect of the making and absolute delivery of that deed to Nutter, to be given to the grantees upon her death, vested the title immediately in them, qualified only by a life tenancy in the grantor, which, from the nature of the transaction, was reserved. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 451, 452, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186; Wittenbrock v. Cass, 110 Cal. 6, 42 Pac. 300. It is therefore insisted by the respondent that as an incident to this reserved life estate was the common-law right of her legal representatives to take her share of the rental of the premises, upon her death, as part of her estate. It is the rule of centuries, which, as part of the common law, and in the absence of any change or modification by our statute, must be applied in this state (Pol. Code, § 4468), that where a tenant for life sows land he is entitled, through his legal representatives, to the growing crops, in case the estate determines by his death before the produce can be gathered. These profits are termed "emblements," and the right to them is given on obvious principles of justice and policy, as the time for the determination of the estate is uncertain. He who rightfully sows ought to reap the profits of his labor, and the emblements are confined to the profits rightfully arising from the annual labor of the tenant. This right to such emblements is not confined to such crops as the tenant for life himself may sow, but applies also to such as he may have an interest in, as rental, under lease of the life estate premises. Tenants for life have the power to make underleases, and, if the original estate determines by the death of the tenant for life before the date of payment of rent by the undertenant, the personal representatives of the tenant for life are entitled to recover from the undertenant the rent in arrear. 4 Kent Com. (14th Ed.) p. 79; 1 Cooley's Blackstone (4th Ed.) pp. 122, 124; 1 Warner, Law of Adm. § 298. So that if, in the present instance, we had to deal with a life estate, such as was usually and technically created at common law, and to which the common-law right of emblements particularly applied, the question would be free from embarrassment. But we have not. Such a life estate as was reserved here by Jane Salmon by virtue of her conveyance to the appellants, and its deposit in escrow, to be delivered to them upon her death, was unknown at common law, and, in fact, could not be so created. Hawes v. Stebbins, 49 Cal. 372. The effect of such a conveyance would be to attempt to create a freehold to commence in futuro, and at common law would be void, though now, under the Code, the creation of such freehold is authorized. Civ. Code, § 767. When, therefore, we speak of estates for life, and the application of the common-law right to emblements as incident to their creation and existence, there is naturally presented to the mind those life estates which were created as at common law by some third person in favor of the life tenant, with remainder over. To such estates the right of emblements always applied. But here we have no such created tenancy. The life tenancy of Jane Salmon was not created by a third person, but was reserved to her by virtue of her conveyance in escrow in favor of the grantees, and the extent to which she reserved such life estate, with its incidents, is to be determined from a consideration of the terms of such conveyance. We must look to it to ascertain whether, by its terms, she intended to divest the life estate she reserved of its common-law incident as to emblements. If she did, that is the end of the inquiry, because the common-law rule cannot be invoked by her legal representatives to defeat the intention of the life tenant, expressed in her deed, as to the extent to which her grantees therein should take the premises conveyed, upon the termination of her life estate.

When Jane Salmon made her conveyance to the appellants, it was for her to determine the extent to which she should transfer her property to them. In reserving her life estate in the premises, it was perfectly competent for her to determine to what extent she should circumscribe her reserved estate as to any of its incidents, and correspondingly enlarge the rights of her grantees. If she saw fit by the terms of her deed to cut off the common-law incidents of a life estate —the right to emblements—by words clearly having that effect and operation, that was her right. And this is what, by the express terms of her deed, she did. To the fullest extent possible, she conveyed to her grantees all her interest in the land, "together with the rents, issues and profits thereof." She divested herself of all existing and future rights in the property, except solely the right to retain the use and occupancy of the premises, and take and receive the rents and profits, during her lifetime. Included in those divested rights was that of the common-law incident to an estate for life—the emblements. Under her reserved life estate the right only of the grantees to possession of the premises was postponed until her death. When she died, eo instante, all her interest in the reserved estate ceased, and, by the terms of her conveyance, what might otherwise have gone to her legal representatives as emblements at common law immediately passed under the terms of her conveyance to her grantees. In her grant to them the language was broad and comprehensive enough to deprive her of all common-law incidents of a life estate, and we see no room for contention that it did not.

The clause in her deed granting to the appellants the premises, with the "rents, issues and profits thereof," is entirely incompatible with any construction which would support the contention of respondent that the right to the "rents" of the premises was reserved to the grantor as a common-law incident to her life estate. To so hold would be to render such clause meaningless and inoperative. It would be idle to suggest that by it the grantor intended to convey only such crops to her grantees as the latter might sow after obtaining possession on her death. They would take those by virtue of their ownership of the land, and independent of any such provision in the deed. They could, however, only take the crops which were sown by her while life tenant, or to which she would be entitled as such, by virtue of such clause in their deed, and it was undoubtedly the intention of the grantor to effect that purpose—the only one which the provision would be pertinent to accomplish, and which we think it did.

While not presenting exactly the same features as in the case at bar, much of the reasoning of the court in Waugh's Executors v. Waugh, 84 Pa. 350, 24 Am. Rep. 191, sustains the conclusion we reach.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to enter a judgment in favor of appellants.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.

BASHORE v. PARKER et al. (Sac. 1,124.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—USE BY WIFE—ESTOPPEL AGAINST HUSBAND—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF WIFE—INSTRUCTIONS—APPEAL—DEFECT IN PLEADINGS.

1. An appeal from an order denying a new trial brings up for review only alleged errors of law and the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, and does not admit of technical objections, which might have been raised by special demurrer to the pleadings, but they may be referred to only in considering whether they are sufficient to authorize the introduction of evidence in their support.

2. In claim and delivery to recover property levied on at the instance of defendant, a creditor of plaintiff's wife, an answer alleging that the wife was engaged in business upon her own account; that she and plaintiff represented to the community and to the business world generally, and to defendant in particular, that the wife was the owner in her own right and name of property of great value, and that plaintiff had no interest whatsoever therein; and that defendant, relying upon the conduct and representations of plaintiff and his wife, and believing the same to be true, made advances to the wife to the knowledge of plaintiff—sufficiently set up an estoppel against plaintiff to claim the property as community property.

3. Representations of plaintiff's wife and of his stepson that the wife was the owner of certain property, not communicated to defendant, and which could not, therefore, have influenced it in extending credit to the wife, cannot be relied on by defendant to estop plaintiff from claiming the property as belonging to the community.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1848, providing that the rights of a party cannot be prejudiced by the declarations of another, except by virtue of some particular relation existing between them, declarations of plaintiff's wife and of his stepson, made in his absence and without his knowledge, to the effect that certain property is the separate property of the wife, cannot estop plaintiff to claim the property as belonging to the community.

5. Where a married woman engages in trade, it is presumed to be with the funds of the community, and the fact that the husband permits her to use his money or property as her own, upon the faith of which she obtains credit, does not estop the husband from claiming the property as against her creditors.

6. An instruction that if the husband permits his wife to use his money or property as her own, and she obtains credit upon the faith of such property, the husband will be estopped from claiming the property against her creditors, is defective in that it neglects the necessary limits of estoppel prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, providing that when a party has by his own declaration intentionally led another to believe a particular thing, and to act upon such belief, he cannot be permitted to falsify it.

7. In claim and delivery, a charge that if any of the property was bought by the profits of any real property owned by plaintiff's wife the jury should find for defendants, was erroneous in requiring the jury to find for defendants generally, instead of as to the particular property which the jury might find was acquired from the profits of the wife's real property.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by John Bashore against B. B. Parker and another. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Charles G. Lamberson and Bradley & Farnsworth, for appellant. Maurice E. Powley, Hannah & Miller, and Nicol, Orr & Nutter, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This action is in claim and delivery to recover personal property levied upon by the defendant Parker, as sheriff of the county, in certain actions brought by the defendant Farmers' Union & Milling Company against Rachel D. Bashore, wife of plaintiff, and James H. Stufflebeem, a son of said Rachel by a former marriage. Plaintiff claimed the property as community property. Defendants, in answer, averred that the property was the copartnership property of Rachel Bashore and Stufflebeem, and for a separate answer pleaded an estoppel in pais against the plaintiff. Trial was had before a jury, and judgment rendered for defendants. This appeal is from the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

Appellant first insists that there was no sufficient pleading of an estoppel, and that, therefore, the court erred in admitting any testimony upon the question. But as the appeal here is only from the order denying a new trial, the inquiry is limited to a consideration of alleged errors at law and to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. Technical objections to the sufficiency of the pleading, which might have been raised by special demurrer, may not be considered upon this appeal. Reference may be made to the pleadings only to learn whether an estoppel was sufficiently well pleaded to justify the taking of evidence upon the matter. We think this defense was set forth with sufficient particularity.

It is alleged that Rachel Bashore became indebted to the Farmers' Union & Milling Company for goods sold and moneys advanced to her; that during all the time of these transactions she was engaged in the business of farming, stock raising, and wood cutting, in her own right, upon her own account and in her own name, in the community where she now resides, and that during all this period she owned and held in her own right, upon her own account, and in her own name real and personal property of great value; that during all of this time she and her husband, John Bashore, represented, stated, and caused to be known to the community, and in the cities of Visalia and Tulare, and in the vicinity of said cities, and to the people residing therein and thereabout, and to the business world generally, that the said Rachel was the owner, in her own right and name, of real and personal property of great value, and of the real and personal property set forth and described, and, further, that John Bashore had no interest whatsoever in or to the property, or in or to the business, or in or to the proceeds thereof; still further, that Rachel Bashore and John Bashore represented, stated, and caused to be known to the community generally, and to the defendant the Farmers' Union & Milling Company in particular, that Rachel was the owner in her own right and name of all this property, and that John Bashore had no interest whatsoever in or to it or any part of it, or to the business so conducted by her; that defendant Farmers' Union & Milling Company, relying upon the conduct, representations, and statements of the plaintiff and the said Rachel, his wife, as above set forth, and believing the same to be true, and not otherwise, made advances to Rachel Bashore; that John Bashore had full knowledge and notice of all the facts and circumstances above alleged, and full knowledge and notice of the fact that the Farmers' Union & Milling Company was extending credit and selling goods and wares and advancing money to Rachel upon the faith of the representations and statements and conduct of himself and Rachel; and that, if these statements and representations of John Bashore and Rachel were untrue, and if his conduct was contrary to the fact, he should not be permitted to allege or maintain the contrary thereof, and is estopped from so doing.

We need not, as has been intimated, enter into any particular discussion of the necessary averments of an estoppel in pais. The oft-cited cases of Biddle Boggs v. Merced Mining Company, 14 Cal. 367, and Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 23, 85 Am. Dec. 157, together with the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 1962 of the Code of Civil Procedure, sufficiently set them forth. While the pleading of an estoppel in pais, or estoppel by conduct, may be regarded as sufficient, upon the introduction of evidence under the plea the court fell into error. It admitted the testimony of numerous witnesses touching business transactions which they had had with Mrs. Bashore and Stufflebeem covering a period of nearly 20 years prior to the transactions here called in question to show the declarations of Mrs. Bashore and her son, Stufflebeem. The contention of plaintiff—and to the support of this contention he brought evidence—was that the property was community property, and that, he being an invalid, by arrangement with his wife she was to transact the business, and he was to do such work as he could about the home ranch; that he never made any representations contrary to this. Upon the part of the defense, as pleaded, it was undertaken to show that the Bashores, husband and wife, had both represented to the community generally that all of the property was the separate property of the wife, and that the husband had no interest therein, and that these representations were made specifically to the defendant the Farmers' Union & Milling Company, and that the representations made to individual members of the community were communicated to the Farmers' Union. When, however, the witnesses for the defense were called, they proved individual business transactions had with Mrs. Bashore and Stufflebeem, and their representations and declarations in regard to the property. These declarations did not at all concern the personal property involved in this action. It was not shown that the plaintiff knew anything about them. It was not even shown that they were in any instance communicated to the defendant the Farmers' Union. Here, then, to the plaintiff's prejudice, were introduced in evidence declarations, not of himself, but of his wife, not made in his presence, not made with his knowledge, and not even communicated to the defendant. By no possibility, therefore, could these representations, whether true or false, have influenced the conduct of the defendant in making the advancements to Mrs. Bashore, and still less could they have tended to raise an estoppel against the husband to prevent him from proving the truth as to his title. As is said in Goodale v. Scannell, 8 Cal. 27: "To estop the plaintiff it should appear that his declarations were communicated to the creditor, and that he parted with some right or advantage on the faith of the information. Not only is this fact not shown, but the defendant has failed to show that the plaintiff ever made any statement on the subject." See, also, Moore v. Boyd, 74 Cal. 167, 15 Pac. 670; The President, etc., v. N. Y. R. R. Co., 13 N. Y. 638; People v. Bank of North America, 75 N. Y. 561. It is too plain to permit of discussion that there can be no estoppel unless the party who alleges it relied upon the representations, and was induced to act by these, and, thus relying and induced, did take some action to his detriment. 2 Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. § 812. Still graver becomes the error when it is considered that in this testimony the witnesses were allowed to repeat the declarations of Stufflebeem; so that the effect was that the plaintiff was to be injured and bound by the declaration of one a stranger in interest and occupying no relation to him which could give binding effect to his word. The Code of Civil Procedure itself succinctly declares (section 1848) that the rights of a party cannot be prejudiced by the declaration, act, or omission of another, except by virtue of some particular relation existing between them. As to the declarations of the wife made in the absence and without the knowledge of her husband, those declarations, of course, cannot be held to raise an estoppel where his title to the community property is involved. Rowe v. Hibernia S. & L. Soc., 134 Cal. 403, 66 Pac. 569; Paden v. Goldbaum (Cal.) 37 Pac. 759.

The court instructed the jury: "If a husband permit his wife to use his money or property, real or personal, as her own, for a considerable period of time, she incurring obligations and obtaining credit upon the faith and upon the belief on the part of those from whom she obtained such credit that the property is her own, the husband will be estopped from claiming such property as his own against those extending such credit to his wife." The instruction is erroneous. Even where a married woman engages in trade it is presumed to be with the funds of the community, and the burden of proof is on the person asserting the property to be her separate property. Manning v. Burke (La.) 31 So. 862; Jacobs & Co. v. Scott, 53 Cal. 74; Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 211, 41 Pac. 1028. The instruction, moreover, eliminates from consideration the necessary elements of an estoppel as laid down by subdivision 3 of section 1962, Code of Civil Procedure.

The court further instructed the jury: "If you believe from the evidence that any of the property involved in this action grew out of, or was bought by the rents, issues, or profits of any real property owned by Mrs. Bashore, it is your duty to find for the defendants." The instruction is manifestly erroneous. It was their duty to find for the defendants, not generally, as the instruction declares, but only as to that particular property which the jury might find was so acquired by Mrs. Bashore.

In contemplation of a new trial and of the modifications of the rulings which will be made under this decision, we do not think it necessary to consider any of the other points raised by appellant.

For the foregoing reasons, the order is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

PEOPLE v. MURPHY. (Cr. 1,192.)

MURDER—REASONABLE DOUBT—INSTRUCTIONS—JURORS—COMPETENCY—IMPEACHING VERDICT.

1. On a prosecution for murder alleged to have been committed in pursuance of a conspiracy between accused and other convicts to escape from the penitentiary, a venireman stated that he had an opinion that there must have been a conspiracy, and that the killing was done while carrying it out; that it would take evidence to remove the opinion; but that he had no opinion as to the guilt of defendant, or as to whether he was engaged in the conspiracy, and that he could act impartially; and that, while he would take the testimony of a convict with distrust, he had no prejudice toward him, and would judge of his testimony from his manner of giving it and the surrounding circumstances. Held, that he was not incompetent to serve as a juror.

2. Where, on a prosecution for murder, it appeared that defendant was one of several convicts who escaped from the penitentiary, and that during the attempt to escape one of the guards was killed by a fellow convict, and the theory of the prosecution was that there had been a conspiracy to escape, it was not error to permit a witness to testify that after deceased had received the wound a certain convict joined the procession of convicts, and that he had dynamite in his possession.

3. It was not error to sustain an objection to a question asking a witness as to whether defendant was a good prisoner, and what his conduct had been in the prison.

4. Where a defendant is permitted to prove his character for peace and quiet, it must be done by proving general reputation in the community or communities where he has lived.

5. Where, on a prosecution for murder, the theory of the state was that the crime had been committed in pursuance of a conspiracy on the part of defendant and others to escape from the penitentiary, it was not error to sustain an objection to a question asked by defendant's attorney of a witness on cross-examination whether, if he had been a "stool pigeon," he would not have been in the good graces of the officers.

6. A juror cannot be allowed by his own testimony or declarations to impeach his verdict, except in a case authorized by statute.

7. On a prosecution for murder the court charged that if the testimony convinced the jury, as reasonable men, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant committed the act charged, although the fact might be surrounded in a degree "by a doubt," then a conviction should be had. Held that, while the instruction was not clear, it could not have misled the jury, the doubt referred to in the latter part of the instruction not being a reasonable doubt, and the court in other instructions having fully and properly charged on the doctrine of reasonable doubt.

8. On a prosecution for murder the court charged that if any one or any number of the jury, after deliberating on all the evidence, should be of the opinion that defendant had not been proven guilty by the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond every reasonable doubt, those entertaining such opinion should vote for an acquittal, and should adhere to their opinion until convinced of their error beyond all reasonable doubt; that mere probabilities were not sufficient to warrant a conviction, and that it was not sufficient that the greater weight of the evidence support the allegations of the information, or sufficient that on the doctrine of reasonable chances it was more probable that defendant was guilty than innocent. Held, that the instruction was proper.

Commissioners' Decision. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; E. C. Hart, Judge.

Joseph Murphy was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles B. Harris and John D. Moynahan, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

COOPER, C. Defendant was convicted of murder, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

He was one of several convicts who escaped from the state prison at Folsom on the morning of July 27, 1903. Most of the convicts engaged in the escape were armed either with knives, razors, or dynamite. In the very beginning of the outbreak, and during the first attack or rush into the captain's office, Cotter, one of the guards, was stabbed by one Andy Myers, a fellow convict, and died from the wounds so received. Defendant was convicted upon the theory that he was engaged in a conspiracy to unlawfully escape from the prison, and that the life of Cotter was taken by a fellow conspirator while all were engaged in the unlawful attempt to consummate and carry out such conspiracy. It is not claimed that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, but certain errors are claimed in denying challenges to jurors, in sustaining or overruling objections to evidence, and in giving or refusing instructions. We will discuss those deemed most plausible.

1. The claim is made that the court erred in denying defendant's challenges to the jurors Herzog and Kimball, made upon the ground of the existence of a state of mind on the part of the said jurors in reference to the case which would prevent them from acting with entire impartiality, and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. The jurors each testified in his examination to the effect that he had an opinion that there must have been an agreement or conspiracy in regard to the escape, that the killing was done while carrying out such conspiracy, and that it would take evidence to remove such opinion. It appeared from their examination that the opinions of the jurors were founded upon common rumor and statements in the public journals. They had no opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, nor as to whether or not he was engaged in the conspiracy. Each testified that he could and would, notwithstanding such opinion, act impartially and fairly in the case. Such opinions did not disqualify the jurors. Any man of sufficient intelligence to be a juror would, after reading in the newspapers of the break and escape, be of the opinion that there was some agreement or concert of action among the convicts engaged in the escape. This would no more disqualify a juror than the belief or opinion that Cotter had been killed by some one, or that there was such a state prison as Folsom. The juror Kimball testified that he would take the testimony of a convict with distrust, that he did not believe that convicts are as apt to tell the truth as free men. He said that he had no feeling of prejudice toward a convict, that he would believe some of them under oath, that he would judge of the value of the testimony of such convict by his manner of giving his evidence and the surrounding circumstances, and would weigh it as he would that of a free man. This would not disqualify the juror. The fact that the circumstances and surroundings of a witness would to a greater or less degree affect his credibility is well known to every man of sufficient intelligence to act as a juror. The Code provides that a witness may be impeached by showing that he has been convicted of a felony. If the fact that a witness has been convicted of a felony would not tend to cause his testimony to be distrusted, then the provision of the Code as to impeaching a witness by the record of such conviction would be to no purpose. The court should be careful to see that all a defendant's rights are protected, and that he should not be tried by a juror who is biased or prejudiced against him, or who has a positive opinion as to his guilt, based upon the statement of eyewitnesses or facts within the knowledge of the juror; but a general opinion upon some abstract proposition, in accordance with reason and experience, is not sufficient ground to justify the court in excusing a juror.

2. The next claim is that it was error for the court to allow the witness Klenzendorf to testify that after the convicts came out of the captain's office, and after Cotter had received the wound, that one Roberts joined the procession of convicts, and that Roberts had dynamite in his possession. We think the evidence was properly admitted as a part of the res gestæ. The break at the captain's office, the stabbing of Cotter, the movement through the back gate and on to the armory, occupied only a few seconds. It was a desperate and daring attempt, and all the acts done on the prison grounds were done very quickly. The conspiracy had not been ended and completed. It was then and there being actively executed by defendant and his fellow convicts. During the existence of the conspiracy, and while it was being executed, the acts and declarations of each conspirator were admissible as evidence against his coconspirator. Of course, the questions as to whether or not there was a conspiracy, and whether or not Roberts was one of the conspirators, was for the jury, under the evidence and instructions of the court.

3. It was not error for the court to sustain the objection of the district attorney to the question asked of the witness Klenzendorf as to whether defendant was a good prisoner, and what his conduct had been in the prison. Defendant could not, as a matter of defense, call to his assistance the fact that he had been good at certain times, or while in prison. Many convicts have been good while in prison who were very bad out of prison. In all cases where a defendant is allowed to prove his character for peace and quiet it must be done by proving general reputation in the community or communities where he has lived.

4. It was not error to sustain the objection to the question asked by defendant's attorney of the witness Harris in cross-examination, "Well, if you were a 'stool pigeon,' you would be in the very good graces of the officers, would you not?" It asked for the conclusion of the witness predicated upon the fact that he was a stool pigeon. It had not been proven that the witness was a stool pigeon, and, if it had been, the question was wholly irrelevant, and called for the opinion of the witness as to the effect of being a stool pigeon. It would serve no useful purpose to discuss the various other rulings as to questions and answers of witnesses. They nearly all relate to conversations, acts, and declarations made by the convicts engaged in the escape, and the court confined the testimony to what was said and done on the prison grounds and while the escape was being carried out.

5. The court did not err in refusing to consider the affidavits offered as to declarations made after the verdict by certain jurors. It has long been the rule in this state that a juror cannot be allowed by his own testimony or declarations to impeach and defeat his verdict, except in a case authorized by statute. People v. Baker, 1 Cal. 404; People v. Gray, 61 Cal. 183, 44 Am. Rep. 549; People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 448, 50 Pac. 675. If he cannot do so directly, he cannot do so indirectly by declarations to others, who in turn make affidavit as to such declarations. Siemsen v. Oakland S. L. & H. Elec. Ry., 134 Cal. 494, 66 Pac. 672; People v. Dobbins, 138 Cal. 698, 72 Pac 339.

6. It is earnestly urged that the court erred in giving the following portion of instruction 16 offered by the prosecution: "If, under the foregoing rules, the testimony in this case is sufficient to convince you, as reasonable men, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant did commit the act charged, although the fact may be surrounded in a degree by a doubt, then I charge you that it is your duty to convict." The instruction is not very clear, but we do not think it could have misled the jury. The doubt referred to in the latter part of the instruction was not a reasonable doubt. The court in other parts of its charge fully instructed the jury as to the doctrine of reasonable doubt in the language of Chief Justice Shaw in the Webster Case. The court elsewhere instructed the jury: "If, therefore, any one or any number of you, after deliberating upon all the evidence in this case, shall be of the opinion that the defendant has not been proven to be guilty, by the evidence in this case, to a moral certainty, and beyond every reasonable doubt, those entertaining that opinion should vote in favor of a verdict of not guilty, and should so adhere to their opinion until convinced beyond all reasonable doubt that they are wrong." And again: "You are instructed that mere probabilities are not sufficient to warrant a conviction, nor is it sufficient that the greater weight or preponderance of the evidence supports the allegations of the information, nor is it sufficient that upon the doctrine of chances it is more probable that the defendant is guilty than that he is innocent to warrant a conviction. The defendant must be proven to be guilty so clearly and conclusively that there is no reasonable theory upon which he is innocent when all the evidence is considered together." The instruction, in the identical language here, was given in People v. Anthony, and approved by this court. People v. Anthony, 56 Cal. 400. We find no error as to other instructions complained of. The court appears to have fully and fairly instructed the jury upon every phase of the case.

It follows that the judgment and order must be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed: BEATTY, C. J.; HENSHAW, J.; SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; LORIGAN, J.

(146 Cal. 555)

STONE et al. v. HARRIS. (S. F. 3,996.)*

CONTRACTS—CREATION OF LIEN—CONSTRUCTION OF AGREEMENT.

Civ. Code, § 2881, provides that a lien may be created by contract. Section 1698 provides that a contract in writing may be altered by a written contract or by an executed oral agreement. Section 2875 provides that a special lien is one which the holder can enforce only as security for the performance of a particular act, and of such obligations as may be incidental thereto. The owners of lands, being desirous of reclaiming them, made a written agreement whereby trustees were appointed to build a levee and to join it to an old levee and repair the latter. They were given power "to act as herein provided, or as may be hereinafter directed by a majority of the owners," and authority to assess the cost of the new levee and the cost of repairing the old one on the parties, and it was provided that the debt of any party to the contract under its provisions should be a lien on his lands. After completion of the work it was found that surface water gathered on the land, and all the owners passed a resolution authorizing the construction of a ditch and the erection of a pumping plant, which ditch and plant were to be under the control of the trustees. Held, that there was no lien for expenses incurred under the resolutions.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

John T. Carey, for appellant. Hudson Grant and E. A. Bridgford, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. This is an action to recover judgment for the sum of $434.40, being defendant's proportion of an assessment levied by plaintiffs, as trustees, upon the land embraced in San Mound Reclamation District No. 1, Contra Costa county, and to have the same declared to be a lien on defendant's land, and for the sale thereof "in the usual way according to the practice of this court in such cases made and provided to satisfy said lien," and "for such other relief as may seem meet," etc. A demurrer was overruled, and, defendant refusing to answer, plaintiffs had judgment "for the sum of $275.40, which sum is, by virtue of the agreement set forth in said amended complaint, a valid lien upon the lands and premises." The usual foreclosure sale was adjudged. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

*Rehearing denied May 5, 1905.

It appears from the amended complaint that certain landowners in Contra Costa county, including defendant, being desirous of reclaiming their lands from the tide overflow, on April 23, 1894, entered into an agreement in writing, fully set forth in the complaint. There was an old levee then in existence, and what is referred to as the new levee also partly constructed, and the agreement contemplated the extension and completion of this new levee so as to join the old levee; also the "building up and repairing a certain old levee and thereafter maintaining the entire levee system, reclaiming and inclosing the lands hereinbefore designated." In consideration of the benefits to accrue to each of the parties and of their mutual covenants contained in the agreement, it was agreed that "three trustees shall be appointed by a majority of the owners in acreage of said lands, who shall hold their office during the life of such majority." It was made the duty of the trustees (any two of whom might act) "to execute the objects and purposes of this contract, and when they shall have accepted their appointment they shall, by virtue of their office, become and be the agents and attorneys in fact of all the parties to this agreement, with power to act as herein provided, or as may be hereinafter directed by a majority of the owners in acreage of said lands." The trustees were given power to "select, appoint, and control a superintendent of the work herein provided to be done." The trustees were to serve without compensation. It was agreed that the "new levee shall be fully completed and built up where necessary along that portion which has been partially constructed, and shall then be extended to and built from the point to which the same is now built," thence to intersect the old levee. Flood gates in the new levee were provided for, and it was agreed that the trustees should "ascertain the cost of the work already done upon said new levee, and what it will cost to complete the same to the point of the terminus of said route, with necessary and proper flood gates." Then follows a description of the old levee, with which the new levee was to form a junction. The trustees were given authority "to assess the whole cost of the new levee, both the part completed and the extension to be built as aforesaid, and also the cost of repairing the old levee and of maintaining all levees necessary to protect the entire body of land from overflow, upon each of the parties," etc., and each party agreed to pay said amount upon the notice provided to be given. The trustees were granted further power to make contracts for said work, "and all the future expenditures and outlays paid out or incurred for the purpose of keeping up the whole system of said levee and every part thereof so as to protect the entire body of swamp and overflowed land mentioned herein, and every tract or parcel thereof, from overflow, shall be borne and paid for by all the parties hereto and by their successors in interest in said lands. * * * And it is further agreed that when so built up and completed the said levee system, ditches, and flood gates shall be under the control and management of said trustees." The covenants were to run with the land. "The debt of any party to this contract accruing under and by virtue of its provisions shall be a lien upon the lands owned by him within the reclaimed districts, and shall continue to be so until such debt is paid," and foreclosure of such lien is authorized, "but without further liability" than for his assessment. There are other provisions of the agreement, but, as they do not bear upon any question raised, they need not be stated. The complaint shows that some changes of ownership of land by the trustees occurred, and that plaintiffs became owners and legally elected trustees. It is then set forth that, notwithstanding the maintenance of the levee system above mentioned, it was found that in the rainy season water gathered upon the lands, and prevented successful cultivation thereof, and that it became necessary to erect a pumping plant and to construct a large ditch across the district into which the water could be collected and drained to the site of said pumping plant; that, realizing the necessity for said ditch, all the owners, including defendant, being present, on July 6, 1901, unanimously passed a resolution at a regular meeting authorizing the construction of said ditch by "the trustees together with Mr. Franks, superintendent." "After the ditch is located the right of way of the same is to be conveyed to the district, and thereafter to be under the control of the trustees of said district." The ditch was dug and the right of way conveyed to the district at a cost of $3,550. On November 12, 1901, all the owners, including defendant, unanimously passed a resolution at a regular meeting authorizing the trustees to "procure a good and sufficient pumping plant for the discharge of water to be collected in the ditch now in the course of construction in the district." The trustees erected the pumping plant at the cost of $5,000, and expended $645 for coal to operate the same. It is alleged that defendant was fully advised of these expenditures, and made no objection thereto, but encouraged the same. It is also set forth that large expenses were incurred in protecting the levees; that during the fall of 1901 and the spring of 1902 a large amount of dredger work became necessary, and additional work in the fall of 1902, "upon said levees to protect the lands of said district against the flood waters which came against said lands." It is then alleged that to pay all the said expenses an assessment of $2 per acre was levied on December 11, 1901, and on March 24, 1902, another assessment of $1 per acre, and that the sum due from defendant upon such assessments was $540, and that she has paid the sum of $105.60 thereof, and no more, leaving due and unpaid the sum of $434.40.

The grounds of demurrer are manifold: (1) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (2) That the court is without jurisdiction. (3) That the plaintiffs have not legal capacity to sue: (a) Because it does not appear that they are doing business under the name of plaintiffs or an associate name, or have an associate name; (b) because there are a large number of persons other than plaintiff interested in the remedy, and are not made parties, and it does not appear that plaintiffs are suing for the joint benefit of all parties interested; (c) because all interested parties are not joined as plaintiffs; (d) it does not appear that plaintiffs, as trustees of the landowners, were authorized to sue for or collect money for the construction of said ditch or the purchase of said pumping plant. (4) That there is a defect of parties plaintiff for much the same reasons as stated in the preceding paragraph. (5) That several causes of action are attempted to be set forth, but are not separately stated: In substance, because the assessment for the work on the levees is by the agreement payable to the trustees, with which is united a cause of action for defendant's pro rata of the cost of the ditch and pumping plant, and this latter is due, if due at all, only to the landowners; that the agreement confers no authority on the trustees to levy an assessment for these latter expenditures, nor does the agreement make them a lien on the land. (6) For much the same reason several causes of action have been improperly united. (7) and (8) present no new points. (9) Because of uncertainty in this: that it cannot be ascertained from the complaint what amount is due for work on the levees and what amount for the cost of the ditch and the pumping plant and operating expenses, and for like reasons the complaint is ambiguous.

We do not think there can be any doubt that the agreement covered all expenditures for building and maintaining the levee system. But appellant insists that the resolutions, treating them as establishing contractual relations between the parties, formed no part of the agreement of 1894 by which the trustees were appointed, and that the obligations entered into by virtue of these resolutions created no lien on the land, and did not authorize an assessment to be levied by the trustees, and enforced as such under the original agreement. In this view we concur. It is manifest from a reading of the instrument that the parties thereto were of the belief, and so provided, that the levee system would effect the purpose in view, which was the prevention of overflow of the land by tide waters. Ample provision was made for a levee system and its care and maintenance, but for nothing more. The necessity for a main draining ditch across the district and the erection of a pumping plant seems not to have arisen—at least was not provided for—until in 1901, six or seven years after the trust agreement was entered into. No reference to the original agreement was made in the resolutions, nor is there in them the slightest indication that the cost of the main drainage ditch or of the pumping plant or of operating the pump was to become a lien on the land, or that the trustees should have power to assess the owners or the land for this cost. There was an implied obligation to pay the cost, but no agreement that a lien existed to secure its payment. The lien created by contract of the parties (Civ. Code, § 2881) does not of itself exist "for the performance of any other obligation than that which the lien originally secured" (Id. § 2891). The original agreement was not altered by any contract in writing nor by any executed oral agreement having reference to it. Id. § 1698. As a special lien it could be enforced only "for the performance of the particular act or obligation" for which it was held, "and of such obligations as may be incidental thereto." Id. § 2875. If the owners had deemed the drainage ditch and pumping plant as incidental, they would not have otherwise construed the agreement as may be inferred from their having subsequently, when the necessity arose, passed the resolutions creating the new obligation. Nor do we think the cost of this latter work can be regarded as incidental to the levee system, which was the specific and only work mentioned in the trust agreement. Respondents contend, however, that in the clause giving the trustees the "power to act as herein provided, or as may be hereinafter directed by a majority of the owners in acreage of the land," the word "hereinafter" is meaningless, and should be either rejected or construed to mean "hereafter," so as to effectuate the purpose contemplated, which was reclamation. Such a construction, if made to include expenditures other than such as pertain to the levee systems, would remove all limitations from the agreement, and subject the lands to whatever lien burdens a majority of the landowners might decide was necessary for the reclamation of the land, and this, too, in disregard of what manifestly was deemed by the owners to be the only means necessary to be adopted when they made the agreement. This instrument bears the impress of careful and intelligent preparation, and seemingly was intended, as its terms indicate, to limit the reclamation work to the levee system and such work as might properly be said to be incidental. The means and method being thus clearly pointed out, would, upon familiar principles, exclude other means and methods. We are clearly of the opinion that no authority is shown for levying an assessment upon the land to meet the cost of the pumping plant and the main ditch connected with it, nor is any authority shown for making such assessment a lien on the land and foreclosing it, as the decree does. It does not appear just what the expenditures were, other than the cost of digging the main ditch, the cost of the pumping plant, and some cost in operating it. Manifestly, however, the principal items of expenditures included in the decree, and the only ones specified, relate to the pumping plant and the main ditch. This, we think, was error, and requires a reversal of the judgment.

The other questions presented by the demurrer may or may not arise in the subsequent proceedings, and we therefore express no opinion upon them.

It is advised that the judgment be reversed, with directions to sustain the demurrer, with leave to plaintiffs to amend the complaint if so advised.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, with directions to sustain the demurrer, with leave to plaintiffs to amend the complaint if so advised: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

YOULE v. THOMAS (CLARKE, Intervener).
(S. F. 4,026.)*

PUBLIC LANDS—RIGHT TO PURCHASE—CONTEST—SCOPE OF INQUIRY—APPEAL—AGGRIEVED PARTIES.

1. Pol. Code, § 3414, provides that, when a contest arises between applicants to purchase land, the surveyor general must, if a question of law is involved, or on demand, refer the contest to the court. Section 3415 authorizes either party to thereupon bring an action in the superior court to determine the conflict, and provides that the production of a certified copy of the entry by the surveyor general gives the court jurisdiction. Section 3416 provides that the surveyor general must sell the land to the successful party in the action. Section 3495 makes the provisions applicable to school lands. Held, that the jurisdiction of the court in such an action is limited to a determination of the rights of the parties to the reference, and it cannot consider and pass upon the rights of other applicants to purchase the land, who are not included within the order of reference, and who unauthorizedly intervene or attempt to intervene in the action after it is referred.

2. Consequently an applicant to purchase land, who is not included within the order of reference entered by the surveyor general, but who succeeds in intervening in the action instituted in the superior court, is not aggrieved, in such sense as to give him a right to appeal, by a judgment determining that one of the proper parties to the action is entitled to purchase the land, and altogether ignoring him and his claims by making no reference thereto.

3. An applicant to purchase state land, whose application is rejected, is not in privity with the state, in such sense as to entitle him to object that the parties to a contest referred to the superior court to determine their right to purchase the land have agreed to divide the land, in order to evade the provision of Const. art. 17, providing that land suitable for cultivation shall be granted only to actual settlers in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to each settler.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by W. E. Youle against Mary J. Thomas. Edward Clarke intervened. From the judgment rendered, and from an order denying a new trial, intervener appeals. Dismissed.

Charles G. Lamberson, for appellant. Galpin, Thomas & Bolton, for respondent. James F. Peck, Solinsky & Wehe, and Chas. C. Boynton, amici curiæ.

SHAW, J. The defendant, Mary J. Thomas, moves to dismiss the appeal of the intervener, Edward Clarke, from the judgment in favor of Mary J. Thomas and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The motion is made upon the ground that the intervener is not a party aggrieved by the judgment and order appealed from. For the hearing of this motion the cause was put upon the San Francisco calendar, and was numbered as case No. 4,026, on that calendar. The case on appeal is on the Los Angeles calendar, and is numbered on that calendar as No. 1,543. The case is as follows:

On August 22, 1899, the defendant, Mary J. Thomas, filed in the office of the state surveyor general her application to purchase some 620 acres of section 36, township 32 south, range 23 east, Mt. Diablo meridian, situated in Kern county, stating that the land was unoccupied and unsuitable for cultivation. Her application was approved by the surveyor general, and she thereafter received a certificate of purchase from the register of the state land office, declaring her entitled to a patent upon payment of the balance of the purchase money. On August 8, 1900, W. E. Youle, claiming to be an actual settler on the north half of said section and that the same was suitable for cultivation, filed with the surveyor general his application to purchase said half section, and his protest against the purchase thereof by Mary J. Thomas, under her application, and demanded that the respective rights to purchase the land be referred to the superior court of Kern county for trial. Thereupon the surveyor general duly made an order referring said contest to the superior court of *Rehearing denied May 6, 1905. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Kern county for trial and determination, and in pursuance thereof the plaintiff, on September 25, 1900, produced in said court a certified copy of said order, and filed the complaint in this action against Mary J. Thomas, John Doe, and Richard Roe, setting forth the respective claims and proceedings in the surveyor general's office, and asking an adjudication as to the rights of the two claimants. On November 24, 1900, Edward Clarke entered upon the half section in question and built thereon a small one-roomed house, and thereupon took up his residence therein, and on February 20, 1901, he presented to the surveyor general for filing his application in due form to purchase the said half section as land suitable for cultivation, together with his protest against further proceedings in the respective applications of Youle and Thomas, and demanded that the contest thus sought to be made between him and the other applicants be referred to the same court for trial. The surveyor general refused to receive or file the said application or protest, or to make any order in regard thereto.

Thereupon, on February 21, 1901, Edward Clarke presented to the court, and by leave of court filed, a complaint in intervention in the action between Youle and Mrs. Thomas, alleging the facts with relation to his settlement upon the land and his application to the surveyor general, averring that the land was suitable for cultivation, and stating upon information and belief that plaintiff and defendant had agreed to divide the land between them, in consideration whereof plaintiff was to dismiss the action and allow the defendant to procure a patent under her application. On June 15th the defendant filed her answer to the complaint, a separate answer to the complaint in intervention, and a cross-complaint, praying for a judgment against the plaintiff and a decree declaring that she was entitled to a patent under her purchase. Thereafter eight other persons by leave of court filed complaints in intervention, each claiming as an applicant for the purchase of a particular 40-acre tract of the half section, whose application and protest the surveyor general had refused to receive and file, and alleging that the land was not fit for cultivation. When the case came on for trial, the court, on motion of plaintiff and defendant and intervener Clarke, dismissed these eight complaints in intervention and set aside the order allowing the same to be filed. When the cause came on for trial the plaintiff offered no evidence, and stated that he abandoned the case. The intervener and the defendant Thomas appeared, and evidence was thereupon introduced, upon which the court made findings upon the allegations of the complaint, the cross-complaint of Mary J. Thomas, and the complaint in intervention of Clarke. Judgment was then given and entered to the effect that the action be dismissed as to the defendants Doe and Roe, that the plaintiff had no right to purchase the land described in his complaint, and that Mary J. Thomas was entitled to a patent for the land described in her certificate on full payment of the price. The intervener was not mentioned in the judgment, nor was any reference made therein to his right or claim. He moved for a new trial, over the objection of the defendant Thomas, who claimed that the court had no jurisdiction either of his complaint in intervention or of his motion for a new trial. His motion was denied, and he appeals from the judgment and from the order denying the motion.

We are of the opinion that the intervener is not aggrieved by the judgment entered in the action, and hence that the motion to dismiss the appeal should be granted. It will be observed that although the court first allowed the filing of the complaint in intervention, and followed it up by taking evidence and making findings thereon, yet that it refused to go any further with the unauthorized contest, and gave judgment solely with regard to the respective rights of the original parties, entirely ignoring the intervener. The jurisdiction of the superior court in actions begun in pursuance of a reference to it of a contest arising in the surveyor general's office over the right to purchase state land is special and limited. It is derived solely from the provisions of the Political Code relating to such contests. The sole object to be achieved by the trial before the superior court is a determination of the question of the rights of the two parties between whom the contest arose in the surveyor general's office to purchase the particular tract of land in question. When the judgment of the superior court is given, the state has, by its legislative action embodied in the statute, declared that its officers are bound by the judgment of the court, and that the patent must issue to the particular one of the persons who made the original contest in the surveyor general's office adjudged to have the right. It is not a case where the court has before it a certain fund, or a certain piece of property, to determine what shall ultimately be done with it. In such a case the court, having general jurisdiction in equity, would be entitled to entertain the application of any person claiming a right thereto, and could give judgment awarding the property to any one who might be able to show his right. But in a question of the sort here involved there is no such general power. It is a mere method by which the state determines to whom it will sell its lands, and the parties concerned are the parties who have made the respective applications, and whose rights have been referred to the court for adjudication.

Section 3414 of the Political Code provides that, when a contest arises between two or more applicants to purchase a particular tract of land, the surveyor general or register, whenever a question of law is involved, or when either party demands a trial in the courts of the state, must make an order referring the contest to the proper court of the county in which the land is situated. Section 3415 declares that, after such order is made, either party may bring an action in the superior court of the county in which the land is situated "to determine the conflict, and the production of a certified copy of the entry, made by either the surveyor general or the register, gives the court full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine the action." By section 3416 it is provided that, upon the filing of a copy of the final judgment of the court, the surveyor general or register must proceed with the sale of the land to the party who by the judgment is determined to have the right thereto. These provisions apply to school lands (Pol. Code, § 3495), and they clearly show that the state is merely referring a single question to the court for decision, and that there is no intention to authorize a general inquiry concerning the land, or the determination of rights under applications to purchase made after proceedings are begun upon the order of reference. It would require a special provision of the statute to authorize such an enlargement of the inquiry, and no such provision appears.

It may be conceded that if the court had stepped aside from the decision of the controversy submitted to it by the state, and had determined the rights of the intervener with respect to some independent or collateral matter, the intervener would have the right to appeal to have such unauthorized judgment declared void by this court. No such question is before us. It is the judgment, not the findings, which controls. There was here no attempt to adjudicate anything, except the single question whether W. E. Youle or Mary J. Thomas had the right to make the purchase. This was the only question the court had authority to determine, and the only question it did determine. By virtue of his attempt, after the reference and after the action was begun, to settle upon and purchase the land, Clarke had, and could have, no interest whatever in the question before the court. His attempt to thrust himself and his claims into the controversy accomplished nothing but a judgment ignoring him, and determining only the original contest, declaring that Mary J. Thomas was entitled to make the purchase. By that judgment the state is bound, and it is the only party interested. The only effect of his appeal, if decided on the merits, must be a decision that he has no interest in the question and is not affected by the judgment. He is not in privity with the state, and cannot raise the point that the parties had agreed to divide the land in order to evade the provision of the Constitution (article 17) that land suitable for cultivation shall be granted only to actual settlers, in quantities not exceeding 320 acres to each settler. The state has submitted its rights in that regard to the determination of its own officers and courts, and citizens in their private capacity have no right to intervene. It is only when a citizen is in privity with the state that he can be allowed to question the sale made or about to be made by the state. He does not put himself in such privity by making an application to purchase which is rejected. Kentfield v. Hayes, 57 Cal. 411; Burling v. Thompkins, 77 Cal. 261, 19 Pac. 429; Dreyfus v. Badger, 108 Cal. 63, 41 Pac. 279.

These conclusions are supported by previous decisions of this court. A similar question arose in Vance v. Evans, 52 Cal. 94. A second application by one of the parties had been filed after the order of reference was made. The court said: "The only contests in respect to the right to purchase lands of which the district courts have jurisdiction are those which arise in the surveyor general's or register's office, and none had arisen in either of those offices concerning the defendant's second application." In Berry v. Cammet, 44 Cal. 351, the court said: "The sale of the lands of the state is committed to the executive department of the government; and the judicial department has no jurisdiction of controversies arising between applicants for the purchase of the lands, except in such matters as are expressly provided for by the statute." In McFaul v. Pfankuch, 98 Cal. 402, 33 Pac. 398, it is said: "It is not a question that the plaintiff may litigate of his own mere volition. A preliminary step must be taken by invoking the action of the surveyor general, and the order of that officer referring the rights of the parties to the determination of the superior court is not only necessary to enable the plaintiff to invoke the action of the court, but without such order the court has no jurisdiction to hear or determine the rights of the parties." In Byrd v. Reichert, 74 Cal. 582, 16 Pac. 499, the court says, with reference to this class of actions: "When a court has acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine an action of the kind above referred to, it is evident that it can determine only such questions as are involved in the contest on which the action is based. It cannot determine as to other contests or other asserted rights, and in so far as it attempts to do so its action, being beyond its jurisdiction, is void." In Mont Blanc C. G. M. Co. v. Debour, 61 Cal. 364, the court, speaking of similar provisions of the federal statute with relation to contests over the right to purchase lands from the United States, said: "The action is one in which those only who have filed claims to the land in the United States land office could properly be made parties to the action, which was brought for the sole purpose of determining the rights of possession between such adverse claimants." It has been held that after a contest has been referred to the courts for determination, and an action has been begun, the officers of the state are divested of further power with reference to the proposed sale, and cannot receive subsequent applications. Laugenour v. Shanklin, 57 Cal. 70; Cunningham v. Shanklin, 60 Cal. 125; Wrinkle v. Wright, 136 Cal. 496, 69 Pac. 148.

The conclusion necessarily follows that the intervener has not been aggrieved by the judgment and order from which he appeals. Under no circumstances was he entitled to obtain in that action a valid or effectual judgment with respect to his rights. The state is the owner of the property, and it has declared by statute the manner in which and the persons to whom a sale may be made. No person other than those between whom it authorizes an action to be begun to determine this question has any right to interfere in the proceedings, nor can gain any right when he attempts to interfere. Not being an aggrieved party, he has no right of appeal.

The appeals from the judgment and order are dismissed.

DE LA BECKWITH v. SUPERIOR COURT OF COLUSA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 4,105.)

PARTIES—ADDITIONAL PARTIES—JURISDICTION OF COURT — PLEADINGS—DEMURRERS—EFFECT OF ORDERS—MANDATE—DIRECTION TO COURT —WHEN ISSUED.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 389, requiring the court to order the bringing in of parties without whom a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had, the court should pass upon the merits of a motion, made after certain defendants have answered, to vacate a previous order sustaining demurrers to the complaint interposed by other defendants, and to bring said defendants into court and overrule their demurrers, on the ground that their presence is necessary to a complete determination of the controversy, and that the demurrers were not well taken, where no final judgment has been entered in favor of such defendants, although the time has elapsed within which plaintiff might have amended his complaint under the order sustaining the demurrers, and he has failed to do so, and although he has made no showing of mistake, inadvertence, or excusable neglect, prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, as a condition of relief from a judgment or order.

2. A writ of mandate will not be granted where it appears that the relator has no right to the relief which it is his ultimate object to attain, and that the writ will serve no purpose except that of enforcing a mere abstract right, unattended by any substantial benefit.

3. A ruling of the court sustaining demurrers to the complaint is not the law of the case in any such sense as to preclude the court from vacating such ruling at any time during the progress of the trial, if it deems the same erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 13, Cent. Dig. Courts, § 340.]

4. An order sustaining a demurrer to a complaint is not a judgment, and does not have the effect of finally and irrevocably dismissing the demurrant from the action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 568.]

5. Mandate will lie to compel the trial court to hear and pass upon the merits of a motion which it has jurisdiction to entertain, and which it declined to entertain on the sole ground that it had no such jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Mandamus, § 87.]

In Bank. Application by B. De La Beckwith, as administrator, etc., for a writ of mandate against the superior court of the county of Colusa and Hon. H. M. Albery, judge thereof. Writ awarded.

A. L. Shinn (Ernest Weyand, S. C. Denson, J. W. Dorsey, and R. M. F. Soto, of counsel), for petitioner. Frank H. Gould, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an application for a peremptory writ of mandate. There is no controversy as to the material facts, which are as follows, viz.: An action wherein this plaintiff was plaintiff and various persons and corporations were defendants was pending in the superior court of Colusa county, the object thereof being to have it determined that the plaintiff's intestate was the owner of certain water locations and water rights and rights of way, that whatever right, title, or interest was held by defendants therein was held by defendants in trust for plaintiff, and to require defendants to convey all of the same to plaintiff. Demurrers to the amended complaint had been interposed by the defendants, and the demurrers of some defendants had been overruled, while the demurrers of others had been, by order made and entered, sustained, with leave to plaintiff to amend his complaint within 10 days. Plaintiff had failed to amend, but no final judgment in favor of the defendants whose demurrers had been sustained had been ordered or entered. The defendants whose demurrers had been overruled served and filed their answer to the amended complaint. Under these circumstances plaintiff moved in the court below, upon notice to the defendants whose demurrers had been sustained, "for an order vacating the order of said court sustaining the demurrers of said defendants, and bringing the said defendants into court, and overruling the demurrers of said defendants," upon the ground, first, that a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without said defendants, and their presence will prevent a multiplicity of suits, and, second that the orders sustaining the demurrers were inadvertently made, for the reason that they were not well taken. The said defendants objected to the hearing or consideration of the motion upon various grounds, amounting substantially to this, viz.: that the orders sustaining the demurrers were in effect res judicata, and the court had no power to set aside or vacate the same, directly or indirectly; that by reason thereof said defendants had been dismissed from the action, and the court had lost jurisdiction over them; and that so long as such orders remained in force the court had no power or jurisdiction to bring said defendants back into the action. It was further objected that no showing was made to the effect that the orders were made through any inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, as provided in section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, relative to relief from orders and judgments. The ruling of the court upon the objections was as follows, viz.: "The court, having duly considered the same, ruled that the objection to entertain such motion be sustained upon the ground that the court had no power to hear the motion without a showing." Thereupon the plaintiff applied to this court for a peremptory writ of mandate requiring said superior court and the judge thereof simply to take jurisdiction of said motion and hear the same upon its merits.

We are satisfied that the superior court had the power to entertain the motion, and that no showing of "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," which was evidently the "showing" referred to by the superior court, was essential as a prerequisite to the exercise of such power. The motion was, in part, for an order bringing said defendants in as parties, upon the ground that a complete determination of the controversy could not be had without their presence. The statute expressly authorizes such an order, providing that, when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must then order them to be brought in, and to that end may order amended and supplemental pleadings, or a cross-complaint, to be filed, and summons thereon to be issued and served. Section 389, Code Civ. Proc. The court, having jurisdiction of the cause, necessarily has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an order bringing in such parties at any time prior to judgment, and, where such an application is made, the court ought to hear the same upon its merits, in order that such parties may be brought in, if their presence is essential to a complete determination of the controversy. So far as the jurisdiction of the court to hear such an application is concerned, it can make no material difference whether the parties sought to be brought in were or were not originally named as parties to the action. The prior proceedings in the action in relation to them, where they were once parties, may have been such as to finally dispose of the issues in their favor; but this is a matter that goes to the merits, and not to the jurisdiction of the court to hear the application upon the merits and rule upon the same.

As, however, a writ of mandate will not be granted where it appears that the relator has no right to the relief which it is his ultimate object to attain, and that the writ will serve no purpose except that of enforcing a mere abstract right, unattended by any substantial benefit (see Gay v. Torrance, 78 Pac. 540, and cases there cited; Kerr v. Superior Court, 130 Cal. 183, 62 Pac. 479), it would appear to follow that the writ should not issue here, if the facts shown are such that the superior court must, of necessity, have denied the application. But no such facts appear. The mere fact that an order had been made sustaining the demurrers of these parties to the amended complaint, with leave to plaintiff to amend, and that plaintiff had failed to amend within the time allowed, did not necessitate a denial of the application. The ruling of the court upon the demurrers had not in any proper sense of the term become the law of the case. It is a most common occurrence for a trial court to change its rulings during the progress of a trial upon questions of law, and no one would contend that it is not within its power to do so, or that it should not do so when satisfied that the former ruling was erroneous. A ruling on demurrer occupies no better position, in this regard, than any other ruling from which an appeal could not be taken, and has frequently been disregarded when the same point subsequently arose in the same case in another way. In Lawrence v. Ballou, 37 Cal. 518, a demurrer to a complaint in ejectment was sustained, and, the complaint having been amended and the action having come on for trial, a motion for a nonsuit was made upon an opening statement of plaintiff's counsel, upon the ground that the statement showed only such title in plaintiff as had been held insufficient by the court in ruling on the demurrer. The motion was granted, and, in reversing the judgment, this court said: "The doctrine that a previous ruling has become the law of the case has no application, except as to the decisions of appellate courts. * * * If, at the trial of a cause at nisi prius, the court makes a ruling upon a certain point, the court is not bound by it, if the same point arises again. On the contrary, the court may and should change its ruling, if in the meantime it has become satisfied that it was erroneous." In Sherburne v. Strawn, 52 Kan. 39, 34 Pac. 405, a motion of defendant for judgment on the pleadings was granted, notwithstanding a prior order overruling the demurrer to the complaint; the Supreme Court of Kansas saying: "The court retained complete jurisdiction over the case until final judgment, and had ample power to correct its former ruling on the demurrer, if erroneous." In Richman v. Board, 77 Iowa, 513, 524, 42 N. W. 422, 4 L. R. A. 445, 14 Am. St. Rep. 308, where the trial court had practically reconsidered its ruling on demurrer, the Supreme Court of Iowa said: "We are not prepared to hold that if, during the trial of the issues of an action, a court becomes convinced of error, he may not correct it. It would be a serious impediment to a fair and speedy disposition of causes if such a rule was to obtain." See, also, Perry v. Baker (Neb.) 86 N. W. 692, and First Nat. Bank v. Williams, 126 Ind. 423, 26 N. E. 75.

An order sustaining a demurrer is not a judgment, and does not have the effect of finally and irrevocably dismissing the demurring party from the action. "It may form the basis for rendering a judgment, but it is not itself a judgment" (Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 518, 32 Pac. 571), is not appealable, and can be reveiewed by an appellate court only on appeal from a final judgment subsequently given. Upon such an order being made without leave to amend, or where it is made with leave to amend and no amendment is made, the party whose demurrer has been sustained may become entitled to a judgment which may effectually bar further proceedings against him in the matter from which he has been dismissed. In the absence of such a judgment, however, the mere order constitutes no bar, and if, at any time prior to judgment, it is made to appear to the court that a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of such party, we can conceive of no good reason why the court may not make such orders as will have the effect of bringing such party into the action again. He has never really been effectually dismissed from the action, and technically speaking is not a new party at all; but the order sustaining his demurrer has the effect of relieving him from the necessity of further defending, in the absence of subsequent action by the court. Until final judgment in his favor, he is, however, within the jurisdiction of a court in that action, and the statute, which authorizes the court to bring in any parties whose presence is essential, is broad enough to include all persons not then actively before the court in the action. We entertain no doubt as to the power of the court, at any time prior to final judgment in favor of a party, to reconsider a ruling sustaining his demurrer to a pleading. Where it is made to appear to the trial court, prior to final judgment, that the presence of the party whose demurrer has been sustained is essential to a complete determination of the controversy, and that its prior ruling on demurrer was erroneous, we have no doubt that it ought to reconsider such ruling. Its jurisdiction, under the circumstances, to make any and all such orders as may be necessary to so place such party that the controversy may be finally and speedily determined, is ample.

The plaintiff was entitled to have the trial court entertain and consider his motion on its merits. It is not intimated that the records, files, and papers in the action, including the answers of certain defendants filed subsequent to the ruling on demurrer, did not show a case which would justify the court in bringing in the parties named, and in concluding that it had erred in sustaining their demurrers to the amended complaint. We cannot say, therefore, that the petitioner is here seeking to enforce a mere abstract right, unattended by any substantial benefit. Under these circumstances there can be no serious doubt as to the right of plaintiff to a writ of mandate, compelling the trial court to exercise its jurisdiction by hearing and disposing of the motion. This, clearly, it has not done. The order made by it upon the disposition of the motion was precisely the same in effect as the order considered by this court in Cahill v. Superior Court, 78 Pac. 467, viz., a dismissal of the motion for lack of jurisdiction. In this case, as in that, there was no question of fact to be determined by the trial court as a prerequisite to assuming jurisdiction of the motion, and such court decided "as matter of law purely" that it could not in any case entertain a motion of the character here made, in the absence of a showing of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect on the part of the one making the motion. As was said of a similar case in Cahill v. Superior Court: "This was a proposition, not dependent on any facts whatever, but wholly upon a consideration of the powers of the court as defined by the Constitution and statutes." That mandamus will lie to compel a court having jurisdiction to act under such circumstances, in the absence of other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, is fully established by the opinion in Cahill v. Superior Court, supra, and the cases therein cited. In this case there is no other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for.

APPEAL—DENIAL OF NEW TRIAL — PARTIES — SERVICE OF NOTICE—APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT—JURISDICTION.

1. Where notice of appeal from an order denying a new trial is served on the adverse parties to the motion, the service is sufficient to give jurisdiction on appeal, though a codefendant was not served.

2. The question whether other parties should have been made parties to the motion for a new trial is not involved on a motion to dismiss an appeal from an order denying the motion.

3. Though a failure to serve an adverse party with notice of intention to move for a new trial may be cause for denying the motion, it is not ground for dismissal of the appeal from the order for want of jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

4. Under a policy of fire insurance sued on, loss, if any, was made payable to a mortgagee. The mortgagee was made a party defendant, because it refused to be made a party plaintiff, as alleged in the complaint, in which plaintiff asked for judgment for the full amount due on the policy and that out of the judgment the amount due the mortgagee be paid. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the policy and interest, and "that out of such judgment the mortgagee be paid $400." Held, that under Code Civ. Proc. § 578, providing that judgment may be given for one or more of several plaintiffs, the judgment rendered was within the jurisdiction of the court, though the mortgagee never answered or appeared, within section 1014.

5. Though it never answered or appeared in the action, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1014, providing that after appearance a defendant is entitled to notice of all subsequent proceedings of which notice is required to be given, the mortgagee was an adverse party to an appeal by the insurance company, within section 940, requiring notice of appeal from a judgment to be served on the adverse party; and an appeal by the insurance company from the judgment without notice to the mortgagee did not confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth D. Johnson against the Phenix Insurance Company of Brooklyn, N. Y., and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and one of defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the insurance company appeals. On motion to dismiss. Motion granted in part.

Carbet & Goodwin and Lawrence T. Wagner, for appellant. R. H. McGowan (Galpin & Bolton, of counsel), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Motion to dismiss appeals from a judgment and an order denying the motion for a new trial made by the Phenix Insurance Company, one of the defendants. The ground of the motion is that the notice of appeal was not addressed to or served upon the codefendant of appellant, the Bank of San Mateo County, alleged to be a necessary party to said appeals.

1. So far as the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is concerned, it is only necessary to say that the Bank of San Mateo County was not a party to the proceedings on motion for a new trial. The notice of intention to move for a new trial was addressed to the plaintiff and her attorneys only. If the notice of appeal from an order on motion for a new trial be served upon the adverse parties to the motion in the court below, such service is sufficient to give this court jurisdiction to entertain the appeal from such order, at least in cases where the motion has been denied in such court. Watson v. Sutro, 77 Cal. 609, 20 Pac. 88. The question as to whether other parties should have been made parties to the motion in the court below is not involved upon a motion to dismiss the appeal from such an order. Id. A failure to serve an adverse party with notice of intention to move for a new trial may be a reason for denying the motion for a new trial, and for affirming such order on appeal; but it does not constitute a reason for the dismissal of the appeal upon the ground that the court has not acquired jurisdiction to hear it. In re Ryer, 110 Cal. 556, 559, 42 Pac. 1082. See, also, Barnhart v. Fulkerth et al., 92 Cal. 155, 28 Pac. 221.

2. The notice of appeal from the judgment was not addressed to or served upon the defendant Bank of San Mateo County. The action was brought by plaintiff to recover the amount of $1,000 and interest, alleged to be due upon a fire insurance policy for $1,000, made and delivered by the Phenix Insurance Company to plaintiff, covering her dwelling house. By the terms of the policy, the loss, if any, was made payable to the Bank of San Mateo County, a mortgagee of plaintiff's property. The amount due such bank on said mortgage, as appears from the judgment, is $400. The bank was made a party defendant for the reason, as alleged in the complaint, that it "is a necessary party * * * and refuses to be made a party plaintiff herein." In her complaint, plaintiff asked for judgment for the full amount due on the policy, and "that out of said judgment the amount due and owing to the defendant Bank of San Mateo County on said mortgage be paid." It does not appear that the bank ever answered, demurred, or gave written notice of appearance. Section 1014, Code Civ. Proc. The judgment recites that on the trial George C. Ross, Esq., appeared for said defendant bank, and "announced that they did not desire to answer the complaint, and wished to remain neutral in the matter." The judgment also recites that the case was tried by a jury, which found a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $1,000, with interest. The judgment proper is as follows: "It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff have and recover of and from the defendant Phenix Insurance Company of Brooklyn, N. Y., a corporation, the sum of $1,050.15, together with her costs and disbursements incurred herein, amounting to the sum of $81.40, with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum from date hereof until paid, and that out of said judgment there be paid to the defendant Bank of San Mateo County, a corporation, the sum of $400.00." The notice of appeal states that the appeal is taken "from the judgment * * * in favor of the plaintiff in said action and against the said Phenix Insurance Company of Brooklyn, one of the defendants, and from the whole of said judgment." Upon these facts the question is presented as to whether the bank is an "adverse party," to whom notice of defendant's appeal was required to be given, in order to confer jurisdiction upon this court to entertain such appeal.

It is apparent that under the terms of this judgment the right of the bank to the $400 thereby ordered paid to it is dependent upon the maintenance of the judgment given in favor of the plaintiff. It is the plaintiff alone who is adjudged to recover from the insurance company, and it is "out of said judgment" in favor of plaintiff that the bank is to be paid. The appeal is from the judgment "in favor of the plaintiff in said action" against the insurance company, and from the whole thereof. This, under the language of the judgment, necessarily includes the whole amount found due on the policy. If, on the appeal, the judgment be reversed, the judgment, in so far as it requires the payment of any money by the insurance company, is vacated, and there is no fund against which the bank may enforce its adjudged right. It does not, however, follow that there is no judgment in favor of the bank. There may be no judgment in its favor directly enforceable by it against the insurance company, but the bank is adjudged to have an interest, to the extent of $400, in the judgment recovered by plaintiff, and it is, in terms, ordered that from the same said sum of $400 shall be paid to the bank. The plain effect of this provision is that, to the extent of $400 of the amount given by the judgment to the plaintiff, the plaintiff is practically adjudged to be only a trustee for the bank. The bank is, to that extent, beneficially interested in the fund adjudged to be recovered from the insurance company by the plaintiff. So far as the bank is concerned, the judgment determines, as against the insurance company, the right to the recovery by the plaintiff of a certain amount of money, in a portion of which the bank has a beneficial interest, and, as between the plaintiff and the bank, the extent of the bank's interest in the amount so recovered. The judgment establishes a fund, to be collected from the insurance company, from which the bank is, under the terms of the judgment, to be paid. This is a judgment in favor of the bank, that would be absolutely nullified if defendant's appeal were sustained and the judgment in her favor reversed.

We cannot say that the superior court was without jurisdiction to so adjudge the rights of the bank. Section 578, Code Civ. Proc. The complaint states facts upon which a judgment may be based, and practically asks for the very judgment that was given. Under these circumstances it seems impossible to escape the conclusion that the bank is an "adverse party," within the meaning of section 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure. An adverse party is one "whose rights may be affected by a reversal of the judgment." Williams v. S. C. Mining Ass'n, 66 Cal. 193, 5 Pac. 85. In Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 637-640, it was said: "The question is as to the meaning of the words 'adverse party' as here used, and as to that we think there can be no rational doubt. Every party whose interest in the subject-matter of the appeal is adverse to or will be affected by the reversal or modification of the judgment or order from which the appeal has been taken is, we think, an 'adverse party,' within the meaning of these provisions of the Code, irrespective of the question whether he appears upon the face of the record in the attitude of plaintiff or defendant or intervener." And in Terry v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 85, 42 Pac. 464, it was said that "adverse parties are those who, by the record, appear to be interested in the judgment, so that they will be affected by its reversal or modification." It is apparent from the record that the judgment here cannot be reversed without depriving the bank, a party to the action, of an apparent legal advantage. See In re Castle Dome Mining & Smelting Company, 79 Cal. 246, 248, 249, 21 Pac. 746. The effect of the judgment was to provide for the payment of a debt due to it from money recovered by plaintiff from the insurance company, and the reversal of the judgment would be to deprive it of such fund. It is no answer to this to say that the insurance company has, in fact, no defense against the bank, and that the bank may ultimately recover the money due it, by another judgment in this action directly against the insurance company, or that it may collect its debt from the mortgagor. The question is whether the judgment gives it something which will be taken away by a reversal. The judgment, which it is here sought to reverse, provides for the immediate payment of the money due the bank from a fund to be collected from the insurance company, and this gives the bank an apparent legal advantage. The relief which the insurance company seeks upon this appeal cannot be granted as to the plaintiff, without also being granted as to the bank.

It is suggested that the interest of the bank in the judgment is not a direct interest, but only a collateral or remote interest, and that only those who are directly interested in the judgment or order appealed from can be held to be adverse parties. We are of the opinion that it is apparent from the record that the defendant bank has a direct and immediate interest in the subject-matter of the appeal that would be affected by a reversal of the judgment.

It is urged that the bank did not plead or appear in the action, and Clarke v. Mohr et al., 125 Cal. 540, 58 Pac. 176, is cited in support of the contention that it was therefore unnecessary to serve it with a notice of appeal. That was a case where the notice of appeal had not been served upon certain defendants, who recovered nothing under the judgment, and as to whom the judgment dismissed the action. On the appeal of a defendant, against whom the judgment ran in favor of an intervener, who claimed some interest in the fund in dispute, it was held that, as the record did not show that such defendants who had been dismissed from the action were served with summons or had appeared, service of the notice of appeal on them was not requisite. It was said: "Unless they had been brought before the superior court, they would not be affected by its judgment, or by the reversal thereof by this court." What is there decided can have no application to a case where the judgment has been given in favor of one who is shown by the record to have been in fact a party to the action.

The appeal from the judgment is dismissed. As to the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial, the motion to dismiss is denied.

MASTER AND SERVANT—SERVANT'S INJURIES—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—INSTRUCTIONS—JURY—TAKING PAPERS TO JURY ROOM—TAKING PLEADINGS.

1. In an action by minors for the death of their father through the alleged negligence of defendant, it was proper to permit the mother and guardian of plaintiffs to testify as to deceased's average monthly contribution to plaintiffs' support at the time of his death.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 15, Cent. Dig. Death, §§ 83, 88.]

2. A tunnel was being driven through a hill, and a retaining wall was built near the face of the hill, for the purpose of holding the earth in place and preventing it coming down at the end of the tunnel. The wall stood a little distance from the face of the hill, and a sewer which passed through the hill above the tunnel leaked so that water permeated through the earth. A body of earth slipped from the hill and, moving toward the retaining wall, passed downward along the inner side of the wall, carrying with it timbers and materials, and causing the death of a servant. In an action for the death, the city engineer testified to the condition and stratification of the earth above the tunnel, to the pitch of certain rock formations toward the wall, to the loosening effect of water permeating a body of earth, and to the additional pressure and force of a moving body of earth. Held, that a motion to strike his testimony on the ground that it had not been shown that the retaining wall was built in accordance with plans prepared in his office, as claimed by defendant, was properly denied; the motion being too general, and some of the testimony being admissible, irrespective of the point made by the motion.

3. In an action for the death of a servant, defendant testified that he paid deceased $3 a day and other men about $1.75, and he was then asked why he paid deceased $3, for the purpose of showing that deceased had extra responsibility. Held, that there was no error in sustaining an objection to the question; the witness having testified to deceased's duties.

4. Where, in an action for the death of a servant, defendant set up as a special defense that deceased was employed as a foreman to direct and supervise the work, and was charged with the duty of providing for his own safety in securing a safe place to work, and that the accident was due to his own violation of duty, the issues presented were sufficient to admit full proof as to what duties devolved on deceased and what instructions were given him.

5. Where, in an action for the death of a servant, killed by the giving way of the supporting work of a tunnel, defendant testified that he gave deceased no instructions about the tunnel, but that deceased was to "take care of the whole tunnel," and other witnesses testified as to deceased's employment, any error in excluding questions as to the scope of deceased's duties was harmless.

6. Where there is conflicting evidence as to material facts, the question is one for the jury.

7. In an action for the death of a servant, the court instructed that it was the duty of a master to furnish the servant a safe place to work and to make provision for the safety of his employés or servants. Subsequently the court instructed that defendants were not obliged to furnish deceased with an absolutely safe place, or to make the supports of the tunnel in which he was killed absolutely safe, but were only required to use ordinary care. Held, that the jury could not have been misled, so as to accept the first instruction as meaning that defendants were required to furnish an absolutely safe place.

8. In an action for the death of a servant, the court instructed that it is no part of the duty of a servant to inquire into the sufficiency of the provisions made by the master to furnish the servant with a safe place to work, and that the servant has a right to rely on the master in such regard; and the court instructed, on defendant's theory of the case, that if deceased was employed to take charge of timbering the tunnel in which he was killed, so that the same should be safe, and his death would not have occurred, but for defects of the timbering put in by him or under his direction, plaintiffs could not recover. Held, that the former instruction was not erroneous, when taken in connection with the other, as ignoring the defense.

9. Where, in an action for the death of a servant, killed in a tunnel being driven by contractors, owing to the caving of earth, defendants interposed a special defense tending to fix the responsibility for the injury on the city, in that the work was being done in accordance with plans made by the city, an instruction that, where two or more persons jointly contribute to an injury, the injured party may sue one or all, was not harmful, even if not strictly justified.

10. Code Civ. Proc. § 612, provides that, on retiring for deliberation, the jury may take with them all the papers which have been received as evidence, except depositions or copies of such papers as ought not, in the opinion of the court, to be taken from the person having them. Held that, where papers have been read in evidence, it is discretionary with the court whether to allow the jury to take them or not.

11. The practice of allowing pleadings to be taken to the jury room, whether read in evidence or not, is not a safe one; but its indulgence is not reversible error, in the absence of a showing of prejudice or injury.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by Edith Z. Powley and another, by Lida Colburn, their guardian ad litem, against Anton Swensen and another, doing business as Swensen & Hill. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Herbert Cutler Brown, for appellants. W. C. Petchner and Anderson & Anderson, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Action for damages resulting from the death of plaintiffs' father, W. F. Powley, who, it is alleged, lost his life while in the employment of defendants through their fault. The cause was tried with a jury, and plaintiffs had the verdict, upon which the court entered judgment. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial, and bring the appeal here on bill of exceptions.

Defendants were contractors who had undertaken to construct a tunnel in the city of Los Angeles through a hill lying between Hill and Figueroa streets, being a projection of Third street, and known as "Third Street Tunnel." Work was begun on both sides of the hill, extending toward the center. The accident in question occurred within and near the westerly end or section of the tunnel. The plans for the tunnel included the construction of a strong retaining wall against the face of the hill, whose purpose was to hold the earth in place and prevent it coming down into the street at the end of the tunnel. This retaining wall extended entirely across Third street, and to a height of about 43 feet, and, to give it greater resistance, was built so as to lean slightly toward the hill. An opening through this wall formed the portal or entrance to the tunnel. It is in evidence that when this wall was completed it rested against the hill on the south side of Third street, and stood out from the hill 7 or 8 feet on the north side, and about 4 feet or 4½ feet at the top of the tunnel, and diminishing in width to some 20 inches at the floor of the tunnel—making a wedge-shaped opening between the wall and the hill. The mixing of cement for the arch brick work in the tunnel was done inside of this portal. Some trouble had arisen from earth falling down from the hillside to the place where the cement was being mixed, and to prevent this boards and timbers of different sizes had been placed against the wall and the hillside to catch this loosening earth, but not for the purpose and not at all adequate in strength to hold the earth in place, should a slide from the hill occur toward the wall. These boards and timbers were close enough together to accomplish the purpose intended of catching loose pieces of falling earth, but did not entirely shut out the light from above. The width of the tunnel in the clear was 42 feet, and at the time of the accident had been excavated toward the center of the hill some distance, 100 feet of which had received its brick roofing, leaving next to the portal about 20 feet of an undisturbed core and about 12 feet of tunnel, not yet completed, next to the completed portion. The work in the tunnel was carried on by means of a drift on each side of this core, and when the accident occurred the work on the tunnel was, as we understand the evidence, being done at the westerly end, through this core, toward the portal. Deceased was employed as foreman of the work in the tunnel, and was an experienced man in tunnel and timbering work in mines. There is evidence that he had nothing to do with building the portal or putting in the boards above referred to, and did not commence work until about two months after the retaining wall was built. His was the night shift; but, as it happened, he had taken the place of the other foreman on the Sunday of the accident, because this man declined to work that day. It appears that there was a city sewer crossing Third street above the tunnel and back of the portal 50 or 60 feet, from which sewage water escaped into the soil and penetrated the earth above the tunnel, into which latter the water seeped to some extent, which facts were known to defendants and to deceased. This water-saturated earth rested on or was intermixed with layers of shale having a 60-degree pitch toward the portal, and on the day of the accident a body of earth slipped from the westerly side of this sewer and moved toward the portal, and there was evidence that by its momentum and weight it crowded the earth against the portal, and downward along its inner side, carrying with it the timbers and material at the tunnel where the deceased was working, thus causing his death and the death of two others. The retaining wall stood the shock and weight without injury to it, and there is evidence tending to show that if this open space between the hill and the wall had been filled in with earth, or if sufficient bracing timbers of suitable strength had been placed against the wall and hill, it would have prevented the earth above the tunnel from moving and acquiring additional force by its momentum, and the timbering where the men were working would not have given way, and the accident would not have happened. There is evidence, also, that inside the tunnel the completed work some distance back from where the men were working did not collapse, and that no timbering or bracing inside the tunnel where the accident happened would have withstood the pressure.

The complaint alleged that the accident occurred "by the neglect and failure of defendants to exercise ordinary care to properly brace and strengthen said tunnel at the point where the same caved," and "to take proper or ordinary precautions in prosecuting said work as to render said westerly end of said tunnel safe, and thereby and by such negligence defendants failed to furnish said W. F. Powley with a safe place in which to work"; that "the said tunnel at the point where the same caved in as aforesaid, and the work therein, were of a dangerous character, and defendants did not exercise ordinary care and diligence to ascertain and apprehend the dangers thereof; and defendants negligently and carelessly failed to take measures for the protection of said Powley, while he was working within said tunnel as aforesaid, commensurate with the dangerous character of said tunnel and the work therein."

In addition to specific denials of the averments of the verified complaint, defendants set up three special defenses, in effect: First, that Powley was employed as foreman, "to direct and supervise the work of excavation, direct the laborers engaged upon such work, and to superintend and direct the placing of timbers and supports at the places and in that portion of the tunnel where the accident occurred," and he was charged with the duty of providing for his own safety, as well as that of other employés, and in securing to them a safe place to work, and that the accident was due to his own violation of duties expressly imposed upon him, and that his death was caused proximately by his own negligence. Second, that all said workmen, including plaintiffs' intestate, were engaged in a common employment, and, if he was injured, it occurred through the negligence of fellow servants of deceased. Third, that the work, including the construction of the retaining wall, was done in accordance with plans made by the city of Los Angeles and under the direction of its proper officers; that in the city sewer above referred to there was a manhole through which the city flushed said sewer, and that a large volume of water was carried into said sewer to flush the same, causing the sewer to break and said waters to impregnate the earth, and thus causing it to slide upon the strata of shale which, it is alleged, interlaid the earth at an angle toward said portal of 60 degrees; that said wall was ordered to be constructed for the purpose of preventing just such a slide of earth as happened, but that said wall was imperfectly constructed for the purposes for which it was intended. It is alleged, however, that defendants constructed the same under the directions of the city engineer, and relied wholly upon such directions and upon his skill and knowledge, and that the accident was the result of a combination of circumstances over which defendants had no control, and without their fault.

The errors complained of will be noticed in the order presented in defendants' brief.

1. Mrs. Colburn, mother and guardian ad litem of plaintiffs, was asked the question, "Did you know what was his [Powley's] average monthly contribution to their [the plaintiffs'] support at the time of his death?" to which she answered, "Thirty a month." Counsel thereupon objected as irrelevant and incompetent. Waiving the rule of practice which would have required a motion to strike out the answer, where made without objection, we think it was competent to learn from the witness, if she knew, to what extent plaintiffs were supported from their father's earnings, which was in effect the answer. It appeared elsewhere that he earned about $3 per day, and no other source of income was attempted to be shown.

2. At the close of plaintiffs' evidence defendants moved to strike out all the testimony of City Engineer Dockweiler, on the ground that it had not been shown that the retaining wall was built in accordance with the plans and specifications prepared in his office. The court denied the motion. It was in evidence that the plans and specifications for this wall were prepared in the city engineer's office, and that it was erected under the direct supervision of an engineer officer of the city in the performance of official duty. Nothing at this point in the case tended to show that this wall was not constructed in accordance with plans and specifications, and presumably it was so constructed. In fact the wall stood the pressure and was not defective, save that it was not built against the earth. Whether built in accordance with the original plans seems not to be material, as the lower court held. But the ruling was correct on other grounds. Witness Dockweiler had testified to the condition and stratification of the earth above the tunnel, to the pitch of the shale toward the wall, to the loosening effect of water permeating this body of earth and shale, to the additional pressure and force of a moving body of earth, and other facts. The motion was too general; for some of the testimony was clearly admissible, regardless of the point made by defendants. The motion should have been directed with precision to the objectionable testimony, if there were such. Hellman v. McWilliams, 70 Cal. 449, 11 Pac. 659.

3. When on the witness stand defendant Hill was asked why he paid Powley $3 per day, instead of $1.50 or $1.75, to which question plaintiffs objected. The court sustained the objection. The purpose of the question, as claimed by defendants, was to show that, because Powley received more pay than other men, it tended to show that he had "extra responsibility." The witness had testified to the fact that Powley was paid $3, and other men $1.50 and $1.75, per day. It was competent for the witness to testify to Powley's duties, in addition to showing this difference in pay, and the witness did testify as to Powley's duties. The reason why he was paid higher wages than other men would not necessarily tend to fix the extent of his responsibility.

4. Toward the close of the trial defendants asked leave to amend their answer "to the effect that Mr. Powley had entire charge of the timbering in and about the tunnel." Defendants in their answer allege that Powley was employed as foreman to supervise the work of excavation, to direct the laborers on such work, and to superintend the placing of timbers at that part of the tunnel where the accident occurred. The issues presented in the pleadings were quite sufficient to admit of full proof as to what duties devolved upon Powley and what instructions were given him. Defendant Hill testified on the subject, and although some questions put to him by counsel for defendants after the refusal of the court to allow the amendment were objected to and refused, and exceptions taken, they were, owing to their form, within the discretion of the court to allow or refuse. These questions were in leading form, and were intended to bring out the scope of Powley's duties. The witness, however, had full opportunity to state the facts as to Powley's employment, as did other witnesses, and, among other answers, defendant Hill stated that he gave Powley no instructions about the tunnel, and that Powley "was to take care of the whole tunnel." Defendants were not prejudiced by the ruling of the court, if error be conceded.

5. A motion for nonsuit was made at the close of plaintiffs' evidence, and it is urged should have been granted, first, because there was then no direct proof of Powley's death; second, that, although there was evidence tending to show that the space behind the retaining wall was an element of danger, there is no evidence going to show that deceased was killed; third, that the evidence showed that the moving cause of the accident was the leakage of the sewer above the tunnel, but that "there was no testimony tending to show that defendants were responsible for that condition, or that any act of omission of defendants was responsible for the sliding of the earth and its precipitation into the tunnel." The testimony later on in the trial brought out quite fully the facts on these points. We think, however, when the motion was made, there was sufficient shown by the admissions of the pleadings and by the testimony before the jury to justify the court in refusing a nonsuit on the grounds stated.

6. Defendants asked an instruction that the verdict must be for defendants, which the court refused to give. To show that this was error defendants now present in their brief a review of the entire evidence in the case. As we have already seen, the evidence given in favor of the plaintiffs was sufficient to justify the denial of the motion for a nonsuit. Our attention has not been called to any evidence on behalf of the defendants which has the effect of explaining or modifying the evidence of the plaintiffs, so as to destroy its effect. On the contrary, as stated, the evidence given later tended to supply the defects, such as they were, in the plaintiffs' proof, and fully justified the refusal to direct a verdict for the defendants. If it is urged on the ground that the verdict is against law, the instruction cannot be upheld, because there was conflicting evidence as to material facts, which the jury had the right to pass upon. O'Connor v. Witherby, 111 Cal. 528, 44 Pac. 227.

7. Appellants object to instructions 4, 5, 6, 8, and 12. It is claimed that one special defense was that Powley was engaged by defendants as a timber man to take entire charge of the timbering, to take such steps as might be necessary to properly protect the work against just such an accident as did occur, and that defendants relied absolutely on his judgment and ability. The objection is that these instructions ignored this issue, and, furthermore, that they were given on the theory that it was the duty of defendant to furnish a safe place for the employés to work in. Instructions 4 and 5 are particularly pointed out as open to the objection made. Instruction 4 was: "It is the duty of a master or employer to furnish his servant or employé with a safe place to work, and to make provisions for the safety of his employés or servants as will protect them against the dangers incident to their employment." Further along the court instructed the jury: "You are instructed that Swenson and Hill were not obliged to furnish the said Powley with an absolutely safe place to work in, or to make supports of the tunnel absolutely safe, but they were only required to use ordinary care to protect their employés against accident," etc. We do not think the jury could have been misled to accept the first instruction above given as meaning that defendants were required to furnish an absolutely safe place in which deceased was to work. In view of all the instructions, the jury could not as reasonable men have acted upon the supposition that the court had told them the place must have been absolutely safe. Instruction 5 was as follows: "You are instructed that it is no part of the duty of a servant to inquire into the sufficiency of the provisions made by the master to furnish the servant with a safe place to work. The servant has a right to rely on the master in this regard, because it is the master's duty to provide a safe place in which to perform his work, and the servant may justly assume that the master has performed this duty." It is claimed that, under the pleadings, these were questions for the jury to determine, which were taken away from them by the instructions. The jury were fully instructed as to defendants' theory of the case, and they were told that if they should "find, from the evidence, that Powley was employed to take charge of the timbering of the tunnel, and that it was his duty to timber the tunnel and the spaces behind the retaining wall, so that the same should be safe and secure from accident, and if you find, from the evidence, that there were materials and means provided for the proper timbering of the tunnel, and if you find, from the evidence, that the death of Powley would not have occurred, but for defects or insufficiency in the timbering put in by him or under his direction, * * * the plaintiffs cannot recover. * * *" Other instructions pointing with equal directness to the defenses set up were given. We cannot see that the court invaded the functions of the jury, or took from them any questions which the law committed to them.

8. There was an instruction to the effect that, where two or more persons jointly contribute to the injury, the injured party may sue one or all. It is objected that no question of joint liability arose in the case. There was a special defense interposed by defendants tending to fix the responsibility for the injury upon the city of Los Angeles. It is not claimed that the instruction stated an unsound rule of law. In view of the pleadings and the evidence given tending to fix the responsibility on the corporation, the instruction was not harmful, even if not strictly justified.

9. The court instructed the jury that they might take with them for their "consideration the exhibits introduced in evidence and the pleadings in the case." Objection to this instruction was made by defendants on the ground that "the pleadings were not proper to be considered by the jury in arriving at their verdict." The record shows that the jury took with them the complaint and answer. Section 612, Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "Upon retiring for deliberation, the jury may take with them all the papers which have been received as evidence in the cause, except depositions or copies of such papers as ought not, in the opinion of the court to be taken from the person having them in possession. * * *" Section 1137 of the Penal Code is similar in its provisions (although the phraseology differs somewhat), except that the jury "may also take with them the written instructions given." It does not appear that the pleadings, or any part of them, were read to the jury as evidence; nor does it appear that the jury read them after retiring. The Colorado Code is similar to ours in its provision as to what papers may be given to the jury. In a civil action the defendant requested the court to send the pleadings with the jury on retiring. The claim was that defendant was entitled to have the admissions contained in plaintiffs' complaint before the jury for consideration. The court said: "This assignment is not well taken. It would be a vicious practice indeed, to require the pleadings to be sent out, in order that the jury might determine as to what matters were admitted therein and what were not. If the pleadings in this case contained any admission that the defendant was entitled to have considered by the jury, he should have requested the court to have given an instruction to the jury setting forth the facts so admitted." Spaulding v. Saltiel, 18 Colo. 86, 31 Pac. 486. In Drew v. Andrews, 8 Hun, 23, the trial court, over defendants' objection, directed the jury (they being unable to fix the amount of damages) to take the pleadings and return and fix the amount. They returned with an amount greater than claimed, after proven credits were allowed. The court said the pleadings were not evidence and reversed the judgment. In that case, however, manifest injury appeared by the use made of the pleadings. In a Missouri case the practice of sending the pleadings to the jury was said to be of doubtful propriety; but the court said that, as trial courts throughout the state had followed this practice, it would not be held prejudicial, unless some improper use of the pleadings is shown. Bluedorn v. Mo. Pac. R. Co., 121 Mo. 258, 25 S. W. 943. We have not the statute of that state before us. In an Iowa case for personal injury the trial court directed the jury to take the pleadings, for which error was claimed. The court said: "As the jury was correctly instructed as to the issues in the case, and no ground for the objection appears, we do not think the record shows the court's action in this regard to be prejudicial." McGinty v. Keokuk, 66 Iowa, 725, 24 N. W. 506. See Swanson v. Allen, 108 Iowa, 419, 79 N. W. 132, holding apparently otherwise. The Iowa statute does not differ much from ours. In Texas it seems that the pleadings may go to the jury, and in International, etc., R. Co. v. Leak, 64 Tex. 654, the court directed the jury to read the pleadings on retiring, for which error was claimed, because the pleadings were declamatory and strong statements of the appellees' case not supported by the evidence, but calculated to inflame the minds of the jury. The court said: "The jury hear the pleadings read in the beginning of the case, and take them with them in their retirement, and may read them again. It is not their duty to do so, and the court below commits an error in charging the jury that it is their duty. It is the duty of the court to evolve from the pleadings and the evidence the issues to be passed upon by the jury. The verdict is the jurors' response to the charge of the court, not to the pleadings. In cases where the pleadings are numerous and voluminous, and parts are exorcised by exceptions, and the issues are complicated, such a charge as that here complained of might mislead the jury and be ground for reversal. No such result is claimed in this case, and the assignment is, therefore, not sustained." In People v. Cochran, 61 Cal. 548, 551, defendant requested the court to give the jury a diagram used at the trial. It was held that section 1137, Pen. Code, is not mandatory, but that the discretion is with the court to send or not send the papers to the jury; that the diagram was not "used as evidence" in the sense of the statute; and, as the jury did not ask for the diagram, the refusal to send it to the jury did not prejudice the defendant or influence the verdict.

See 12 Ency. Pl. & Pr. p. 598, and cases cited, where it is stated that the practice of allowing the jury to take the pleadings is condemned as of doubtful propriety; but it is stated to be the general rule that, where the jury has been correctly instructed as to the issues in the case, there is no error in taking with it by direction of the court the pleadings in the cause. Granite G. M. Co. v. Maginness, 118 Cal. 131, 50 Pac. 269, seems to point to the necessity of introducing the pleadings in evidence before they can be read as such. Our statute provides that the jury may take with them the papers "received in evidence in the cause," with some exceptions. This would seem to imply that papers not received in evidence should not go to the jury on their retirement; and in cases where papers have been read in evidence we think it discretionary with the court whether to allow the jury to take them or not. We do not think the practice of allowing pleadings to be taken to the jury room a safe one, however the statute may be viewed; for it must be apparent to every practitioner that cases might arise where it would work prejudice, if this were permitted. In the present case no prejudice or injury was caused, and none is pointed out. The importance and the novelty of the question in our practice must justify the attention here given to it, and it is strongly urged upon trial courts to avoid possible prejudicial error by adhering closely to the statute, and not going beyond it.

It is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

In re LEE LOOK. (Cr. 1,241.)

HABEAS CORPUS—CUSTODY OF PRISONER PENDING HEARING IN FEDERAL COURT—JURISDICTION OF STATE COURT.

Where the United States Supreme Court has assumed jurisdiction of habeas corpus proceedings begun in the United States District Court in a criminal case for the determination of constitutional objections after affirmance of a judgment of conviction by a state Supreme Court, questions arising concerning the custody of accused pending the hearing are also within the jurisdiction of the federal courts, and the state courts are not the proper tribunals in which to present a petition for a writ of habeas corpus to procure a change of custodian for the accused.

In Bank. Petition by Lee Look against J. W. Tompkins, warden of the state prison at San Quentin, for writ of habeas corpus. Petition denied.

James H. Campbell, Dist. Atty., for the warden. A. H. Jarman, for petitioner.

LORIGAN, J. The petitioner, Lee Look, having been convicted of murder in the superior court of Santa Clara county and sentenced to death, appealed to this court from the judgment, which was affirmed. 76 Pac. 1028. The date originally fixed for his execution having passed pending his appeal, upon the affirmance of the judgment he was again brought before said superior court, and on December 23, 1904, an order was made by said court directing his execution on March 3, 1905, and further directing that the sheriff of Santa Clara county, in whose custody he then was, deliver him to the warden of the state prison at San Quentin to be executed. On December 24, 1904, petitioner applied to the district court of the United States for a writ of habeas corpus to be discharged from the custody of said sheriff, challenging, on constitutional grounds, the validity of the judgment of conviction against him upon which the order for his execution was based. This petition was denied. Having immediately filed an assignment of errors and tendered a sufficient bond on appeal, he applied to the same court, and subsequently to the Circuit Court of the United States, for an order allowing him an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the judgment of said District Court denying his petition for the writ, which application both courts denied. Thereafter he applied to the Honorable Joseph McKenna, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, for the allowance of such an appeal from the said judgment of the United States District Court, which on February 2, 1905, was granted, and a citation issued directed to the sheriff to show cause before the Supreme Court of the United States at a date subsequent to that fixed by the order for execution by the superior court of Santa Clara county. This matter is still pending before said Supreme Court of the United States. Intermediate the time between the denial by the United States District Court of petitioner's application for a writ of habeas corpus and the allowance of an appeal therefrom by the said justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and on December 29, 1904, the sheriff of Santa Clara county delivered the petitioner, pursuant to the said order of the superior court of said county of December 23, 1904, to the warden of the state prison at San Quentin, in whose custody he has ever since remained. By this proceeding the petitioner now seeks to obtain an order from this court directing that he be returned by the warden of the said state prison to the custody of the sheriff of Santa Clara county, to be by the latter retained until the disposition of petitioner's application by the Supreme Court of the United States. In this behalf his counsel insists that the proceedings in the District and Circuit Courts of the United States—his petition for a writ of habeas corpus and applications for the allowance of an appeal—had the effect, under section 766 of the Revised Statutes of the United States [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 597], of staying the hands of the state court and its officers in the exercise of any authority or the enforcement of any process relative to the custody of petitioner pending proceedings in the courts of the Union raising the question as to the validity of his detention; that while assuming to do so the District and Circuit Courts had no authority to refuse to allow his appeal; that he was entitled to take such appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the judgment of the District Court denying his application for a writ as an absolute matter of right, and that the proceedings on habeas corpus originally inaugurated in said District Court, and the allowance of the appeal by the Supreme Court of the United States was one proceeding, which, under the section of the Revised Statutes, precluded in the interim any change in the custody of the petitioner, and rendered his transfer from the sheriff to the warden unauthorized and void. On the other hand, it is claimed by the respondent warden that an appeal from the judgment of the United States District Court denying the right of habeas corpus was not a matter of absolute right, but a matter of discretion in the District or Circuit Court to grant or refuse it, and that after the application of petitioner for a right of appeal was denied by these courts, and before an application was made to the Supreme Court of the United States, there was no proceeding pending in the federal courts which could affect the custody of petitioner or restrain his delivery by the sheriff to the warden under the order of the superior court; and hence that he is lawfully in the custody of the latter.

These are the claims of the parties, and authorities are cited on both sides, which, it is claimed, support their respective positions. If, as contended by petitioner, the authorities cited by him sustain his claim that he had an absolute right of appeal from the judgment of the District Court denying his petition for a writ of habeas corpus, still, on the other side, there are the decisions of a District Court and Circuit Court in this same matter holding that the grant of a right of appeal is discretionary only, and this view seems to find some support in the cases of In re Durrant (C. C.) 84 Fed. 317, and In re Storti (C. C.) 109 Fed. 807. But, whatever the weight of authority upon this point may be, it is quite apparent from the situation thus presented that we are asked in this proceeding to dispose of a question which is purely federal—to examine and construe the decisions of the federal courts which have been cited by either side as in point, and to place a construction upon federal laws and federal procedure. This is, however, a matter which is properly within the province of the federal courts, and should always be committed to them. If it is available to the petitioner to invoke the aid of those tribunals to the extent that he seeks it here, it is before them that his application should be made and disposed of, and not before us. It is the federal rule that pending the proceedings on habeas corpus the custody of the petitioner is to be taken to be in the court or judge who issued the writ. 2 Foster, Fed. Prac. p. 845. This being true, and the petitioner being in contemplation of law under the control of the Supreme Court of the United States, any matter pertaining to his actual custody should be left to the jurisdiction of that federal tribunal. The proceedings there being in habeas corpus, as here, all matters ancillary to the jurisdiction of that court should be left to it. The Supreme Court of the United States having this complete control of petitioner under its writ, there is nothing that this court might do with reference to his actual custody which would be binding on that court. No judgment which we might render would control, and it would be not only idle, but inconsonant with the dignity of this tribunal, to assume to act where its determination might be so entirely futile. If the surrender of the petitioner by the sheriff to the warden was in violation of the federal laws, the federal tribunals, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, and in protection of the rights of the petitioner, have ample power to take all measures which may be necessary in his behalf. He can, under such proceedings as are authorized by the federal laws or procedure, invoke the jurisdiction of the federal court under whose process he is now held, and its determination of the matter will have that efficiency which our decision might not. As every right can be secured to him by invoking the jurisdiction of the court under whose process he is held, we see no occasion for our intervention in the matter.

The petitioner is therefore remanded to the custody of the warden.

ACTION—REAL PARTY IN INTEREST—STATUTE—CONSTRUCTION—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 367, providing that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, the widow of an intestate is entitled to prosecute a suit to recover land conveyed by the intestate in his lifetime through the fraudulent representations and undue influence of the grantee.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 318, providing that no action for the recovery of real property can be maintained unless it appear that the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor, was seised or possessed of the property in question within five years before the commencement of the action, is applicable to a suit by the widow of an intestate to recover property conveyed during the lifetime of the intestate through the fraudulent representations and undue influence of the grantee.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 33, Cent. Dig. Limitation of Actions, §§ 73–75, 182, 183.]

Commissioners' Decision. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Lilian H. Page against Mary A. Garver. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. Scott Jacobs, for appellant. T. E. Clark, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. The complaint alleges: That plaintiff is the widow of Samuel Page, deceased, who died intestate on the 24th day of June, 1899, leaving him surviving his said widow, an unborn child then in esse, who was thereafter, on October 28, 1899, born alive, but died the same day, and three sons, Elias, Henry, and Solomon, and one daughter (defendant) by a former wife, who were and are the only heirs of said Samuel; that at his death the said Samuel "was seised in fee simple, absolutely possessed, and entitled to the possession of, and was the owner of, a large amount of real property" (describing it); that on or about December 9, 1896, "with intent thereby to cheat and defraud the said Samuel Page, and any other heirs and legal representatives than themselves that he might leave at his death, out of the property above described, and out of any property of which he might die seised and possessed, and while the said Samuel Page, now deceased, was in a sick, weak, and exhausted condition, and while he was by said sickness wholly incapacitated to do any business whatsoever, through great physical weakness and unsoundness of mind and memory, * * * the defendant and Solomon C. Page conspiring wickedly," etc. Then follow allegations with great particularity to the effect that by fraudulent and false representations, and through their undue influence over him (fully set out), these two children of Samuel induced him to convey the land in question to defendant, and other of his property to Solomon, not here involved. The complaint also alleges that, as the widow of said Samuel and the mother of the said infant Winifred, plaintiff is owner, by succession as such widow, and as the sole heir of the said Winifred, of seven-fifteenths of said property, and entitled to the possession thereof; that plaintiff became acquainted with the said Samuel about January 27, 1899, prior to which time she knew nothing whatever of the fraud and deceit perpetrated on the said Samuel by the said defendant and the said Solomon, through their undue influence over him; that defendant has collected and appropriated to her own use the rents and profits of said land since said December 9, 1896. The complaint was filed July 17, 1901. Judgment is prayed for the cancellation of said conveyance of said land, for an accounting of the rents and profits, that defendant holds the title to said seven-fifteenths of said land and said rents in trust for plaintiff, "and for all other legal and equitable relief." A general demurrer for insufficiency of facts, lack of jurisdiction of the court to grant the relief, also for ambiguity and uncertainty, and because the action is barred by section 353 of the Code of Civil Procedure, was sustained; and, plaintiff declining to amend, defendant had judgment, from which plaintiff appeals.

The lack of jurisdiction as ground of demurrer is based on the failure of the complaint to show that there has been any administration of Samuel Page's estate. The point urged by defendant as of most importance is that plaintiff has failed to show that she has any interest in the property, or ever had any interest therein, and hence has no interest in the result of the suit, as contemplated by section 367, Code of Civil Procedure. When Samuel died, he was the equitable owner of the property, with the right to assert his interest and attack his conveyance to defendant on the grounds alleged in the complaint. Dying intestate, plaintiff succeeded to a widow's interest, in his equitable estate. See subdivisions 2 and 7 of section 1386, Civ. Code. In the recent case of Murphy v. Crowley, 140 Cal. 141, 73 Pac. 820, an adopted daughter brought the action against the widow of plaintiff's adopted father on grounds similar to those here alleged. A demurrer was sustained to the complaint, alleging as grounds of demurrer insufficiency of facts, among other grounds, and also pleading subdivision 4 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure, in bar of the action. The case went off on the statute of limitations, but it seemed to have been conceded that the action, brought by the heir of deceased, would lie. In Trubody v. Trubody, 137 Cal. 172, 69 Pac. 968, the action was to set aside a deed made by deceased in his lifetime to his then wife on the ground of undue influence. The plaintiffs were sons by a former wife. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, which alleged insufficiency of facts, that the action could not be maintained by the heirs in the absence of administration, that the action is barred by the statute of limitations, and some other grounds. It was held that the facts were sufficient, and that the plaintiffs could maintain the action. See, also, Janes v. Throckmorton, 57 Cal. 368; Kimball v. Tripp, 136 Cal. 631, 69 Pac. 428. Tully v. Tully, 137 Cal. 60, 69 Pac. 700, relied on by defendant, was an action by the wife, then seeking a divorce from her husband, to set aside a conveyance made in fraud of her rights by her husband to his children by a former wife. The court held that her interest was a right to a lien on the land to secure payment of alimony, and that she could not divest the defendants of their title. Whether she could sue, had she been the widow, instead of the wife, to set aside a deed of her husband procured through fraud and undue influence, was a question not involved.

The points made by defendant's demurrer, except as to the statute of limitations, are decided against her in Trubody v. Trubody. Defendant's plea of the statute of limitations is decided adversely to her contention in Murphy v. Crowley, supra, where it is held that the five-year statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 318) applies to cases of this character. See, also, South Tule Ind. Ditch Co. v. King (Cal.) 77 Pac. 1032.

It is advised that the judgment be reversed.

We concur: SMITH, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed: BEATTY, C. J.; SHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. KELLOGG. (L. A. 1,636.)

ADMINISTRATORS — PUBLIC ADMINISTRATORS — NATURE OF OFFICE—COMPENSATION.

1. By Pol. Code, § 4103, and the county government act (St. 1897, p. 492, c. 277), a public administrator is a county officer. Pol. Code, § 4303, requires the public administrator to perform such duties as are prescribed in Code Civ. Proc. c. 13, tit. 11, pt. 3. Code Civ. Proc. § 1743, provides that, when no direction is given for the government of a public administrator in discharging his duties, the provisions relating to administrators generally shall govern. Section 1727 declares the public administrator's official bond and oath to be in lieu of the administrator's bond and oath. Section 1726 requires the public administrator to take charge "(4) of the estates upon which letters of administration have been issued to him by the court." Section 1365 requires letters of administration to be granted to "(8) the public administrators." Sections 1736, 1737, 1739, 1740, and 1742 prescribe certain duties of the public administrator, distinct from those required of other administrators. Held, that the public administrator, in acting under section 1726, subd. 4, is a public officer acting by virtue of his office, and not merely by virtue of the letters issued to him by the court.

2. The county government act (St. 1897, p. 496, c. 277, § 159) fixes the salary of the public administrator of a certain county. Section 215, p. 572, of the same act, provides that the salaries provided for therein shall be in full compensation for all services rendered by the respective officers. Section 216 requires salaried county officers to pay the fees allowed by law into the county treasury. Section 217 requires the officers to keep a feebook. Section 226, p. 575, requires them to complete the business of their respective offices to the time of the expiration of their respective terms. Code Civ. Proc. § 1618, provides that a public administrator shall receive the same compensations and allowances as are allowed to other administrators. Held, that the provision of the county government act fixing the salary of the public administrator of the county in question, being a special act, controls the general provision of the Code, and the salary of the public administrator of such county is in full compensation for all services rendered by him.

3. Nor can the public administrator of such county retain the fees allowed him for services rendered after the expiration of his term of office.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1726, requiring a public administrator to take charge of estates upon which letters of administration have been issued to him by the court, and section 1735, authorizing the court to order the public administrator to account for and deliver all money and property of an estate in his hands to the heirs or administrator regularly appointed, a public administrator, who, during the two months between the election of his successor and the expiration of his own term of office, fails to procure a revocation of his letters, and to state his accounts to the close of his term, and to petition for relief from the further performance of his trust, but continues to administer upon the estates in his hands after the expiration of his term of office, cannot complain because his services are regarded as voluntary, and he is denied special compensation therefor.

Action by the county of Los Angeles against C. G. Kellogg. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order directing the payment of money, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leon F. Moss, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty., and Wm. P. James, Chief Dep. Dist. Atty., for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. This case is here on an agreed statement of facts, and was begun under the provisions of section 1138, Code Civ. Proc. The facts, so far as it is necessary to state them, are as follows: Defendant was the public administrator of Los Angeles county for the term of four years, ending January 5, 1903. He received as compensation for his services during said term, and no longer, $250 per month; being the salary provided by law to be paid to him as public administrator. During his said term as public administrator he was appointed administrator of many estates, some of which were fully administered during his said term, and he paid into the treasury of the county, as required by law, all commissions allowed by the superior court in the administration of all said estates in which administration was completed during said term. He was appointed as administrator, at different times in 1902, of seven different estates, and one in the year 1900, in all of which administration was continued by him after the term of his office had expired and was completed, in six of them in the latter part of the year 1903, and in two of them in the year 1904. In each estate at the close thereof he claimed and the court allowed in his final account a certain sum as his commissions, aggregating $4,857.72, in all of the said estates, which sum is now in his possession. It is stated "that said Kellogg has devoted a great deal of time and labor in the performance of his duties as administrator of said estates during the time which has elapsed since the expiration of his term of office, and prior to the allowance of said final accounts, and that he has not received any compensation for his services as such administrator which have been performed subsequent to the expiration of his said term of office." It also appears that his successor in office duly qualified and drew the salary allowed him by law during all the times mentioned after the expiration of defendant's term of office. It is then stated that Los Angeles county claims that each of said sums, commissions as aforesaid, should be paid into the county treasury, and that said Kellogg "has no right to retain the same or any part thereof," and that said Kellogg claims that "he is entitled to each of said sums, in the aggregate sum of $4,857.72, as compensation for his services as administrator of said estates, respectively." The court is asked "to determine said controversy, and to cause judgment to be entered in one form, determining whether or not the said Kellogg is entitled to said sums," or either of them, or whether or not said county of Los Angeles is entitled thereto, and for such other relief as may be meet and proper in the premises. The agreed statement makes no attempt to show what part of the services, if any, was performed, or what proportion, if any, of the commissions earned, before defendant's term of office expired. Commissions were claimed by defendant and allowed at the hearing and approval of the final account in each estate. Presumably the commissions covered the entire service both before and after the expiration of his term of office, for it is only at the close of the administration that the amount can be ascertained or ordered paid. The court adjudged that said Kellogg received said sum of money as a trustee of said Los Angeles county, and that the same is the property of said county, and ordered him to pay the said sum into the county treasury. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order.

The public administrator is a county officer (Pol. Code, § 4103; County Government Act [St. 1897, p. 492, c. 277]), and "must perform such duties as are prescribed in chapter 13, tit. 11, pt. 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure" (Pol. Code, § 4303). Among other duties, he "must take charge of the estates of persons dying within his county, as follows: (1) Of the estates of decedents for which no administrators are appointed, and which in consequence thereof are being wasted, uncared for or lost; (2) of the estates of decedents who have no known heirs; (3) of the estates ordered into his hands by the court; and (4) of the estates upon which letters of administration have been issued to him by the court." Code Civ. Proc. § 1726. Section 1743, Code Civ. Proc. is as follows: "When no direction is given in this chapter for the government or guidance of a public administrator in the discharge of his duties, or for the administration of an estate in his hands, the provisions of the preceding chapters of this title must govern" (i. e., such as relate to administrators generally).

Appellant contends that the office of public administrator is a mere qualification, and, when letters are granted to him because of such qualification, he occupies precisely the same position towards the estate as any other administrator; that his authority is derived wholly from his appointment by the issuance of letters to him; that he has no authority in the premises by virtue of his commission as public administrator, and his position as administrator of any particular estate is not affected in any respect by the expiration of his term of office as public administrator. Citing Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 230, 68 Am. Dec. 237; Rogers v. Hoberlein, 11 Cal. 127; Estate of Hamilton, 34 Cal. 468; Estate of Aveline, 53 Cal. 260; Estate of Pingree, 100 Cal. 80, 34 Pac. 521. It is true that, where a public administrator seeks administration of an estate under paragraph 4 of section 1726 and section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure, before he can take charge of the estate he must have a warrant of authority from the court, and the letters issued to him in the particular estate are his authority, as was held in some of the cases cited. But it is also true, as was said in Healy v. Superior Court, 127 Cal. 659, 60 Pac. 428: "The public administrator is the eighth class enumerated in section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He obtains letters of administration, not as an individual, but as public administrator, by virtue of his office." His official character, in our opinion, is not changed, nor is it taken from him, by the imposition of the duties devolved on him by the letters issued to him. He is as much the public administrator when administering an estate in the instance above referred to as when acting under any other paragraph of section 1726; and, in those cases where for the time being he manifestly acts wholly by virtue of his office, he must "with all convenient dispatch procure letters of administration thereon [i. e., on the estate] in like manner and on like proceedings as letters of administration are issued to other persons." In these and in all cases "his official bond and oath [unlike the case of other persons appointed] are in lieu of the administrator's bond and oath." Code Civ. Proc. § 1727; Healy v. Superior Court, supra. That he retains his official character while acting under letters of appointment, so far as the particular estate is concerned, even though his term of office has expired, is entirely consistent with the fact, as held in Rogers v. Hoberlein, supra, that the grant of letters continues until it is set aside or revoked by another appointment, and, as was held in Estate of Aveline, supra, that the sureties on his bond remain liable after his term expires as to all unfinished business. It was held in Mitchell v. Hecker, 59 Cal. 558, that his sureties are liable for wrongful appropriation of money of the estate, notwithstanding the letters issuing to him did not (as they generally do and always should) refer to his official character. In several respects his duties differ from those of other persons who may be appointed. He must make return to the court every six months, etc. Code Civ. Proc. § 1736. And this is not the equivalent of the return required of administrators by section 1622. Estate of Hedrick, 127 Cal. 186, 59 Pac. 590. He must deposit with the county treasurer all moneys received (Code Civ. Proc. § 1737), which can only be drawn out on his order "countersigned by a superior judge." Id. He must settle his accounts under oath with the county clerk for all moneys, etc., on the first Monday of each month. Id. § 1739. On final settlement of the estate any money in the hands of the public administrator, unclaimed, must be paid over to the county treasurer, in default of which the district attorney must institute the requisite proceedings against him and his sureties for judgment in the amount of money so withheld. Id. § 1740. He may administer oaths in regard to all matters pertaining to his duty or the administration. Id. § 1742. All these sections apply to a public administrator administering an estate, no matter under what particular section or paragraph of a section of the Code of Civil Procedure he may be acting, and they all deal with him in his official capacity and character of public administrator. It is made as much his official duty as public administrator to administer the estate under paragraph 4 of section 1726 as in any other case. The section declares that he "must take charge of the estates of persons dying within his county as follows," and paragraph 4 is as much controlled by this provision as are the other paragraphs of the section under which he has express authority to administer, at least temporarily, by virtue of his office alone. The purpose of the law is to provide a public officer, acting under his oath of office and official bond, who shall be in a position at all times to administer estates where there is a failure of heirs or other persons competent to perform the service.

In Rogers v. Hoberlein, supra, it was held that the successor of the public administrator did not by force of his office alone become entitled to administer an estate not yet fully administered by his predecessor, but must obtain a grant of letters. The court did not intimate that the outgoing public administrator lost his official character in continuing the administration. On the contrary, the court seemed to entertain quite the opposite view. The court said: "At common law a sheriff was, after the expiration of his term, from a principle of convenience considered in some respects as an officer. He could finish some kinds of business which he had begun. And so it has been held in other states that an executor or administrator after his resignation or removal is to be treated, for purposes of settlement, remedies, etc., as administrators in office." With this view of the relation of the public administrator to estates being administered by him, we are to inquire whether he is entitled to the commission allowed to other administrators for services performed after his term of office has expired, in counties where he receives a salary. By section 159, subd. 10, County Government Act 1897 (St. 1897, p. 499, c. 277), the public administrator of Los Angeles county receives a salary of $3,000 per annum. Section 215 of that act (St. 1897, p. 572, c. 277) provides as follows: "The salaries and fees provided for in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers herein named, either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies and assistants, unless in this act otherwise provided, and all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals out of the salaries hereinbefore provided, unless in this act otherwise provided. * * *" Section 216 (St. 1897, p. 573, c. 277) is as follows: "All salaried officers of the several counties of this state shall charge and collect for the use of their respective counties and pay into the county treasury on the first Monday in each month the fees now or hereafter allowed by law in all cases, except where such fees, or percentage thereof is allowed such officers, and excepting also such fees as are a charge against the county." Section 217 (St. 1897, p. 573, c. 277) is as follows: "Each of the officers authorized to receive fees under the provisions of this act must keep a fee book * * * in which must be entered at once in detail all fees or compensations, of whatever nature, kind, or description, collected or chargeable. * * * On the expiration of the term of such officer, he must deliver all fee books kept by him to the county auditor." Section 226 (St. 1897, p. 575, c. 277) provides: "It shall be the duty of all officers in this act named to complete the business of their respective offices to the time of the expiration of their respective terms. * * * The only other statute bearing upon the question of the public administrator's compensation is section 1618 of the Code of Civil Procedure: '* * * Public administrators shall receive the same compensation and allowances as are allowed in this title to other administrators.'"

But for the provisions of the county government act, supra, making the public administrator of Los Angeles county a salaried officer, doubtless section 1618 would measure his compensation. The act, however, fixing his compensation by a salary, and directing him to keep a book, recording therein "all fees or compensation of whatever nature, kind or description," and also providing that he must pay monthly into the county treasury the fees allowed him in all cases, and declaring that his salary shall be in full compensation for all services, is a special act, and must control. Healy v. Superior Court, supra. Unless he ceases to be controlled by this act at the expiration of his term, which we do not think should be held, there is no law by which he can be paid for subsequent services. The contrary view contended for by appellant would offer strong inducements for the public administrator, who is a salaried officer, to delay the settlement of estates, by doing which he would draw a salary to the close of his term, and full compensation after his term had ended, for such estates as were not fully administered; and, besides, the county would be paying his successor the salary provided by law. Furthermore it would be a temptation to the successor to favor this practice, as it would relieve him from the labor and responsibility of caring for partly administered estates, and, besides, would be a practice profitable to him when he passed out of office.

Appellant insists that it was not only his right to continue his administration after his term closed, but that it was his duty, and that it is but just and fair to compensate him, since he was but performing a duty imposed upon him. In a sense it is true that, so long as his letters remained unrevoked, it was his right and duty to faithfully execute his trust, and, if there was no way by which he could have relieved himself of this trust, the equity of his claim for compensation under an implied promise might have some force. But it is not true that he had no means of relief. He knew at the November election whether he was to continue in office. He had two months in which to close the business and prepare to turn over his trust to his successor. He should have asked the court, by appropriate petition, to revoke his letters, resigning his appointment in estates remaining unadministered. He should have stated his accounts to the close of his term, and asked to be relieved from further performance of the trust. It would have been the duty of the court to settle his accounts, accept his resignation, revoke his letters, and direct his successor to take charge of the estate. See sections 1735 and 1726. If for any reason the successor could not act, the court should have appointed a special administrator. With this means of being relieved, if the outgoing officer still persists in continuing to administer, or refuses to relinquish his trust to his successor, he cannot be heard to complain if his services are regarded as voluntary, and he be denied the right to any compensation therefor, except such compensation as he had already received by way of salary.

Since the transcript was filed the parties have stipulated that in one of the estates administered by defendant he is charged with having received $175.85 in excess of the amount in fact received by him as fees and commissions, and that, if the judgment be affirmed, this amount should be deducted therefrom.

It is advised that the order be affirmed, and that the sum of $175.85 be deducted from the judgment, and, as thus diminished, it be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order is affirmed, and the sum of $175.85 deducted from the judgment, and, as thus diminished, it is affirmed: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.

CAMERON v. BURNHAM et al. (S. F. 3,551.)*

CONTRACTS—FULFILLMENT OF CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Civ. Code, § 1439, declares that before any party to an obligation can require another party to perform he must fulfill the conditions precedent imposed on himself. Plaintiff and others agreed to subscribe various sums to a fund to secure a lease and in prospecting certain land supposed to contain mineral; it being agreed that each subscriber should own an interest proportionate to his subscription. Thereafter the owner of the land granted to plaintiff and the others the right to enter on the land to prospect and mine for a certain term, the owner to receive a royalty, or the lessees were entitled to pay a sum in cash as full consideration for their rights. Plaintiff failed to make any of his payments, and after the discovery of mineral by the others he sued for a decree declaring him to be the owner of an interest. Held, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, he having forfeited his rights, it being immaterial whether the agreement executed by the owner was a lease or a mere mining privilege, and the statute of frauds having nothing to do with the case.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Suit by P. A. Cameron against J. R. Burnham and others. From a decree in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Powell and W. A. Dow, for appellant. W. B. Kollmyer and Wm. R. Davis, for respondents.

GRAY, C. This action is brought to obtain a decree that plaintiff is the owner of a one-ninth interest in a subterranean gold-bearing gravel channel upon a certain tract of land in Sacramento county, and for an accounting of all dealings in relation to said mine by and on behalf of an alleged mining partnership in which plaintiff claims to be a member. The judgment was for defendants, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The plaintiff and six others, who are made defendants herein, entered into a written agreement on May 17, 1901, wherein the tract of land in question is described, and it is recited that the parties to said agreement are desirous of leasing the mining rights and privileges on said land from W. B. Plumb, the owner thereof. Six of the parties, including the plaintiff, agreed to and did subscribe $500 each, and a seventh party to the contract, named J. R. Burnham, subscribed $1,500, making an entire fund of $4,500, "for the purpose of securing said lease and prospecting said land." It was agreed that "each subscriber shall own and be entitled to an interest in said lease and mining privilege in proportion as the amount he subscribes is to the whole amount subscribed, when the whole amount of said subscription shall have been paid up." It was also agreed that "said sums so subscribed shall be paid into the hands of said A. T. Eastland in payments of equal proportion to the sum subscribed at such time or times and in such sums as shall be designated and fixed by said A. T. Eastland. And if any subscriber shall fail, or refuse or neglect to make such payments at the time so designated by said A. T. Eastland and the same shall remain unpaid for the period of ten (10) days after the date set for such payment, and after the same should have been paid, then, and in that case, such delinquent subscriber or subscribers immediately forfeit all interest and rights in said lease and mining privileges and shall forfeit all moneys that he or they shall have paid under this agreement." On the day following the execution of the above agreement, May 18, 1901, said W. B. Plumb, one of the defendants herein, entered into an agreement with the plaintiff and other defendants for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the first agreement. It was agreed on the part of Plumb that he "hereby grants to said parties of the second part the exclusive right to enter upon the lands hereinafter described, and to prospect and mine the same for the term of six years from and after the 18th day of May, 1901." The right to use the land for agricultural and grazing purposes was reserved to the owner, Plumb. The second parties agreed to pay to the first party 15 per cent. "of the gross amount of all gold so extracted," or at their option in lieu of the above-named consideration they could within six months pay $10,000 as the full consideration for said "exclusive right and privilege to mine as aforesaid."

It appears from the evidence and findings that soon after the execution of these instruments, and in that same month of May, the said Eastland designated and fixed the sum of $100 to be paid by plaintiff and each of the other parties interested with him on account of their several subscriptions. One of the subscribing parties, James Wing, it appears had already paid the entire amount of his $500 subscription. The plaintiff and the other subscribing defendants, except Wing, were duly notified of the fixing of this $100 sum as due from each of them, and all of them paid up within the 10 days given them, except the plaintiff. The plaintiff refused and neglected to pay anything, and "persistently and willfully declined and refused to participate in, or to have anything to do with, the work, enterprise, or undertaking referred to in said agreements." Time and again he declared that he was out of it and was glad of it; that defendants were "a bad lot"; that he had "not paid in," and was not going to pay anything, or have anything at all to do with the matter. The court finds that "ever since the 21st day of May, 1901, the plaintiff has repudiated, disavowed, withdrawn from, deserted, and abandoned said work, enterprise, undertaking, agreements, and all the duties, obligations, options, and benefits thereof." In the meantime the other parties to the agreement, recognizing that plaintiff was "out of it," proceeded to prospect the ground at an expense to them of much more than the original amounts subscribed, and finally, as appears, in about October, 1901, struck a rich mine, and have since worked the same with considerable profit. Plaintiff has done nothing at any time and contributed nothing toward the discovery, development, or working of this mine.

On the foregoing facts we are of opinion that plaintiff was not entitled to the relief prayed for. The plaintiff is or was a party to both the contracts above referred to, and as they were both intended for the accomplishment of one purpose, so far as plaintiff is concerned, they should be construed together as one contract. The plaintiff, after having neglected and refused to perform any part of his agreement, after standing by for five months watching the other parties spending their money in search of this gold that no one knew existed, all the time declaring that he was "out of it," and would have nothing to do with it, doing what he could to discourage the enterprise, now seeks in this equitable action to compel the defendants to share with him the profits of their industry and expenditure of moneys. This he cannot do in a court of equity. He who asks equity must do equity. He who seeks to enforce a contract must show that he has complied with the conditions and agreements of the contract on his part to be performed. Civ. Code, § 1439. Plaintiff failed and refused to pay any part of the amounts he agreed to pay, and thereby by the very terms of the contract forfeited any right that he may ever have had in the property in dispute. It makes no difference whether we call the agreement executed by Plumb a lease or a mere "mining privilege," and the statute of frauds has nothing to do with the case. Plaintiff could have no rights in equity, and no right to be heard in a court of equity, until he did the equitable thing by his associates and performed his part of the agreement. To give him an interest in this mine and the proceeds thereof now would be the grossest injustice to his co-contractors. A court of equity will not countenance such an injustice. On the most familiar principles of equity it is clear that the trial court, sitting as a court of equity, was fully warranted in denying the plaintiff all relief.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

CLARK v. SUPREME COUNCIL OF ORDER OF CHOSEN FRIENDS et al. (S. F. 3,274.)

BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS — INSOLVENCY — DOMESTIC ATTACHING CREDITORS—RIGHTS OF—PREFERENCES — FOREIGN RECEIVER—ANCILLARY RECEIVER — APPOINTMENT—PLEADING.

As against domestic creditors of an insolvent foreign corporation, who have attached funds and money thereof situate in the state, and seized the same under executions on judgments obtained by them, an ancillary receiver will not be appointed, in an action by a foreign receiver of the corporation, to collect the funds and turn them over to such foreign receiver.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco.

Action by Cyrus J. Clark, receiver, etc., against the Supreme Council of the Order of Chosen Friends and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Rothchild & Ach and Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. F. D. Brandon, S. M. Ehrman, Martin Stevens, H. W. Hutton, and D. E. Besecker, for respondents.

GRAY, C. This action was brought by plaintiff, appointed by the superior court of a certain county in the state of Indiana as receiver of the above-named defendant, an insolvent fraternal insurance organization. The object of the action is to have an ancillary receiver appointed in California to take charge of certain moneys of the concern and turn them over to the plaintiff. The defendants had judgment in their favor on demurrers to the complaint, and plaintiff appeals from that judgment. The facts and law governing the case have already been considered by this court in Lackmann v. Supreme Council, etc., 142 Cal. 22, 75 Pac. 583. Little need be added here to what is said in that case. Here, as there, the defendants, as creditors of the defunct concern, have attached the funds and money in controversy in some instances, and in others have seized it under executions issued upon judgments which they have already obtained. That the defendants occupy the position of creditors is settled by the case cited. That they will not be compelled to surrender their claims to the property under the laws of this state in deference to the claims of a foreign receiver of this foreign corporation is also clearly decided in that case. The only difference between that case and this is that here an ancillary receiver is asked for, but only for the purpose of collecting the funds and turning them over to the Indiana receiver. This will indirectly accomplish the same purpose sought in the case cited. It will have the effect by legal process to transfer the funds to the hands of the Indiana receiver. This is contrary to the law of this state, as laid down in the California cases cited in Lackmann v. Supreme Council, supra. Our law prefers the claims of the domestic attaching creditors to those of foreign creditors or claimants, and this policy will be upheld against indirect as well as against direct attacks. The complaint sets forth the facts necessarily showing the claims of the defendants preferred under our law to those of plaintiff, and the demurrer to this complaint was therefore properly sustained.

No point seems to be made in appellant's brief to the effect that the complaint states a case for relief as to any books or assets of the defunct concern other than the money attached, and, on a careful examination of the complaint, we are unable to find any allegation that any of the defendants have in their possession any books or other assets of the concern, except the said money. The prayer of the complaint regarding records, books, papers, etc., is of no consequence in the absence of any allegation showing that some party to the suit has property of that description in its or his possession.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed. ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

PALOMARES LAND CO. v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (L. A. 1,590.)*

TAX SALES—REDEMPTION—VOLUNTARY PAYMENT—SCHOOL TAXES—PENALTIES—ASSESSMENTS.

1. Pol. Code, § 3817, as amended March, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 333, c. 218), giving the right to redeem real estate sold to the state for delinquent taxes by making payment of the taxes due thereon at the time of the sale, with penalties based thereon, is but an offer of the state to release its claims to the land on the terms mentioned, and, being accepted, the payment is voluntary, and cannot be recovered, though the sale was void.

2. District school taxes, as well as state and county taxes, are included in Pol. Code, § 3817, as amended March, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 333, c. 218), authorizing redemption of real estate sold to the state for delinquent taxes by payment of the amount of taxes due thereon at the time of the sale, with penalties based thereon.

3. Under Pol. Code, § 3817, as amended March, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 333, c. 218), requiring one redeeming real estate sold the state for taxes to pay, in addition to other sums, "for each year since the sale for which taxes on said land have not been paid, an amount equal to the percentage of taxes for that year on the value of the real estate assessed for that year, or, if not so assessed, then on the value of the property as assessed in the year nearest the time of such redemption," and penalties to be computed "on each year's taxes," reckoning from the time "when the lands would have been sold for that year if there had been no previous sale thereof," penalties are not required to be paid as respects taxes of any year subsequent to the sale in which there was no valid assessment of a tax against the property.

4. An assessment of real estate without deduction of amounts due on mortgages thereon is not void because thereof, but is an assessment to the wrong person, within Pol. Code, § 3628, declaring that no mistake in the name of the owner of land shall invalidate the assessment thereof.

5. An assessment is void, the description therein not being "sufficient to identify" the tract, as required by Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 2, though it was sufficient to enable the owner to know that such land was intended to be described.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 45, Cent. Dig. Taxation, § 720.]

6. Payment of amounts illegally exacted as a condition of redeeming lands is not voluntary, and may be recovered.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by the Palomares Land Company against the county of Los Angeles. Plaintiff had judgment for less than prayed, and appeals. Modified.

Lee & Scott and Lee, Scott, Bailey & Chase, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. D. Frederick, Dist. Atty., and W. J. James, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., for respondent.

SMITH, C. The suit was brought to recover money paid by plaintiff to respondent's treasurer, as penalties, etc., in redemption of lands sold to the state for taxes. No claim is made for repayment of the taxes themselves. The lands affected by the sale are in Los Angeles county, and consist of a tract of land owned by Mrs. Lugarda A. de Palomares in the Rancho San José, and of two tracts, elsewhere situated, owned by Concepcion de Avila and others. Both properties were assessed to Mrs. Palomares for the year 1895, but separately; and the following year the lands were sold to the state for the taxes levied on these assessments. There was also a claim for money paid under protest for taxes on the same lands for the year 1898; but this claim was found by the court to be barred by the statute of limitations, and no objection is made to this finding. The amount demanded by the plaintiff was $719.59, with interest, etc.; but the court gave it judgment for the sum of $192 only (which was held to be due on the auditor's estimate under the rules in San Diego Invest. Co. v. Shaffer, 137 Cal. 323, 70 Pac. 179), and costs. The plaintiff's appeal is from the judgment.

In the case cited the statutory provisions involved were—it is said by the court—those of section 3817 of the Political Code as amended in February, 1895. In this case they are those of the amendment of the following month. St. & Amend. 1895, pp. 22, 333, cc. 11, 218. But the provisions of the two acts are identical, except in the concluding sentences in each, relating to matters not here involved, and in the omission from the latter act of a clause of the former, requiring to be paid, in addition to "amount of taxes" and "interest," the "costs and expenses which may have accrued by reason of such delinquency and sale." Under this ruling the appellant was charged with the penalties for delinquency prescribed by the Political Code (section 3817, Amend. 1895, cited above), ranging from 80 to 20 per cent. on the taxes for the year of the sale, 1895, and the years 1896 and 1897; and it is claimed that this was erroneous, for the reason that the several assessments, and consequently the penalties, were in fact null and void. Failing this contention, it is further claimed that the provisions of the section cited, imposing penalties for delinquency, were not intended to apply to the district school taxes included in the several assessments, and that to this extent, at least, the estimates were wrong. In these contentions no distinction is made by the appellant's counsel between the assessments for the year 1895, for which the lands were sold, and those for subsequent years; but these will be considered separately, commencing with the former.

With regard to the taxes for 1895, we think the provisions of the law authorizing redemption (Pol. Code, § 3817) are to be regarded simply as an offer by the state to release its claims to the land sold upon the terms proposed, and, therefore, as applying to all sales, whether valid or otherwise. In the redemption, therefore, the state is to be regarded as asserting, and the redemptioner as admitting, the validity of the assessment and of the resulting title of the state. Thus far, therefore, the payment of the taxes by the plaintiff was simply the acceptance of an offer of the state which it was at liberty to decline, and hence purely voluntary. This, we think, accords with the obvious intention of the act, for otherwise—according to the appellant's contention—in the case of a sale technically void, the effect of the act would be to permit a redemption without paying either penalties, costs, or taxes, which would be to devolve upon the county auditor the judicial function of determining the validity of the assessment and of the title of the state, and the power to make on behalf of the state, without consideration, "a deed of reconveyance" of its title, if regarded by him as invalid. Nor is the language of the act consistent with such a construction. For upon this theory there would be no sale to redeem from, nor money to be paid; and hence the language of the act would be inapplicable. It is clear, therefore, that the payment of the "amount of taxes" due at the time of the sale is made by the act an essential condition of redemption; and, as this is the principal sum on which the percentages described in the act are to be estimated (San Diego v. Shaffer, 137 Cal. 325, 70 Pac. 179), it follows that the payment of the prescribed penalty is equally a condition. Nor in the application of this provision can any distinction be made between the state and county and district school tax. For the last constitutes, within the plain intent of the act, part of "the amount of taxes due * * * at the time of the sale"; and it is to this, as we have in effect held, that the provision imposing the penalty obviously refers.

It is to be observed, however, that the auditor's estimate includes the 15 and 5 per cent. penalties imposed by section 3756 of the Political Code, and also the costs imposed by section 3770, with interest and percentage for redemption, which, under the provisions of section 3817, as amended in March, 1895 (St. 1895, p. 333, c. 218), and the decision in San Diego Invest. Co., supra, was unwarranted; and also that the same errors were made with regard to the taxes for the subsequent years 1896 and 1897. But we suppose, and hence assume, that the sums thus erroneously charged and paid are included in the amount of $191 allowed by the court, and that the errors were thus corrected. This leaves us to consider only the penalties for redemption for the years following the year of the first assessment, the validity of which will depend upon provisions of the statute other than those we have been considering, namely: Those of section 3817 of the Political Code, as to the principal amounts to be paid, and those relating to the penalties. As to the former, the statute requires the redemptioner, in addition to "the amount of taxes due * * * at the time of the sale," etc., to pay "also, for each year since the sale for which taxes on said land have not been paid, an amount equal to the percentage of taxes for that year, upon the value of the real estate as assessed for that year, or, if not so assessed, then upon the value of the property as assessed in the year nearest the time of such redemption." As to the latter, the provisions are: "The penalty shall be computed upon the amount of each year's taxes in like manner, reckoning from the time when the lands would have been sold for that year, if there had been no previous sale thereof."

Under the former of the provisions quoted, two cases are presented, namely: The case where the property has been assessed for the year referred to, and the case where it has not been assessed for that year. In the former case, the redemptioner is required to pay "an amount equal to the percentage of taxes," upon the value of the property as assessed, which is but to say "the taxes assessed"; for the taxes are assessed, or rather levied, by simply applying to the assessed value the rate as ascertained under the provisions of sections 3696, 3714, and 1837 of the Political Code, and this function, which is performed by the auditor, is purely ministerial. Pol Code, §§ 3731, 3715. The expression used is, therefore, to be regarded as equivalent to the expression in the section as it now stands, to wit, "all unpaid taxes of every description assessed against the property for each year since the sale"; and, while both expressions are sufficiently clear, the former is clearly the more accurate. We find, therefore, with regard to each year subsequent to the sale, two classes of cases provided for by the act, namely: Those of taxes assessed against the property, and those of unassessed property. To the former case the penalty clause obviously applies; but we think it equally clear that it cannot be regarded as applying to the latter. For, having regard to the language used, the penalty is to be computed upon "each year's taxes," and, properly speaking, there are no taxes upon unassessed land; and that the word "taxes" is here used in its proper sense, is shown by the provision following: That the penalty shall be computed "from the time when the land would have been sold for the taxes of that year, if there had been no previous sale thereof"—which, with regard to unassessed land, would be an impossible contingency. Still less can we suppose the intention of the Legislature to have been to impose a penalty upon any one for not paying money which, until assessment, he was under no obligation, legal or moral, to pay.

The question, therefore, is, whether the plaintiff is to be assigned to the one or to the other of the two categories referred to in the act; and this question, we think, is to be determined by the question of the validity or nonvalidity of the assessment in each case. For, if the assessment was void, there was no obligation on the plaintiff to pay it, and consequently no ground for a penalty. To the validity of the assessments, numerous objections are made, but of these two only apply to the assessments now under consideration. One of these, which applies to all the assessments in question, is that the property in each case was assessed without regard to mortgage liens; the other, applying only to the San José land, that the description in each assessment is fatally insufficient. In support of the former point the decision in Knott v. Peden, 84 Cal. 299, 24 Pac. 160, is cited, where it was held that such assessments are void; but this decision was in effect overruled in the later case of Henne v. Los Angeles Co., 129 Cal. 297, 61 Pac. 1081, and, upon the authority of that case, we think it must be held that the failure of the assessor to deduct the amounts due on the mortgages did not render the assessment void. And this, on principle, seems to be correct; for the error of the assessor in such case is simply that of assessing real property to the wrong person, as to which it is provided: "No mistake in the name of the owner or supposed owner of real property shall render the assessment thereof invalid." Pol. Code, § 3628; Lake County v. S. B. Q. M. Co., 66 Cal. 17, 4 Pac. 876.

As to the assessments of the San José land, it appears from the findings that in each of them the metes and bounds given, or most of them, are false; and it is expressly alleged and found that the description given in the assessment is not "sufficient to identify said tract." In this, therefore, the assessor has failed to observe the express provisions of the law, which required him to describe the land "by metes and bounds or other description sufficient to identify it"; and it cannot, we think, be doubted, that the assessment was wholly void. Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 2; People v. Mahoney, 55 Cal. 286; Harvey v. Meyer, 117 Cal. 60, 48 Pac. 1014; Miller v. Williams, 135 Cal. 184, 67 Pac. 788; Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 737, 78 Pac. 293; Cen. P. R. R. Co. v. Nevada, 162 U. S. 524, 525, 16 Sup. Ct. 885, 40 L. Ed. 1057. In the cases cited it is held that a stricter rule is applied in the case of tax deeds than others; and in the first case cited it is held that "evidence aliunde to render (the description) certain" is inadmissible. The latter point has, perhaps, been overruled in Best v. Wohlford, supra. But, in view of the finding, neither of the propositions asserted in the former cases need be resorted to here. It is, indeed, found by the court that the descriptions were "sufficient to enable the owners of said land to know that the land was intended to be described in said assessments, and * * * sufficient to enable them to pay the taxes on said land before delinquency." But this finding we regard as immaterial. It is, indeed, said in Bosworth v. Danzien, 25 Cal. 300, that "the test * * * to which every false call occurring in the course of tax proceedings is to be subjected is: Has it probably had the effect to mislead the landowner in relation to the land assessed, advertised, and sold?" But this is to be understood as assuming that the description be sufficient to identify the land. 1 Cooley on Tax'n, 744, 775. The same observation may be made as to what is said in Best v. Wohlford, supra.

It follows that the penalties for redeeming the land in the San José ranch, assessed to Mrs. Palomares, were illegally exacted, and that these sums, aggregating $162.60, should have been allowed the plaintiff in addition to the amount adjudged it by the lower court. As to the amounts thus to be adjudged, we have no doubt they may be recovered under the provisions of section 3804 of the Political Code. But, were it otherwise, the result would be the same; for these amounts were illegally exacted from the plaintiff as a condition of availing itself of a right given it by the state. The payments, therefore, cannot be regarded as in any sense voluntary.

We advise that the judgment appealed from be modified by inserting therein in lieu of the sum of $192, therein adjudged to the plaintiff, the sum of $354.60, and that the judgment as thus modified be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is modified by inserting therein, in lieu of the sum of $192, therein adjudged to the plaintiff, the sum of $354.60, and the judgment as thus modified is affirmed: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

In re ASHLEY. (Cr. 1,256.)

ATTORNEYS — DISBARMENT — SUPREME COURT—JURISDICTION—ORIGINAL PROCEEDING — ACCUSATION BY PRIVATE PARTY—WHERE INSTITUTED—PRACTICE.

1. While, under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 287, the Supreme Court has both original and appellate jurisdiction of proceedings for the disbarment of an attorney for alleged breach of professional duty, it will entertain the accusation as an original proceeding only when the prosecution is instituted by a bar association, or other public body, in the public interest.

2. Where the accuser is a private person, alleging misconduct prejudicial to himself, the proceeding should be instituted and the issues tried in the superior court of the county where the misconduct is alleged to have occurred.

In Bank. Proceeding for the disbarment of Arthur H. Ashley. Dismissed without prejudice.

PER CURIAM. This is an accusation by a private party charging an attorney at law with breach of professional duty, and seeking his disbarment. This court has both original and appellate jurisdiction in such cases. Code Civ. Proc. § 287. But it declines to entertain the accusation as an original proceeding except when the prosecution has been instituted by a bar association, or other public body, in the public interest. When the accuser is a private person, alleging misconduct prejudicial to himself, it is more convenient and more appropriate in every way that the proceeding should be instituted and the issues tried in the superior court of the county where the misconduct is alleged to have occurred, and where it is to be presumed the witnesses reside.

For these reasons the proceeding here is dismissed without prejudice.

PEOPLE v. HELWIG. (Cr. 1,137.)

ARSON—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On a trial for arson defendant was charged with setting fire to a building in which he had personal property insured for $500. The property was not injured, and was later sold for $50. The buyer, a secondhand dealer, testified as a witness for the state that defendant wanted $50 for the goods. On cross-examination he testified that the goods were worth $100. Held, that the court did not err in excluding evidence on cross-examination as to the original value of the goods, and in not permitting defendant to call the witness for the sole purpose of asking him what they were worth when new to remove the impression that the goods were insured in an excessive amount.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; John C. Gray, Judge.

August Helwig was convicted of arson, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Gardner, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. Defendant was convicted of arson, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. There are no points and authorities or brief on behalf of appellant on file, and at the oral argument his counsel did not contend that the evidence does not support the verdict, or that the trial court erred in instructing the jury, or in any respect other than in two rulings made in respect to the testimony of the witness J. W. Jewell. The building which appellant was charged with burning was occupied by him as a lodging house and restaurant, and he had in it some personal property which he had insured a few days before the fire for $500. This personal property was not injured by the fire, which was extinguished before any considerable damage was done; and the prosecution called the said witness Jewell, who testified that a few days after the fire he bought all this personal property from appellant for $50. Now, the argument of appellant's counsel is that the court afterwards refused to allow him to prove the value of the property at the time it was insured, and thus remove the impression that it was insured for more than its value. But the record does not show any foundation for this argument. Appellant was not prevented from showing the value of the property at the time of the insurance. The appellant himself as a witness testified, over the objection of the prosecution, very fully as to the value of the property, and that it had cost him nearly $800; and it was shown that the insurance agent had examined the property when he fixed $500 as its value. The witness Jewell, after testifying that he was a dealer in secondhand furniture, was asked by the prosecution to state "what you paid for the property, and how you arrive at the price; that is, your conversation with Mr. Helwig." He testified that he went to see Helwig, and asked him what he would take for the property, and Helwig said $50, whereupon witness gave him the money and took a bill of sale. Then on cross-examination appellant's counsel asked him, "What do you consider the value of that property?" To this question the prosecution objected, but the objection was overruled, and the witness went on to testify on the subject, saying that it was worth about $100. After a number of questions by appellant's counsel and answers by witness, the latter was asked, "Could you buy them in the market for that price?" to which the district attorney objected that "It does not tend to prove value, and is not cross-examination," and the objection was overruled. Afterwards the witness said, "Do you mean could I go and purchase that same amount of goods new from some retail dealer?" and counsel for appellant said, "No, those goods secondhand, used, in the condition they were," to which witness said that he could. Thereupon counsel for appellant said, "I wanted the original value," and then the court said, "Objection sustained." It is clear from this record that the objection to the testimony of the witness to the actual value of the property as secondhand furniture was overruled, and that the only question excluded was as to the "original value." Afterwards the appellant called the said Jewell as his own witness, and simply asked him the direct question, referring to the said personal property, "What is it worth new?" and the objection of the prosecution to the question that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent was by the court sustained. Upon these rulings of the court touching the testimony of the witness Jewell appellant bases his sole contention for a reversal of the judgment. But we do not think that these rulings constitute good ground for reversal. The question asked Jewell when he was a witness for the prosecution was not proper cross-examination. When he was a witness for appellant the sole question asked him was as to the value of the property when new. The issue was the value of the property as secondhand property at the time of the insurance—not its value when new. It may be that, where an adverse witness has testified to the value of secondhand property, it would be proper to ask him on cross-examination what its value was when new for the purpose of testing his general knowledge of the subject, but it was not proper as an original and isolated question asked by appellant of his own witness. Moreover, taking the whole case together, it is evident that the said rulings of the court as to the testimony of the witness Jewell, even if they could be considered as erroneous, were not of sufficient importance to have been prejudicial to appellant, or to afford just grounds for a new trial.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

FRENCH et al. v. SENATE OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA. (Sac. 1,395.)

STATES — LEGISLATURE — EXPULSION OF MEMBERS—INTERFERENCE BY COURTS—RULES OF LEGISLATURE — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — DUE PROCESS OF LAW—DEPRIVATION OF OFFICE—BILLS OF ATTAINDER—PLEADING—EFFECT OF DEMURRER—EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

1. Under Const. art. 3, providing that one department of the state shall not exercise the functions of either of the other departments, the judiciary cannot revise even the most arbitrary and unfair action of the Legislature, or of either house thereof, taken in pursuance of the power inherent in the Legislature, and recognized by Const. art. 4, § 9, to expel a member thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 10, Cent. Dig. Constitutional Law, §§ 129–132.]

2. Under Const. art. 3, prohibiting any person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of the departments of government to exercise any functions pertaining to either of the others, except as expressly authorized by the Constitution, a session of the Legislature which has adjourned sine die cannot be reconvened upon mandate of the judiciary, nor be in any way again called together, except in special session and at the behest of the Governor, as provided by Const. art. 4, § 2, and article 5, § 9, authorizing the Governor to specially convene the Legislature on extraordinary occasions.

3. When the Senate has expelled a member, it cannot reinstate him except when lawfully called in session.

4. Even if the court should attempt to encroach upon the Legislature and compel the Senate by mandamus to reinstate expelled members, it could not make its process effective where, prior to the issuance thereof, the Senate has adjourned sine die, and will be composed of different persons, and will be a different body, from that served with the original process, when it next convenes in regular session.

5. It is not necessary to plead facts of which the court will take judicial notice, but such facts will be considered by the court although not pleaded.

6. Allegations of a pleading which are unnecessary and which are contrary to facts of which judicial notice is taken are not admitted by demurrer, but will be treated as a nullity.

7. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 3, providing that courts take judicial notice of public and private official acts of the Legislature, the court will take judicial notice of proceedings entered upon the journal of the Senate by which members have been expelled.

8. In mandamus proceedings to compel the Senate to reinstate expelled members it will be presumed, in the absence of a direct allegation to the contrary, that the petitioners had notice of the expulsion proceedings which appear spread upon the journals of the Senate, and that they were allowed as members to participate therein.

9. The Senate may adopt any procedure and change it at any time and without notice, and cannot tie its own hands by establishing unchangeable rules.

10. Senators who have been expelled by the Senate in the manner prescribed by the Constitution and in the exercise of the power therein given are not deprived of the right to office without due process of law, in violation of U. S. Const. Amend. 14.

11. Const. art. 4, § 35, declaring that any member of the Legislature who is influenced in his official action by any reward or promise thereof is guilty of a felony, and providing that upon conviction he shall be forever disqualified from holding any public office or public trust, does not have any effect whatever upon the power expressly given the Legislature to expel its members by section 9 of the same article, in case of the exercise of that power because of the guilt of the expelled member of bribery.

12. A resolution of the Senate resulting in the expulsion of a member is not a bill of attainder within the inhibition of U. S. Const. art. 1, § 10, and State Const. art. 1, § 16.

In Bank. Original proceedings in mandamus by Frank French and others against the Senate of the State of California, Thirty-Sixth Session. Writ denied.

Geo. D. Collins, H. V. Morehouse, J. E. Alexander, F. C. Jacobs, and Wm. F. James, for petitioners. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus to compel the Senate of the state of California to admit the petitioners as members thereof. The case was submitted to this court upon a general demurrer to the petition, and the writ denied.

The petitioners were duly elected senators of the state from the respective districts which they represent, and each duly qualified and acted as a member of the Senate at the thirty-sixth regular session until the 27th day of February, 1905, when they were by the Senate expelled therefrom for malfeasance in office, consisting of taking a bribe to influence their conduct as senators. Since then they have not been allowed to sit as members of the Senate nor to participate in its proceedings. It is alleged in the petition that in the proceedings expelling the petitioners the Senate did not give them a hearing, nor afford them a trial upon the charges made, nor permit them to make any defense thereto; that the charges of bribery upon which they were expelled are false; and that neither of them has been convicted of such crime.

Even if we should give these allegations their fullest force in favor of the pleader, they do not make a case justifying the interposition of this court. Under our form of government the judicial department has no power to revise even the most arbitrary and unfair action of the legislative department, or of either house thereof, taken in pursuance of the power committed exclusively to that department by the Constitution. It has been held by high authority that, even in the absence of an express provision conferring the power, every legislative body in which is vested the general legislative power of the state has the implied power to expel a member for any cause which it may deem sufficient. In Hiss v. Bartlett, 69 Mass. 473, 63 Am. Dec. 768, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts says in substance that this power is inherent in every legislative body; that it is necessary to enable the body "to perform its high functions, and is necessary to the safety of the state"; that it is a power of self-protection, and that the legislative body "must necessarily be the sole judge of the exigency which may justify and require its exercise." In this state the power does not depend on implication; it is expressly given; or, as the power would exist without the express grant, perhaps it is more accurate to say that it is expressly recognized and limited. The Constitution provides that the Senate "shall determine the rule of its proceeding, and may, with the concurrence of two-thirds of all the members elected, expel a member." Article 4, § 9. If this provision were omitted, and there were no other constitutional limitations on the power, the power would nevertheless exist, and could be exercised by a majority. The only effect of the provision is to make the concurrence of two-thirds of the members elected necessary to its exercise. In all other respects it is absolute. The Legislature is a co-ordinate department of the state government. By article 3 of the Constitution it is provided that one department of the state shall not exercise the functions of either of the other departments, except as in that instrument expressly directed and permitted. There is no provision authorizing courts to control, direct, supervise, or forbid the exercise by either house of the power to expel a member. These powers are functions of the legislative department, and, therefore, in the exercise of the power thus committed to it, the Senate is supreme. An attempt by this court to direct or control the Legislature, or either house thereof, in the exercise of the power, would be an attempt to exercise legislative functions, which it is expressly forbidden to do.

Even if the court should attempt to usurp this legislative function, there is no means whereby it could carry its judgment into effect and give the relief demanded. The thirty-sixth session of the Legislature has adjourned sine die; it is a thing past, and cannot be reconvened upon the mandate of the judicial power. Const. art. 3. The Senate could not reinstate the petitioners as members of that session except when lawfully in session. Nor can the body which composed the thirty-sixth session be again called together except in special session and at the behest of the Governor. Const. art. 4, § 2; article 5, § 9. The next regular session of the Senate will be composed of different persons and will be a different body from that now supposed to be before the court. The court is without power to issue its final process against a body not lawfully served with its original process and which has not submitted itself to its jurisdiction. Moreover, before the next session convenes, the terms of all the petitioners except Wright will have expired. The court cannot issue any effective mandate to reinstate the petitioners as members of the Senate.

We think it is proper to say further, out of respect to a co-ordinate department of the government, that, notwithstanding the arbitrary action apparently charged against the Senate by the language of the petition, we cannot give the statements therein contained their full force. Ordinarily, when a case is submitted on a demurrer, all the facts stated in the pleadings demurred to are taken as true. To this rule there are some exceptions, one of which is important here. Only those facts are admitted by a demurrer which it is necessary to allege in the pleading. It is not necessary to allege facts of which the court will take judicial notice. Such facts will be considered by the court although not pleaded. 12 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 1; 1 Chitty, Pl. 215, 217, 218; People v. Mahaney, 13 Mich. 481; Mullan v. State, 114 Cal. 581, 46 Pac. 670, 34 L. R. A. 262; Bliss, Code Pl. 177, 194. Those allegations of a pleading which are not necessary, and which are contrary to the facts of which judicial notice is taken, are not admitted by a demurrer, but are to be treated as a nullity. 12 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 1; 1 Chitty, Pl. 215; Mullan v. State, supra; Ohm v. San Francisco, 92 Cal. 449, 28 Pac. 580. The courts take judicial notice of the public and private official acts of the legislative department of the state. Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 3; Mullan v. State, supra; Davis v. Whidden, 117 Cal. 623, 49 Pac. 766. Among these official acts are included the proceedings by which the petitioners were expelled and which are entered upon the journal of the Senate. We are therefore bound to take notice that charges were preferred against the petitioners in the Senate and were referred by it to a committee for investigation; that the committee reported that it had made the investigation and that the charges were true, and recommended that the petitioners be expelled; that this report was taken up and considered by the Senate; that the petitioners, being then members, had upon such consideration an opportunity to present, or have presented, arguments in their behalf; and that the resolution expelling them was regularly offered and adopted by the Senate. There being no direct allegation to the contrary, we must presume that the petitioners had notice of these proceedings, and that they were allowed as members to participate therein. In view of these facts, we cannot consider the allegations of the petition as imputing to the Senate the arbitrary and unfair treatment of the petitioners which might be inferred from the language used, but will rather consider them as a statement of the conclusion of the pleaders that the proceedings taken, of which we take judicial notice, did not constitute a trial or hearing, and did not give them the opportunity to be heard in their own behalf, which they believe they were entitled to have.

There is no averment that the manner of the proceeding was contrary to the rules established. And even if it were as abrupt as the interpretation of the pleading most favorable to the petitioners would imply, the matter would be immaterial. The Senate has power to adopt any procedure, and to change it at any time and without notice. It cannot tie its own hands by establishing rules which, as a matter of power purely, it cannot at any time change and disregard. Its action in any given case is the only criterion by which to determine the rule of proceeding adopted for that case. There is no constitutional provision giving to the petitioners the right to have a trial and opportunity to be heard upon the charges made against them in the Senate other than that which they have received.

The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not affect the case, nor have its provisions been violated by the action of the Senate. While it is true that, so far as private persons are concerned, the right to hold a public office duly conferred upon an individual has many of the attributes of private property, and is protected by the law of the land, yet, as between the officeholder and the sovereign power, such right is not violated when the proper governmental authority, acting in pursuance of a power expressly given to it by the fundamental law, has removed such person from the office. Matter of Carter, 141 Cal. 319, 74 Pac. 997. The sovereign power which created the office can also fix the terms upon which it is held, and can delegate the power of removal. The title is held subject to the conditions thus imposed. The relations between the body politic and its officers are not in this particular essentially different from those existing between a private person and his servants. Although there may be a difference as to the liability for damages for a dismissal without cause, the right or power to dismiss always exists. The Senate having expelled the petitioners in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, in the exercise of the power therein given, it is not true that they have been deprived of the right to the office without due process of law.

With respect to the possible abuse of such power, the case is analogous to that of the President of the United States with respect to officers of the United States subject to arbitrary removal by him. In regard to this the Supreme Court of the United States says that the only restraint upon the abuse of the power "must consist in the responsibility of the President, under his oath of office, to act as shall be for the general benefit and welfare." Shurtleff v. U. S., 189 U. S. 317, 23 Sup. Ct. 535, 47 L. Ed. 828. The same is true of the power of the Senate here under consideration. The oath of each individual member of the Senate, and his duty under it to act conscientiously for the general good, is the only safeguard to the fellow members against an unjust and causeless expulsion. This is the only practical rule that can be adopted as to those unrestricted governmental powers which are necessary to the exercise of governmental functions, and which must be lodged somewhere. Each department of the state is necessarily vested with some power which is beyond the supervision of any other department, and in such cases the only protection against abuse is the conscience of the individual in whom the power is vested. The decisions holding that, where a power is given to remove an officer "for cause" without requiring any previous notice or any hearing, such notice must nevertheless be given and a hearing had, have been disapproved in this state. Matter of Carter, supra. But, in any event, they clearly have no application to the present case, where the power to remove is, as we have seen, inherent and necessary to the exercise of the functions of the body possessing it, and are given without limitation or restriction.

It is claimed that the power to expel for bribery is, by section 35, art. 4, limited to those cases in which the member has been convicted of the crime defined in that section. The section provides that any member of the Legislature who is influenced in his official action by any reward or promise thereof is guilty of a felony, and that upon conviction he shall be forever disqualified from holding any office or public trust. It is obvious that this section was not intended to have any effect whatever upon the power to expel members of the Legislature given by section 9 of the same article. The two provisions are entirely independent, and are made for different objects and purposes. The power to expel is given to enable the legislative body to protect itself against participation in its proceedings by persons whom it judges unworthy to be members thereof, and affects only the rights of such persons to continue to act as members. The provision of section 35 defines a certain crime, and prescribes the effect of a judgment of conviction thereof upon the subsequent status as a citizen of the person found guilty. A resolution of the Senate expelling a member, whether for bribery or for some other offense, or improper conduct, is not the equivalent of the conviction of the person of the crime set forth in the charges against him.

The proposition that a resolution or other action of the Senate resulting in the expulsion of a member is in substance a bill of attainder, and therefore a violation of section 16, art. 1, of the state Constitution, and of section 10, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, is scarcely worthy of notice. The charges upon which a member is expelled may or may not constitute a charge of crime, but the resolution expelling him has not the force of law, and it cannot by any stretch of construction be denominated a bill of attainder. At common law "a bill of attainder was a legislative conviction for an alleged crime, followed by a prescribed punishment therefor, with judgment of death." And, even where a milder punishment was inflicted, its effect was an extinction of civil and political rights and capacities. Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) 368. The resolution of expulsion has no effect upon the rights of the member expelled further than to terminate his right to sit as a member of the legislative body, and it bears no just resemblance to a bill of attainder.

We find no ground upon which the application of the petitioners can be supported, and we are of the opinion that the writ was properly denied.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; LORIGAN, J.

*Rehearing denied May 17, 1905.

its president to establish the equitable title of the bank to certain shares of railroad stock alleged to have been received by the president to the use of the bank in lieu of other shares, until after demand on the directors to bring suit, was obviated by the filing of a cross-complaint by the bank, in whose favor judgment was rendered.

4. In an action by a bank depositor against the bank and its president to establish the equitable title of the bank to certain shares of railroad stock, the bank filed a cross-complaint, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff and the bank, directing a sale of the stock, and the distribution of the proceeds to the president, in the amount of his disbursements, with interest, and to the bank the balance after payment of plaintiff's costs and expenditures for counsel fees. Held, that a contention of the president that the judgment was inequitable to him, because, in taking the bonds and the stocks, which he was required to take with them, he incurred obligations by which he might have been damnified, was untenable, where he made no claim that he was in fact in any way injured, and made no attempt to show that there were any existing liabilities against which he should be indemnified.

5. Where the court on appeal assumed, in favor of the president, that the market value of the bonds was as claimed by him, error in the rejection of evidence of their value was harmless as to him.

6. Where evidence was erroneously excluded on the issue whether the sale to the president was ratified by the bank, the error was harmless as to the president; the fact being itself insufficient to establish his contention, and there being no other evidence.

7. The erroneous rejection of evidence on the issue whether the president was chargeable with actual or merely constructive fraud was harmless as to him; the decision of the court resting, not on the theory of actual fraud, but on the fact that the president procured the stock while acting as trustee and agent of the bank, such being, under Civ. Code, § 2229, providing that a trustee may not use or deal with the trust property for his own profit or for any other purpose unconnected with the trust in any manner, and section 2234, providing that every violation of the article is a fraud against the beneficiary of the trust, and established equitable principles, a constructive or quasi fraud.

Action by P. F. Dundon against J. M. McDonald and others. From the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial, McDonald appeals. Affirmed.

Roger Johnson, for appellant. W. T. Baggett, J. Stephens, and Curtis Hillyer, for respondent Dundon. Gavin McNab, for respondent Pacific Bank.

SMITH, C. The plaintiff is one of the depositors of the defendant bank, of which, since April, 1894, the defendant McDonald has been president, and the other defendants directors. Since some time in June, 1893, the bank has been in liquidation under the bank commissioner's act of March 30, 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 740, c. 481), and its amendments. The suit was brought by the plaintiff on behalf of himself and other depositors, and its object, or at least its main object, was to assert the equitable title of the bank to 156 shares of stock of the Los Angeles Railway Company, which had been received by the defendant McDonald in lieu of 150 shares of stock in the Los Angeles Consolidated Electric Railway Company, to whose property interests the former company had succeeded. The stock in the latter company prior to August 1, 1895, had belonged to the defendant bank, and the claim of the plaintiff and the bank is that it was acquired by McDonald under such circumstances as to make him constructively the trustee of the latter. The findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff and the defendant bank, and provision was made in the judgment for the sale of the stock, and the payment of the proceeds as therein directed; that is to say, to the defendant McDonald $67,715.76, being the amount of his disbursements on account of the stock, with interest, less receipts on account of dividends; to the plaintiff, the amount of his costs and of his expenditures for counsel fees, etc.; and to the defendant bank, the balance. The defendant McDonald appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

McDonald deraigns title to the stock in question through one S. G. Murphy, to whom, for the consideration of $75,000, the stock was assigned by the Pacific Bank. But it is found by the court, in effect, that Murphy's purchase of the stock was on the account and for the use of McDonald, and the principal question in the case is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify this finding of the court. On this point the following facts either appear from the documentary evidence or are undisputed: In July, 1895, the Pacific Bank was indebted to the National Bank of Commerce of New York in the sum of about $97,000, for which the latter bank held as security the stock in question and other collaterals, with about $30,000 previously collected by Murphy, who was its agent in this city; and in the latter part of that month a proposition was made by McDonald to Murphy, and accepted by the latter, to pay to the creditor bank in settlement of its claim the sum of $90,000; Murphy agreeing to take the stock in question for the sum of $90,000, and McDonald, to guaranty him against loss. And in pursuance of this agreement the following writings were executed, namely: Of date August 1, 1895, the note of McDonald to Murphy for the sum of $75,000, for the use of the First National Bank of San Francisco, of which the latter was president; a check from McDonald to Murphy for the amount of the note, and the Pacific Bank's assignment of the stock to Murphy, executed by its secretary. Of date August 2, 1895, an order of Murphy upon the Bank of California, the custodian of the bonds, to deliver them to McDonald. And of date August 3, 1895, Murphy's check on the First National Bank in favor of the Bank of Commerce for $90,000. The transaction, according to the testimony of Murphy, was closed, and the documents of date August 1st and 2d delivered, on the latter date; and at the same time the collaterals and cash in the hands of Murphy to the credit of the Pacific Bank were returned to it.

So far there is no dispute. But as to the date and terms of the arrangement between Murphy and McDonald which was thus consummated there is some discrepancy in their statements. The original agreement between them, of some 15 days' prior date, was that, upon Murphy's taking the bonds, McDonald would guaranty him against loss; but, according to the testimony of both, this arrangement was modified by McDonald's agreeing to take the bonds. The latter agreement, McDonald says, was made at Murphy's instance, after the original agreement had been consummated, and the title to the bonds vested in him. But Murphy testified that it was made at McDonald's instance on or before the 1st day of August; and his testimony on this point is conclusively confirmed, and that of McDonald refuted, by the note and check of the latter, both of which were of date August 1st, and therefore prior to the consummation of the transaction on August 2d. It appears, therefore, from the dates of the several transactions, that the purchase money was in fact advanced by McDonald. Nor can it be claimed there is anything in the evidence to rebut the legal presumption thus arising (Civ. Code, § 853), or at least anything of a very convincing character. The conclusion is therefore irresistible that the purchase was made by Murphy on account of McDonald; and this accords with his testimony in the former suit, referred to in his answer, where he says, in effect, that Murphy refused to buy the bonds, but took them on his (McDonald's) account, or that of the bank. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the finding of the court on this point was fully justified by the evidence.

We are also of the same opinion with regard to the finding of the court that the transaction—that is, the purchase by McDonald—was not ratified by the bank. The settlement with the Bank of Commerce, and the sale of the bonds to Murphy as part thereof, were ratified by the board of directors, but the fact of McDonald's purchase was not reported to the board; nor, with the possible exception of one director, who was attorney for McDonald, does it appear that the fact was known to any one until afterwards. Indeed, the only directors who appeared as witnesses, with the exception above stated, testified they did not become cognizant of the fact until afterwards. Their subsequent knowledge of the fact is immaterial, unless in connection with their failure to act, as justifying the finding of the court that a request by the plaintiff to the directors to bring the suit would have been unavailing.

Other points urged by the appellant are that the plaintiff could not maintain the action until after demand upon the directors to bring the suit, that the judgment is inequitable and unfair to the appellant, and that the court erred in excluding evidence of the value of the stock at the time of the sale. As to the first proposition—assuming for the purposes of the decision that the failure of the demand was not excused by the facts alleged in the amended complaint and found by the court—we are of opinion that the objection was obviated by the filing of the cross-complaint of the defendant bank, in whose favor the judgment is. Possibly that defendant might have objected to the judgment in favor of the plaintiff for his costs, etc., but it has not done so, and in that matter the appellant is not interested. As to the second point, the objection of the appellant is that in taking the bonds and the stocks, which he was required to take with them, he incurred obligations by which he might have been damnified. But he does not claim that he has in fact been in any way injured, nor did he attempt to show there were any existing liabilities, against which he should be indemnified. As to the evidence excluded, there can be no doubt that it was material to certain issues in the case—"as, for instance, whether the sale to McDonald was ratified by the corporation, or whether he should be charged with actual fraud or merely constructive fraud" (Dundon v. McDonald, 137 Cal. 4, 69 Pac. 499), and it should therefore have been admitted; but the only consequence of its exclusion is that it must be assumed in favor of the appellant that the market value of the bonds was as claimed by him, and this we have assumed. But with regard to ratification, this fact was itself insufficient to establish the appellant's contention, and there was in fact no other evidence; and, with regard to the issue of actual fraud, the decision of the court rests, not upon that theory, but upon the fact that the appellant procured the stock while acting as trustee and agent of the bank, which, under the provisions of the Code and established equitable principles, was a constructive or quasi fraud. Civ. Code, §§ 2229, 2234; Golson v. Dunlap, 73 Cal. 159, 14 Pac. 576, and authorities cited.

STILWELL v. CUTTER et al. (S. F. 3,268.)*

BROKERS—TRANSACTIONS WITH PRINCIPAL—SALES ON MARGINS—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID—CREDITS.

1. A transaction by which defendants purchased for plaintiff's account 200 shares of the capital stock of a corporation, which were not delivered and were not intended to be delivered at the time of the purchase, defendants receiving only a percentage of the purchase price sufficient to secure them against any loss which might result from the decline in value of the stock, with an understanding that they should retain the shares as security for such balance and sell the same in the event of a decline endangering their security, plaintiff being charged with the purchase price of the shares and broker's commissions and interest on the balance due defendants, and credited with the stock purchased and money paid, was within the inhibition of Const. art. 4, § 26, declaring contracts for the sale of shares of stock on margin, or to be delivered at a future day, void.

2. The action given by Const. art. 4, § 26, to recover money paid on contracts for the sale of stock on margin, lies in favor of the principal against the broker who procures the stock for him, although the latter does not himself sell it to the former, but purchases it from another broker for the former's account.

3. In an action against a broker under Const. art. 4, § 26, to recover money paid on a contract for the sale of stock on margin, a balance standing to plaintiff's credit with defendant after the sale of certain wheat options, which had nothing to do with the stock transactions, did not constitute a payment or credit on the sum sued for.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Henry C. Stilwell against Edward B. Cutter and another, copartners as Cutter & Moseley. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Campbell & Metson and Campbell, Metson & Campbell, for appellants. I. B. L. Brandt and Whitworth & Shurtleff (Charles A. Shurtleff, of counsel), for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. This action was brought to recover money paid by plaintiff to defendants on an alleged contract for the sale of stocks on margin. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

The action was authorized by article 4, § 26, of the state Constitution, reading as follows: "All contracts for the sale of shares of the capital stock of any corporation or association, on margin, or to be delivered at a future day, shall be void, and any money paid on such contracts, may be recovered by the party paying it by suit in any court of competent jurisdiction."

The court found that plaintiff paid to defendants, and defendants received, $3,071.46, for the purposes and under the following circumstances, which were well known by defendants: That at divers times, to wit, between April 10th and 16th, in the year 1900, for the purpose of speculating in the rise and fall of shares of the capital stock of the American Steel & Wire Company, a corporation, defendants, as stockholders, at the request of plaintiff, purchased for his account 200 shares of the capital stock of said corporation; that said shares were never delivered to plaintiff, and were purchased with the understanding that they were not to be delivered at the time of the purchase, but, on the contrary, were to be delivered at some future time, when the sum of money due the defendants on account of said purchase should be paid by plaintiff; that at the time of said purchase defendants demanded and received only a percentage of the purchase price, in an amount sufficient, in defendants' judgment, to secure them against any loss which might result from a decline in value thereof, and with a further understanding that defendants should retain said shares as security for the balance due defendants, and might sell the same whenever such a decline occurred in the value thereof as would endanger defendants' security; that plaintiff was charged with the purchase price of said shares, together with the broker's commission, and with interest on the balance due defendants, and was credited with the stock purchased and the money paid on said account; that, upon receiving orders for the purchase of said shares, defendants, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, instructed certain stockbrokers in Chicago to purchase said shares, who purchased the same by telegraph in New York City; that, pending said transaction between plaintiff and defendants, the value of said shares declined, in consequence whereof defendants called upon plaintiff and received from him, "from time to time, further and additional moneys to keep up his marginal account and protect the same; that plaintiff demanded the return of said sum of $3,071.46 from defendants, but defendants failed and refused to return the same or any part thereof, and no part thereof has been paid to plaintiff." From these findings the court found, as conclusions of law, that said article of the Constitution had been violated, and that plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount above stated.

*Rehearing denied June 2, 1905.

Appellants contend that the evidence does not show the existence of a contract for the sale of shares on margin, and that defendants were but the agents of plaintiff, and that, because defendants executed plaintiff's orders to purchase the stock through other brokers, plaintiff has sued the wrong party.

Appellants urge with much amplification that the constitutional inhibition does not extend to contracts "of" sale on margin, but only to contracts "for" the sale on margin; that the former class are but ordinary executed contracts, while the latter are executory; and that the present case falls under the former class, and are therefore not inhibited. We do not think it necessary to decide whether or not such distinction can be drawn. There is evidence to support the findings, and the findings show that the contract was within the express terms of the Constitution, and was clearly void under the provisions of that instrument.

The court found that plaintiff gave his orders for the purchase of the stock to defendants, and did not know whence or from whom they obtained it, or who made the purchase for plaintiff's account. The objection that defendants were but the agents of plaintiff, and, inferentially, that the brokers who purchased the shares should have been sued, is not new. It was held in Cashman v. Root, 89 Cal. 373, 26 Pac. 883, 12 L. R. A. 511, 23 Am. St. Rep. 482, that, admitting the broker to be the agent of his customer, if by the transaction the customer is enabled to do that which is prohibited, to wit, purchase stock on margin, it would be within the prohibition even if the broker agent did not himself sell to his customers. The court said: "In the accomplishment of the unlawful purpose he took the place of the vendor, and carried the stock as the vendor might have done, and the end was thus reached per interpositam personam. The end attained, and not the form of the transaction, must determine the question." See, also, Parker v. Otis, 130 Cal. 322, 62 Pac. 571, 927, 92 Am. St. Rep. 56. Since the adoption of the new Constitution, the provision in question has several times been before the court under varying conditions of fact. We find nothing in the present case that should take it out of the category of cases heretofore decided adversely to defendants' contention. Substantially all the questions presented by the evidence and now involved were decided against defendants in the cases above cited. See, also, Wetmore v. Barrett, 103 Cal. 246, 37 Pac. 140; Sheehy v. Shinn, 103 Cal. 325, 37 Pac. 393; Baldwin v. Zadig, 104 Cal. 594, 38 Pac. 363, 722; Kullman v. Simmens, 104 Cal. 595, 38 Pac. 362; Fox v. Hale & Norcross G. Co., 108 Cal. 385, 41 Pac. 308.

Appellants claim that the judgment was too great by $106.04. This conclusion is reached by deducting from the amount lost on the steel wire company's stock deal ($3,071.46) the balance said to be to the credit of plaintiff at a certain date after the sale of certain wheat options ($2,965.42). Plaintiff testified that his purchases of grain futures had nothing to do with his purchase of the wire company's stock, and that he paid in all $3,886.91 as margin on the shares of the steel wire company. Accepting the testimony of plaintiff, as the trial court must have done, the judgment was not too great. The defendants pleaded no counterclaim for the $106.04, and it did not technically constitute a payment or credit on the sum sued for.

It is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

In re CARPENTER'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,285.)

EXECUTORS — ADVANCES — INTEREST — MINOR HEIRS — DEVISEES — ATTORNEYS — APPOINTMENT—ACCOUNTING — FEES — PRIORITY OF ALLOWANCE — APPEAL — PARTIES — NOTICE —FINDINGS—REVIEW.

1. Where a creditor of an estate, whose claim had been allowed, did not make any appearance on the settlement of the executor's account, it was not necessary to serve him with a notice of appeal therefrom.

2. Where an executor was directed, by an order settling his account, to pay certain sums as compensation for legal services rendered to the executor, the attorneys rendering such services were not persons interested in the estate, nor proper parties to the proceeding for settlement of the executor's account, and hence it was not necessary to serve them with notice of an appeal from the order of settlement.

3. Where the court found that an order fixing the fee for an attorney appointed to represent minor devisees and legatees, who had no guardian, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1718, was duly made and entered, it would be presumed in favor of the order, in the absence of a showing to the contrary in the record, that all persons interested were duly notified of the application for the fixing of the fee, and that the order was not ex parte.

4. Where an order was entered fixing the fee of an attorney appointed to represent minor devisees and legatees, as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 1718, the mere fact that there had been no previous account filed by the executor was insufficient to establish want of notice of the application to fix such fee to all persons interested.

5. Where it was found that an executor made proper and beneficial expenditures for the estate, when he was without funds belonging to the estate, for the purpose of carrying on litigation relating to the maintenance of the will under which minor devisees and legatees claimed, an order allowing the executor interest on the sums so advanced was not erroneous, in the absence of a bill of exceptions showing the evidence on which the allowance was made.

6. Where an attorney was appointed to represent minor heirs and devisees, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1718, authorizing such appointment, and providing that the charge for his services shall be made against the interests represented by the attorney, and that payment thereof shall be made out of the estate only where it can be reimbursed by retaining the amount from the portion of the heir represented, the fee of such attorney was not a part of the debts of the estate or expenses of administration, and was therefore not entitled to priority over a claim by the executor for advances and interest.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; W. B. Nutter, Judge.

Judicial accounting by the executor of the will of C. W. Carpenter, deceased. From an order settling the account, the assignee of one S. D. Woods appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur L. Levinsky, for appellant. Jas. A. Louttit and Louttit & Middlecoff, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from an order settling an account of the executor of the will of C. W. Carpenter, deceased. The account covered the period between the time of the appointment of the executor on February 23, 1884, and January 1, 1901, and was not presented or settled as a final account. The only appellant is the assignee of one S. D. Woods, who, as appears from the findings, was, on the 19th day of September, 1892, by an order "duly made, given and entered in the above-entitled matter and estate," allowed the sum of $3,000 "as attorney's fees for services rendered by him as attorney of the minor legatees and devisees named in the last will and testament of said C. W. Carpenter, deceased," and payment of said amount was, by said order of September 19, 1892, directed to be made as necessary expenses of administration. No part of the same has ever been paid.

It is claimed that the appeal should be dismissed for the failure on the part of appellant to serve his notice of appeal on certain persons alleged to be adverse parties. One of such alleged adverse parties was a creditor whose claim had been duly allowed, but who did not, so far as the record shows, make any appearance in the matter of the settlement of this account. As he did not appear and make himself a party to this proceeding, it was not necessary to serve the notice of appeal upon him. Est. of McDougald, 143 Cal. 476, 77 Pac. 443. The other alleged adverse parties were attorneys who had rendered legal services to the executor in the matter of said estate, and to whom the executor was directed, by the order settling his account, to pay certain sums as compensation therefor. These attorneys of the executor were not persons interested in the estate, and could not be parties to the proceeding of settlement of account. It was not necessary to serve the notice of appeal on them. Est. of Kruger, 143 Cal. 141, 76 Pac. 891.

It is urged by respondent that the order of September 19, 1892, in favor of S. D. Woods, was made without jurisdiction and is void, and that his assignee has therefore no interest whatever in the estate, and cannot maintain this appeal. From the record before us we cannot say that the order, so far as it fixes the fee to be received by the attorney theretofore appointed under the provisions of section 1718, Code Civ. Proc., to represent the minor legatees and devisees, was beyond the jurisdiction of the superior court. Under the provisions of that section, which was repealed in 1903 (St. 1903, p. 243, c. 206), the court was authorized to appoint an attorney to represent devisees and legatees who were minors and had no general guardian, and to fix the fee of the person so appointed. It is found that the order fixing the fee was duly given, made, and entered, and it must be presumed in favor of the order, in the absence of a showing to the contrary in the record, that all persons interested were duly notified of the application for the fixing of the fee, and that the order was not, as suggested, an ex parte order. The mere fact that there never had been any previous account filed by the executor, if such fact is shown by the record, does not conclusively establish want of notice to all parties interested of the application for the fixing of this fee. There may have been an application for the sale of realty, or some other appropriate proceeding, in which all of the parties interested were before the court, with full notice of the application for the fixing of this fee. The record does not show that such was not the case.

The principal points made by appellant for reversal are, first, that the superior court erred in allowing the executor interest upon the money advanced by him, and, second, that said court erred in decreeing that the executor should have and recover from the estate the balance remaining due him for moneys advanced, and interest thereon, before any payment should be made on account of appellant's claim. The superior court allowed the executor interest upon all amounts expended by him, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, from the time of payment to January 1, 1901, and charged him with interest upon all amounts received by him as executor, at the same rate, from the time of receipt to January 1, 1901. It found that on such basis there was due the executor on January 1, 1901, a balance of $22,201.41. As to such allowance of interest to the executor, the court found "that all of said expenditures made by said executor were proper and beneficial to said estate and those interested therein, and resulted in the preservation thereof for the parties entitled thereto, and said executor made said expenditures at a time when there were no funds of said estate in his hands, and he is entitled to interest on said amounts as set forth above." There is no bill of exceptions showing the evidence taken on the hearing in the superior court. The account and report show that the great bulk of the disbursements made by the executor were made in and about the large amount of litigation in which the estate appears to have been involved, most of which related to the maintenance of the will under which the minor devisees and legatees claimed. We cannot say, in the face of this finding, and in the absence of any bill of exceptions showing the evidence, that the court erred in allowing the executor interest upon advances made by him. It appears to be well settled that circumstances may be such as to justify a court in allowing the executor or administrator interest upon advances made by him, for the benefit of the estate, either from his own funds, or from money borrowed by him for that purpose. It is true that claims for interest are not favored, will be viewed with caution, and examined with scrupulous care, but it is uniformly recognized that the condition of an estate is sometimes such as not only to authorize, but strongly commend, such advancement of money. In 11 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 1267, it is said: "In regard to interest on advances to the estate made by the executor or administrator out of his own funds, the rule is well settled that credit will be allowed if the advances were beneficial to the estate, and the necessity of making them was not occasioned by any neglect or delay on the part of the executor or administrator. But such claims are not favored, and in no case will they be allowed if the advances were not beneficial to the estate, or if the executor had funds of the estate in his hands, or could have put himself in funds from the estate." See, also, Woerner on Am. Law of Administration (2d Ed.) § 523; Liddel v. McVickar, 11 N. J. Law, 44, 47, 19 Am. Dec. 369; Pettingill v. Pettingill, 60 Me. 411, 425; Trimble v. James, 40 Ark. 393, 406. Where it is absolutely essential for the protection of an estate, and the preservation of the property thereof for those beneficially interested, that the executor should advance money, and he does so, thereby producing benefit to those interested therein, it is only equitable that he should be fully reimbursed, and "it is according to the rules and principles of equity that the acts of an executor had in the administration of his trust are to be adjudged." In re Clos' Estate, 110 Cal. 494, 501, 42 Pac. 971. In the absence of the evidence, we cannot say that the circumstances of this estate were not such as to justify the action of the court both as to the allowance of interest and the rate thereof.

As to the claim that the court erred in providing that the executor might repay himself the balance due him for advances and interest before paying appellant any portion of his claim, it would seem to be clear that appellant is entitled to the payment of his claim only after the payment of all expenses of administration and debts. His claim is not an expense of administration of the estate in the true sense. The status of an attorney appointed under section 1718, Code Civ. Proc., was discussed at some length in Estate of Lux, 134 Cal. 3, 66 Pac. 30, and it was there said that the statute directs the charge for the services of such an attorney to be made against the interest represented by the attorney, and that it authorizes payment out of the estate only where the estate can be reimbursed by retaining the amount from "the portion of the heir represented." It was further said that a payment to such an attorney is in the nature "of a partial distribution to the heir." The provision of section 1718 to the effect that the attorney may receive a fee, to be fixed by the court, which must be paid out of the funds of the estate as necessary expenses of administration, can therefore be held to mean only that such fee shall be paid from the portion of the heir, legatee, or devisee represented, as a necessary part of the expense of administration; but, until the payment of the general expenses of administration of the estate and the debts of deceased, there can be no portion of the party so represented from which such payment can be made. The attorney so appointed stands in no better position than the person whom he represents, and his compensation is dependent upon the existence of a fund or property belonging to such person. Until the payment of the general expenses of administration and debts of deceased, there can be no such fund or property.

In his written objections to the annual account, appellant alleged "that said account does not show what property or estate is in the possession of said executor." There was nothing in this objection which precluded the court from proceeding to settle the account. Nor was it essential that the order settling the account "shall set forth the present condition of said estate," or show "the property and estate on hand, together with its value."

We cannot, of course, upon this appeal from the order settling the account, consider the contention that the court erred in refusing to grant a motion, made by appellant more than a month after the taking of such appeal, for the amendment of the findings of fact filed upon the settlement of the account.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

1. Where, in an action for trespass in cutting timber, defendant filed a cross-complaint alleging that he was the owner of certain lands, not described in the complaint, and that plaintiff claimed some interest in the timber thereon, and asking a decree adjudging defendant to be the owner and restraining plaintiff from making any such claim, any question as to the propriety of such cross-complaint was waived, no objection having been made thereto by plaintiff, who answered it, and submitted without objection to a trial of the issues made thereby.

2. Where, in an action for trespass in cutting timber on certain described lands, the court found that plaintiff owned certain of the lands, and that defendant had cut the timber thereon, but no finding was made as to a portion of the lands, defendant could not complain of such failure to find.

3. That the trial court made a finding outside of the issues does not warrant the granting of a new trial, such an objection being available only on an appeal from the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, §§ 124, 127.]

4. The failure of the trial court to make a finding on a material issue is ground for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 37, Cent. Dig. New Trial, §§ 125, 165½.]

5. The party appealing from an order granting a new trial must affirmatively show error.

6. Statements or recitals in an order granting a new trial as to the showing made constitute no part of the order, and such things can be shown only on appeal by the bill of exceptions or statement.

7. On appeal from an order granting a new trial the reasons given by the court for its action are immaterial.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by Harold T. Power against P. M. Fairbanks and others. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Modified.

John M. Fulweiler, for appellant. Tabor & Tabor, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action for $600 damages for trespass in the cutting down and removal of timber growing on land alleged to belong to plaintiff, and described in the complaint as the "S. E. ¼ and the E. ½ of the S. W. ¼ of Sec. 5, T. 15 N., R. 11 E., M. D. M.," and for an injunction restraining the further cutting of timber on said land. The answers deny any cutting of timber except upon the S. W. ¼ of said section 5, which, with the timber thereon, was alleged by such answers to be the property of defendant. The defendants also served and filed a cross-complaint, alleging that they were the owners of the whole of the S. W. ¼ of said section 5; that plaintiff claimed some interest in the timber growing thereon, and that such claim was wholly without right; and asking a decree adjudging them to be such owners and restraining plaintiff from making any such claim. Plaintiff answered this cross-complaint, denying the allegations of ownership of defendants, and admitting and alleging his own claim thereto. There might be some question as to the propriety of such a cross-complaint in an action of this character, especially in regard to real property not covered by the complaint, but that question is obviated by the fact that no objection was made thereto, the plaintiff answering the same, and submitting without objection to a trial of the issues made thereby, and the subject-matter thereof being within the jurisdiction of the superior court. See Santa Barbara v. Eldred, 95 Cal. 378, 381, 30 Pac. 562. The trial was by the court without a jury, and the court found that the plaintiff was the owner of all the timber standing and growing upon the S. E. ¼ and N. ½ of the S. W. ¼ of said section 5, and that defendants had, without plaintiff's consent, cut down and removed therefrom timber of the value of $342, for which amount it gave judgment. The injunction asked for by plaintiff was denied. There was no finding as to the ownership of the S. E. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of said section 5. Subsequently, on defendants' motion, a new trial was granted "as to the limited issue involving the right of possession, trespass upon and injury to said S. E. ¼ of S. W. ¼ and said N. W. ¼ of S. W. ¼, and as to such other issues as involve said two tracts," and denied in all other respects. Plaintiff appeals from such order granting a new trial as to the issues named.

So far as the issues made by the complaint and answer are concerned, a new trial could not properly be granted solely as to the questions named in the order. The issue as to the S. E. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ is immaterial, in view of the judgment given. No relief was ordered by the decision or given by the judgment in regard thereto, the only relief given being damages for the removal of timber from other lands. Defendants therefore have no ground for complaint because of the failure of the court to make a finding as to such S. E. ¼ of the S. W. ¼. Assuming that a finding thereon should be in their favor, the judgment as to damages, in view of the other findings, would not be different. As to the so-called issue as to the N. W. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 5, there can be no new trial on the question of damages, as there was no issue in regard thereto presented by the complaint, and no recovery was sought in regard thereto. The finding in this respect was outside of the issues. The fact that the trial court has made a finding outside of the issues does not warrant the granting of a motion for a new trial. Such an objection is available only upon an appeal from the judgment. A new trial is simply a re-examination of an issue of fact, and where there is no issue of fact there is nothing to retry.

As to the issues made by the cross complaint and the answer thereto, a different question is presented. There was an issue as to the ownership of both the N. W. ¼ and the S. E. ¼ of said S. W. ¼ of section 5. The court failed to make any finding as to the S. E. ¼, and failure to find upon a material issue is ground for a new trial of such issue. The court did find upon the issue as to the ownership of the timber on the N. W. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of section 5, and a new trial could be granted as to such finding upon any ground specified in the statute for the granting of new trials. The record on appeal before us contains only the judgment roll, the order granting the motion, the notice of appeal and the certificate of the clerk. There is no statement or bill of exceptions before us, and the so-called notice of motion for a new trial constitutes no part of the record on appeal. This being the record, we can find no ground for interfering with the order appealed from so far as it permits a new trial as to the questions stated herein. Every presumption is in favor of that order, and it devolves upon the party appealing from an order granting a new trial to affirmatively show error. This can only be done by presenting a record showing what was before the court upon the hearing of the motion. The order of the trial court cannot take the place of a bill of exceptions or statement. The order simply indicates the action of the court, and not the showing upon which such action is based. Therefore statements or recitals in the order as to the showing made constitute no part of the order. These things can be shown only by the bill of exceptions or statement, in the preparation of which the party in whose favor the order is made will have an opportunity, by the presentation of proposed amendments, to make the record speak the truth. He cannot be deprived of this by recitals in the order. Likewise the reasons given by the court for its action are immaterial. The reasons given for the decision may be bad, and the decision at the same time correct for other reasons. It is the action of the court that is presumed to be correct, and this presumption obtains even though the reasons given may be bad. We have had occasion recently to consider the question here presented. Skinner v. Horn, 144 Cal. 278, 77 Pac. 904. In accordance with the view there expressed, we must assume in favor of the action of the trial court that the motion for a new trial was based upon some one or more legal grounds upon which a sufficient showing was made to warrant the action of the trial court in regard thereto. The record before us does not show the contrary.

As already stated, there can be no new trial in the respects specified in the order as to the issues made by the complaint and answers, and the judgment for damages cannot, therefore, be affected by a new trial. But we cannot say that the evidence upon a new trial as to the issues made by the cross-complaint and answer may not be such as to entitle defendants to a judgment based upon their cross-complaint as to the ownership of the timber on the specified subdivisions of land, quieting their title thereto.

So far as the order grants a new trial as to the issues involving the ownership of and right of possession to the timber growing upon the S. E. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ and the N. W. ¼ of the S. W. ¼ of said section 5, it is affirmed. In all other respects it is reversed.

SAN FRANCISCO PAV. CO. v. EGAN et al.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—PAVING MACADAMIZED STREETS—EXCEPTED PROPERTY—FORMAL PREREQUISITES—ENGINEER'S CERTIFICATE—PROCESS—RETURN OF WARRANT—APPEAL—QUESTIONS AVAILABLE.

1. Under St. 1891, p. 196, c. 147, § 2, authorizing a city council to order the whole or any portion of the streets of the city paved or repaved, macadamized or remacadamized, the fact that a street has once been macadamized does not, unless it has been constructed and accepted by the city council as a completed street, as provided for by St. 1885, p. 160, c. 153, § 20, preclude the council from ordering the street paved with bituminous rock.

2. Under St. 1891, p. 204, c. 147, § 7, subds. 10, 11, authorizing lot owners to improve the street in front of their own property, and directing the city council to except, from an order of improvement and resolution of intention, work of the same class already done at the expense of the owner, the fact that such work had already been done upon a greater part of the line of the contemplated improvement, as designated in the resolution of intention, is immaterial.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 498, requiring street railroads to pave or macadamize the entire length of the street used by their track between the rails, and for two feet on each side thereof, and to keep the same constantly in repair, the city council may exclude from the resolution of intention to improve a street "that portion required by law to be kept in order by the railroad company having tracks thereon."

4. The fact that the resolution of intention to improve a street includes work of various kinds upon other streets does not render it invalid.

5. St. 1891, p. 206, c. 147, § 34, providing that every certificate signed by the city engineer in relation to street improvements shall be prima facie evidence in the courts, does not require the city engineer to make a certificate.

6. A certificate of the city engineer that he had examined the work described in a resolution of intention, and had found the same practically to official line and grade, and stating the area of the pavement laid, and the length of the curb constructed, sufficiently complies with St. 1891, p. 206, c. 147, § 34, requiring the city engineer to do the engineering work in connection with a street improvement, and declaring his certificate to be prima facie evidence of the truth of its contents.

7. Where a complaint to foreclose the lien of an assessment for street improvement work alleged the making of a valid bid and the execution of a valid contract, and the court found that the allegations were true, and the bill of exceptions contained no specification of insufficiency of evidence to sustain the findings in that respect, an objection that the bid and contract were void was not available on appeal.

8. A return signed in behalf of the contractor by the person who had made the demand, and verified by his oath, sufficiently complies with Street Improvement Act, § 10 (St. 1885, p. 155, c. 153), requiring the return to the warrant to a street improvement assessment to be signed by the contractor or some person in his behalf, and to state the nature and character of the demand made upon the persons assessed, and the amount of the assessment which remains unpaid.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Paving Company against Annie Egan and others. From an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

George D. Collins, for appellants. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to foreclose the lien of an assessment for street improvement work. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

1. It is contended by defendants that the resolution of intention to order the work done was invalid for several reasons. Assuming that all the objections made to the resolution are available to defendants on the record before us, we are of the opinion that there is no merit in any of them. The property upon which it is sought to enforce a lien fronts on Twenty-Ninth street, between Noe and Sanchez streets, in San Francisco. It is claimed that the evidence introduced by defendants shows that at the date of the resolution this portion of Twenty-Ninth street had once been macadamized, and was then in good order. It also appeared that, within six months prior to such date, the said block, excepting only the lot of defendants, which has a frontage of 55 feet, had been paved with bituminous rock, and that granite curbs had been laid thereon by the property owners under a private contract. There is no claim that such block had ever been accepted by the city as a completed and fully constructed street. See section 20, Street Improvement Act, St. 1885, p. 160, c. 153. Under these circumstances, the board of supervisors passed the resolution of intention. It included street work of various kinds upon other streets than Twenty-Ninth street, but, so far as applicable to Twenty-Ninth street, it expressed the intention of the board as follows, viz.: "That granite curbs be laid on Twenty-Ninth street, between Sanchez and Noe streets, where not already laid, and that the roadway thereof be paved with bituminous rock where not already paved, except that portion required by law to be kept in order by the railroad company having tracks thereon." It is urged that the board had no power to order a street that had once been macadamized to be paved with bituminous rock. We find no such limitation upon the power of the city council expressed in the law relative to street improvements. By section 2 of the act, as it existed at the date of these improvements, it was provided that: "Whenever the public interest or convenience may require, the city council is hereby authorized and empowered to order the whole, or any portion, either in length or width, of the streets * * * of such city, graded or regraded to the official grade, planked or replanked, paved or repaved, macadamized or remacadamized, graveled or regraveled, * * * and to order any other work to be done which shall be necessary to complete the whole or any portion of such streets * * *, and it may order any of said work to be improved." St. 1891, p. 196, c. 147. It may be that after a street has been fully constructed and accepted by the city council as a completed street, as provided in section 20 of the act (St. 1885, p. 160, c. 153), the council has no power to further improve the same at the expense of the property owners, but that question is not here involved, and is not decided. Until such acceptance, it is clear that the council has full power to determine whether work of any class designated in section 2 of the act is required upon any street, or portion of a street, by the public interest or convenience, and to order the same done in the manner provided by the act. The mere fact that work of some other class than that ordered has already been done on the street cannot affect this power. Although once macadamized, the public interest or convenience may require that a street be paved with bituminous rock. The determination by the board of supervisors that the public interest or convenience does so require is conclusive, at least in the absence of fraud.

Under the provisions of the statute (subdivisions 10 and 11, § 7, St. 1891, p. 204, c. 147), the board properly excepted from the order work of the same class already done at the expense of the owner. The fact that such work had already been done upon a greater part of the line of the contemplated improvement, as designated in the resolution of intention, and that the resolution, therefore, in effect, affected only a minority of the frontage, is immaterial. In McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71, a substantially similar resolution of intention and order for work for one block were under consideration, and the objection was made that the assessment was void on its face, as only a part of the lots on the line of work designated were assessed. The court said, after discussing section 2, and subdivisions 11 and 8 of section 7, of the street improvement act: "It thus appears that authority is given to the city council in certain cases to order the improvement of only a portion of a street lying between two main street crossings, and that such improvement may be confined to a portion of the street upon one side of its middle line." See, also, Perine v. Erzgraber, 102 Cal. 234, 238, 36 Pac. 585. That notices of the passage of the resolution of intention could be posted in such a case in accordance with the requirements of the act is shown in Dowling v. Hibernia, etc., Soc., 143 Cal. 425, 427, 77 Pac. 141.

The exception of "that portion required by law to be kept in order by the railroad company having tracks thereon" did not render the resolution void. The requirement of the law as to street railroad corporations in this regard is to be found in section 498 of the Civil Code, and is as follows, viz.: "To plank, pave, or macadamize the entire length of the street used by their track, between the rails, and for two feet on each side thereof, and between the tracks, if there be more than one, and to keep the same constantly in repair, flush with the street, and with good crossings." The exception, therefore, sufficiently described the portion of the street which was excepted from the effect of the resolution for that reason, as definitely as did the exceptions "where not already laid" and "where not already so paved" describe the portions excepted because of work already done. Dowling v. Hibernia, etc., Soc., supra; Reid v. Clay, 134 Cal. 207, 212, 66 Pac. 262; Edwards v. Berlin, 123 Cal. 544, 56 Pac. 432; Williams v. Bergin, 116 Cal. 56, 47 Pac. 877; McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71. We think that there can be no doubt, under the provisions of our law, that the supervisors had the right to except such portion of the street as was required by law to be kept in order by the railroad company at its own expense, and, so far as we know, was so being kept in order.

The fact that the resolution of intention included work of various kinds upon other streets does not render it invalid. Bates v. Twist, 138 Cal. 52, 70 Pac. 1023.

2. It is contended that the certificate of the engineer is void, because it does not conform to the requirements of section 34 of the street act (St. 1891, p. 206, c. 147). We find nothing in the law requiring a certificate of the city engineer under the circumstances of this case. See O'Dea v. Mitchell, 144 Cal. 374, 379, 77 Pac. 1020; Chase v. Troutt (Cal.) 80 Pac. 81. The certificate made did show that the engineer had examined the work described in the resolution of intention, and had found the same "practically to official line and grade." It showed the area of the pavement laid and the length of curb constructed. Assuming any certificate to have been required, we cannot say this was not a sufficient certificate. It does not appear that the diagram "on the back of the certificate" was not recorded. If such document was a part of the certificate, it affirmatively appears that it was recorded.

3. It is contended that the bid for the work and contract were void for certain specified reasons, but these objections are not available to defendants. The making of a valid bid and the execution of a valid contract were alleged by plaintiff, and the court found that these allegations were true. The bill of exceptions contains no specification of insufficiency of evidence to sustain the findings in these respects. We have, however, considered the objections on their merits, and find nothing in them.

It is further urged that the return of the warrant was not signed by the superintendent of streets. It was signed, in behalf of the contractor, by the person who had made the demand, and was verified by his oath. This appears to have been a compliance with the law in that regard. Section 10 of the street act (St. 1885, p. 155, c. 153).

4. The return very clearly shows that demand for payment was publicly made upon the premises assessed in full accord with the requirements of section 10 of the street act.

This disposes of all points made by defendants. There was nothing in the evidence offered by them to overcome the prima facie case made by plaintiff by the introduction in evidence of the assessment, diagram, warrant, return, and engineer's certificate.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

FRANZ v. MENDONCA. (S. F. 3,278.)

TITLE BY PRESCRIPTION — PRIVATE ROADS — CLAIM OF RIGHT—LAW OF CASE—FORMER APPEAL—ADVERSE USE—PERMISSIVE USE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. In an action to enjoin defendant from preventing plaintiff from passing over an alleged private road on the ground that plaintiff had acquired the way by prescription, testimony of plaintiff that he always thought the road was his, that he was given the right by the original owner of defendant's land, and that the owner gave him the title, was consistent with the theory that plaintiff based a claim of right to the use of the road on a gift from the owner, and that he had been using it under such claim of right ever since, and did not show merely a permissive use.

2. In such action, what was said in a former opinion on appeal as to the general principles applicable in the case must obtain in the determination of the question as to whether the use was adverse, and becomes the law of the case.

3. Civ. Code. § 811, subd. 4, provides that a servitude is extinguished, when it was acquired by enjoyment, by disuse thereof by the owner for the period prescribed for acquiring title by enjoyment. Held, that a finding against defendant in the action which was begun June 1, 1896, the court finding that plaintiff personally and continuously used the road from the year 1858 to the year 1892, and that he and his tenants continuously used it from the year 1892 to April, 1895, when defendant prevented the further use thereof, was sustained by evidence that the road was used to some extent by plaintiff or his tenants each year, and that when interfered with in 1895 plaintiff at once asserted his claim, and almost immediately began legal proceedings to enforce his right.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; S. P. Hall, Judge.

Action by Sebastian Franz against Francisco A. Mendonca. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John D. Whaley, for appellant. Reed & Nusbaumer, for respondent.

ANGELOTTI, J. This action was brought to obtain an injunction to prevent defendant from obstructing and from preventing the plaintiff from passing over a certain byway or alleged private road over the lands of defendant, and for damages. The first trial resulted in a judgment for defendant. The court afterwards granted the plaintiff a new trial, from which order the defendant appealed to this court, and the order was here affirmed. Franz v. Mendonca, 131 Cal. 205, 63 Pac. 361. The case was again tried in the court below, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

In his complaint the plaintiff claims the right of way by reason of necessity, by reason of it being the only mode of ingress and egress to and from his lands, and also by prescription. It was stipulated in open court at the commencement of the trial that the plaintiff would abandon any claim to the way by reason of necessity, or that the way was the only mode of ingress and egress to and from the plaintiff's lands. This left the case to be tried solely upon the claim that plaintiff had acquired the way by prescription. The court found that continuously from 1858 to 1895 the plaintiff and his tenants did "uninterruptedly, peaceably, notoriously, and visibly, with the knowledge of the grantors of said defendant, and without any permission from the grantors, or any of the grantors of said defendant, travel over, upon, and along said private road to and from his said dwelling to said public highway; that said use of said private road by plaintiff was under a claim of right, and was adverse to the possession of the grantors of defendant, and grew up with a knowledge thereof by defendant's grantors." The above finding, in so far as it finds that the use of the way was without permission, and under a claim of right, and adverse to defendant and his grantors, is challenged by defendant as being without evidence to support it, and this is the principal point for reversal made upon this appeal.

Upon the former appeal from the order granting the plaintiff's motion for a new trial, the principal point discussed both by counsel and the court was as to whether the evidence was such that it would sustain a finding that plaintiff's use of the road in question was under a claim of right, and without permission of defendant's grantors. If it would not, there was apparently no ground upon which the order granting a new trial could be sustained; and this appears to have been the view of both counsel and this court. This court discussed the evidence presented by the record on that appeal and the general principles by which the question as to whether the use was adverse should be determined. It was recognized by the court that the question as to whether a use was merely permissive, where no permission or license had been expressly given, was one to be determined by the jury or court sitting as such, in the light of the relations between the parties and all the surrounding circumstances. By affirming the order granting a new trial, it necessarily held that the evidence contained in the record as to the relations of the parties and the surrounding circumstances was of such a nature that it would have sustained a finding of adverse use. We have examined the evidence given upon the new trial, as the same is shown by the bill of exceptions on this appeal, and find that it is substantially the same as that considered upon the former appeal. Defendant's counsel has pointed out several particulars in which he claims that the evidence on the second trial was different from that given on the first trial, but there is no difference that is material upon the question as to whether the finding of the trial court as to adverse use finds sufficient support in the evidence. Counsel places much reliance upon the evidence of plaintiff to the effect that Vallejo, the original owner of defendant's land, gave him the right to this road over 40 years ago, claiming that it shows simply a permissive use. Plaintiff said, among other things: "I always thought the road was mine. Vallejo, when I talked to Vallejo, he gave me the right. When Vallejo was up to my house, he gave me title to it." The evidence given by plaintiff is consistent with the theory that he based a claim of right to the use of the road upon a gift from Vallejo, and that he has been using it under such claim of right ever since. Under these circumstances there is much strength in the claim of plaintiff that, if it was not error for the court to set aside a judgment rendered in favor of defendant upon the ground that the decision was against the evidence, it certainly cannot be error for the court to render judgment for the plaintiff upon the same evidence. See Raymond v. Glover, 144 Cal. 548, 78 Pac. 3. However this may be, there can be no doubt that what was said in the former opinion as to the general principles applicable in this case must obtain in the determination of the question between these parties as to whether the use was adverse, and has become the law of this case. See Mahan v. Wood, 79 Cal. 258, 21 Pac. 757. It is sufficient to say that an examination of the record satisfies us that under the rules announced it cannot be held that the finding of the trial court is without sufficient support in the evidence. The same may be said as to such finding in so far as it declares that the use of plaintiff was with the knowledge of defendant's grantors.

It is contended that the right to the use of this road has been lost by disuse by plaintiff. Civ. Code, § 811, subd. 4. Upon this question the finding of the trial court is against defendant, the court finding that plaintiff personally and continuously used the same from the year 1858 to the year 1872, and that he and his tenants continuously used it from the year 1872 to April, 1895, when defendant prevented the further use thereof. This action was commenced June 1, 1896. There was evidence to the effect that the road was used to some extent by plaintiff or his tenants each year, and that when this use was interfered with the first time in the year 1895 plaintiff at once asserted his claim, and almost immediately followed such assertion with legal proceedings to enforce his right. It cannot be held that the finding upon this question is not sustained by the evidence.

There is no other point requiring notice. The judgment and order are affirmed.

ANGLO-CALIFORNIAN BANK, Limited, v. FIELD et al. (S. F. 3,409, 3,410.)

CORPORATIONS — POWERS — EXISTENCE — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY—STATUTE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—MORTGAGES—MERGER ACTIONS—TRANSFER OF INTEREST—EFFECT—PLEADING—DENIAL—AMENDMENT —APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Under the direct provisions of St. 1871-72, p. 826, c. 566, § 1, as amended by St. 1899, p. 111, c. 94, § 1, requiring foreign corporations doing business in the state to designate a resident of the state on whom service of process may be made, and providing that the designation shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State, a copy of such designation, duly certified by the Secretary of State, is made sufficient evidence of incorporation thereof.

2. St. 1871-72, p. 826, c. 566, is entitled "An act in relation to foreign corporations." St. 1899, p. 111, c. 94, is amendatory thereof, and is so entitled. Section 1 of the amendatory act requires corporations of other states and foreign countries doing business in the state to designate a resident agent on whom process may be served, and provides that the designation shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State; making a certified copy of such designation sufficient evidence of incorporation. Section 2 provides that any such corporation failing to comply with section 1 shall be denied the benefit of the laws limiting the time for the commencement of civil actions, and shall not maintain or defend any action in the state until it has complied therewith, and directs the reception of certain evidence to prove the corporate existence of such corporations; limiting the sufficiency thereof to be determined by the court. Section 3 (page 112) provides that, on compliance with section 1 by such corporations, they shall be entitled to the benefit of the laws of the state limiting the time for the commencement of civil actions. The amended act contained the same provisions, except that it did not name corporations of foreign countries. Held, that neither of the acts is repugnant to Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title.

3. Nor can the acts be condemned as special laws regulating practice in courts, or granting special and exclusive rights, privileges, and immunities to corporations.

4. A mortgage in the form of an absolute deed, reciting that the deed is subject to the claim of the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, imports that the bank is a corporation, and, in a suit by the bank to foreclose its claim under a mortgage, furnishes prima facie evidence of plaintiff's corporate character.

5. The acceptance of a mortgage in the form of an absolute deed, reciting that it is subject to the claim of the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, is an admission by the mortgagee that the bank mentioned was at that time a corporation; and that condition, having once been shown to exist, is presumed to continue until the contrary is shown.

6. The taking of a mortgage is not a purchase, location, or holding of property, within Civ. Code, § 299, providing that no corporation shall purchase, locate, or hold property in any county in the state without filing a certified copy of its articles of incorporation in the office of the clerk of such county within 60 days after the purchase or location, and that any corporation failing to comply therewith shall not maintain or defend an action or proceeding in relation to such property until it has so complied.

7. An action to foreclose a mortgage is not an action in relation to property purchased, located, or held in the county, within Civ. Code, § 299.

8. The merger of mortgage liens with the fee, on both being united in the same person, is a question of intent, and merger will not be implied where there is an intervening claim, but equity will keep the legal title and the mortgagee's interests separate, though held by the same person, whenever necessary for the full protection of his just rights; and if, from all the circumstances, a merger would be disadvantageous to the party holding the fee, his intention that merger shall not result will be presumed and maintained, and equity will keep the liens alive for the purpose of doing justice.

9. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 385, providing that, in case of any transfer of interest other than by death or disability of a party, the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, a mortgage foreclosure suit may be continued in the name of the original plaintiff for the benefit of a person who purchases the plaintiff's claim during the pendency of the action.

10. In a suit to foreclose a mortgage, where a second mortgagee, as cross-complainant, alleged that it discovered that a certain person claimed to be the owner of the mortgage and notes, and had also discovered that he claimed to be the owner in fee and entitled to possession, a denial of the allegations was not a denial of ownership or claim of ownership, but a denial of the discovery; and hence, without more, there was nothing in the record which required the claimant to allege his intention to keep his first mortgage alive.

11. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1500, providing that an action may be brought by any holder of a mortgage or lien to enforce the same against the property of the estate of a deceased person subject thereto, where all recourse is expressly waived in the complaint, it is an abuse of discretion for the court, in an action to foreclose a mortgage, to refuse to permit an amendment of the complaint to be made at the trial by inserting a waiver of all recourse against the estate of the deceased mortgagor, other than that described in the complaint.

12. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1500, where the court, in an action to foreclose a mortgage, erroneously refused to permit an amendment of the complaint to be made at the trial by inserting a waiver of all recourse against the estate of the deceased mortgagor, the error was cured by the court allowing the filing of a statement with the clerk waiving all recourse against the mortgagor's estate, since the paper was in substance an amendment of the complaint.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action by the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, against T. J. Field, administrator of the estate of George Brandt, deceased, Thomas W. Cowan, and others. From the judgment and from an order overruling motions for a new trial, plaintiff and Cowan separately appeal. Reversed.

J. W. Lilienthal and Dougherty & Lacey, for appellant. S. F. Geil and J. H. Andersen (Dorn & Dorn & Savage, of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. Two appeals are here presented from the judgment and from an order overruling motions for a new trial—one by the plaintiff and the other by the defendant Thomas W. Cowan. It appears from the record that, after the action was commenced, Cowan purchased from the plaintiff the notes and mortgage sued on, and that plaintiff now has no interest therein, although it still stands as plaintiff; Cowan never having been substituted in its stead. Both appeals are presented upon substantially the same record.

The action is to foreclose a mortgage executed March 10, 1894, by George Brandt and his wife to the plaintiff upon land in Monterey county to secure the payment of about $8,000 then and thereafter loaned by the plaintiff to said George Brandt. The mortgage was duly recorded on March 22, 1897, at which time all the contemplated loans had been made. It was made in the form of an absolute deed, but it was intended by both parties to operate only as a mortgage. The complaint was filed about March 1, 1898, and is in the ordinary form of an action to foreclose a mortgage. The Bank of Monterey was made a defendant, it being alleged that it claimed a lien subordinate to the plaintiff's mortgage. On January 6, 1902, by leave of court it filed an amended and supplemental answer and cross-complaint. The answer denied that plaintiff was a corporation as alleged, and averred that on January 24, 1899, some 10 months after the action was begun, the plaintiff transferred its mortgage and the debts thereby secured to Thomas W. Cowan, and further that the said Bank of Monterey held a mortgage on the same premises for $6,600, executed to it on April 16, 1897, which, though subsequent in date, is alleged to be prior, to the mortgage to the plaintiff.

The cross-complaint seeks to foreclose the defendant bank's mortgage, and, in addition to the usual allegations, contains a charge that after the action was begun Cowan took and held possession of the land, and received the rents and profits thereof, in pursuance of a conspiracy between him and the plaintiff to avoid applying such rents on plaintiff's mortgage, and to keep defendant bank ignorant of the arrangement, apparently for the purpose (though this is not charged) of preventing the defendant bank from applying for a receiver to collect the rents. The prayer is for an accounting as to the rents, and for the foreclosure of the defendant's mortgage as a lien prior to that of the plaintiff. George Brandt died on November 20, 1899, and T. J. Field, as administrator of his estate, was duly substituted as a party defendant.

The court found that the respective mortgages were executed as alleged; that in January, 1899, plaintiff's notes and mortgage were transferred to Cowan, who still holds the same; that on February 28, 1899, Brandt and his wife conveyed to Cowan the mortgaged premises; that Cowan had been in possession of the land ever since that time; that the rental value was $75 a month; that Cowan paid $8,000 to plaintiff for the notes and mortgage; that this payment was intended as an extinguishment of the plaintiff's lien; and that, in buying the land from Brandt, Cowan intended to take the same subject to the mortgage of the Bank of Monterey. It was further found that plaintiff is not a corporation, that it had not complied with the provisions of section 299 of the Civil Code, and that plaintiff's notes and mortgage had not been presented to the administrator of the estate of Brandt for allowance. Judgment was thereupon given foreclosing the mortgage to the Bank of Monterey, as the first and only lien on the land, and declaring that plaintiff and Cowan should be forever barred of any claim thereon.

1. The finding that the plaintiff was not a corporation is contrary to the evidence. The averment was that it was a foreign corporation organized under the laws of Great Britain, and doing business in San Francisco, in this state. The plaintiff introduced in evidence a duly certified copy of a "certificate of designation of agent," filed in the office of the Secretary of State on May 22, 1894. This certificate stated that the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, is a corporation created under the laws of the kingdom of Great Britain, doing business in California, and having its principal place of business in San Francisco, and that certain persons named, and residing in San Francisco, were designated to receive service of process on the corporation, issued under the laws of this state. There was no evidence contrary to this, and it was competent and sufficient to prove the allegation under the statute of 1872 (St. 1871–72, p. 826, c. 566), and the amendatory act of 1899 (St. 1899, p. 111, c. 94). There is no merit in the respondent's contention that these statutes are void for the reason that they do not comply with the constitutional provision that "every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title." Const. § 24, art. 4. The title of the act of 1872 is "An act in relation to foreign corporations." This is a sufficiently specific designation of the subject of the act to satisfy the constitutional requirement. The title of the act of 1899 is "An act to amend 'An act in relation to foreign corporations,' approved April 1st, 1872," and it also is sufficiently specific. Nor do either of these statutes contravene any other constitutional provision. They apply uniformly to all foreign corporations. Such corporations constitute a class distinct from domestic corporations, and necessarily require laws of a different character, such as those contained in these statutes. They cannot be condemned as special laws regulating practice in courts, or granting special and exclusive rights, privileges, and immunities to any corporation. Foreign corporations are allowed to do business in this state by virtue of the comity between the states, and special legislation expressing the extent to which this comity is given, specifying the terms with which they must comply, and providing the method of proving corporate existence, and for the service of process on them, is both appropriate and necessary, and is not objectionable, so long as it does not permit them to do business under conditions more favorable than those imposed on domestic corporations. The conditions imposed by these laws are not more favorable than those required of other corporations, but are, if anything, less favorable. Furthermore, the recitals in the mortgage executed by Brandt to the Bank of Monterey furnish prima facie evidence of the corporate existence of the plaintiff. This mortgage is also in the form of an absolute deed, and recites that "this deed is subject to the claim of the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, amounting to the sum of $8,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from December 26th, 1896." The name "Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited," by which the plaintiff is here described, imports that the plaintiff is a corporation, and furnishes prima facie evidence of corporate character. The acceptance of this deed by the defendant bank amounts to an admission that the plaintiff was at that time a corporation, and that condition having been shown once to exist, it is presumed to continue until the contrary is proven.

2. The fact that plaintiff had not complied with section 299 of the Civil Code is immaterial. That section purports to apply to domestic corporations. Conceding, however, that foreign corporations, under section 15 of article 12 of the Constitution, are bound to comply with this section, the fact remains that the circumstances here existing do not bring the plaintiff within its terms. In substance, it provides that no corporation shall purchase, locate, or hold property in any county in the state without filing a certified copy of its articles of incorporation in the office of the county clerk of such county, within 60 days after the purchase or location, and that any corporation failing to comply with these provisions shall not maintain or defend an action or proceeding in relation to such property until it has so complied. It will be observed that the section does not apply to the plaintiff, unless it has purchased, located, or held property in Monterey county, nor unless this action is one in relation to such property. The taking of a mortgage by the plaintiff upon land situate in the county of Monterey is not the purchase, location, or holding of property in that county, within the meaning of section 299, Civ. Code. The action to foreclose the mortgage is simply and only an action for the collection of a debt, and the enforcement of a lien on the land for its payment. Under such circumstances, it was said by this court in Savings & Loan Society v. McKoon, 120 Cal. 180, 52 Pac. 305, that "it is manifest that the plaintiff did not, at the time of the commencement or trial of this action, own or hold the said mortgaged property, and therefore did not subject itself to the penalty imposed by section 299 of the Civil Code, even if it did not comply with its provisions."

3. The court below erred in holding that the lien of the mortgage to plaintiff was extinguished and merged in the fee by the conveyance of the equity of redemption by Brandt to Cowan. The evidence on this subject is not conflicting, nor are the facts disputed. There is no evidence of the intention of Cowan to extinguish the lien of plaintiff's mortgage, except the inferences to be deduced from the assignment, in connection with the circumstances under which it was given and accepted, and the subsequent transactions between Cowan and Brandt. The mortgage to the Bank of Monterey recited that it was subject to the claim of the Anglo-Californian Bank. The fact that the word "claim" was used in the recital is of no consequence. It was a term broad enough to include a mortgage. The plaintiff's mortgage was then of record, and was constructive notice. It was the only claim plaintiff had on the land. The recital was sufficient, of itself, to put the Bank of Monterey on inquiry, and was equivalent to actual notice to it, and estops it from disputing that plaintiff's mortgage was originally the prior lien. The assignment of plaintiff's notes and mortgage to Cowan was made pending the action to foreclose the mortgage assigned, to which action the Bank of Monterey was a party defendant; and the instrument of assignment stated that $8,000 had been paid therefor, and contained a guaranty that the mortgage assigned was the first lien on the premises. The deed from Brandt to Cowan declared that Cowan was to hold the land "subject to those two certain mortgages on said premises made heretofore in favor of the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, and the Bank of Monterey, respectively." Cowan, immediately after receiving this deed, took possession of the land. The consideration stated in the deed is $5, and there is no evidence of any other consideration. Certainly these facts furnish no direct evidence of an intention to extinguish the first mortgage. The recitals and circumstances, in connection with the well-known rules of equity on the subject, imply an intention not to extinguish the lien, but, on the contrary, to keep it alive for the benefit of Cowan, the purchaser, as against the second mortgage. He did not assume the payment of either mortgage, nor undertake with Brandt that he would pay them. The recital that he should hold subject to both merely states the character which the law would give his holding if a third party had then held the Anglo-Californian Bank mortgage. When considered in connection with the fact that he himself then held that mortgage, the recital raises a strong presumption against any intention to extinguish it by virtue of the conveyance. The guaranty in the assignment that it was a first mortgage raises an equally strong presumption that there was no intention to extinguish the lien as against subsequent liens at the time the assignment was made. It is true that under ordinary circumstances, where the holder of a mortgage acquires the estate of the mortgagor, the mortgage interest is merged in the fee, and the mortgage is extinguished. This is the ordinary legal effect of the transaction, and ordinarily the intention is presumed to accord with the act accomplished. But this rule is never applied where there is an intervening lien on the property, which it is to the interest of the purchaser to keep on foot, and where there is no evidence, direct or circumstantial, of an express intention to extinguish the first mortgage and hold subject only to the second. In such a case the legal title and first mortgage lien will be considered as separate interests whenever necessary for the protection of the just rights of the purchaser. The question was fully considered in Davis v. Randall, 117 Cal. 12, 48 Pac. 906. The law on the subject is well stated in the syllabus to that case in these words: "The merger of mortgage liens with the fee, upon both being united in the same person, is a question of intent; and merger will not be implied where there is an intervening claim, but equity will keep the legal title and the mortgagee's interests separate, though held by the same person, whenever necessary for the full protection of his just rights; and if, from all the circumstances, a merger would be disadvantageous to the party holding the fee, his intention that merger shall not result will be presumed and maintained, and equity will keep the liens alive for the purpose of doing justice." See, also, Hines v. Ward, 121 Cal. 118, 53 Pac. 427; Scrivner v. Dietz, 84 Cal. 298, 24 Pac. 171; Brooks v. Rice, 56 Cal. 428; Rumpp v. Gerkens, 59 Cal. 496; Carpentier v. Brenham, 40 Cal. 221; Henderson v. Grammar, 66 Cal. 335, 5 Pac. 488; Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 243, 24 Pac. 114; Tolman v. Smith, 85 Cal. 289, 24 Pac. 743; Shaffer v. McCloskey, 101 Cal. 580, 36 Pac. 196; Jones on Mortgages, §§ 870, 873.

That a merger of the lien of the first mortgage would operate to the disadvantage of Cowan, there can be no question. If the merger is not allowed to take place, he is, of course, bound to take subject to the second mortgage; but upon a sale he would be entitled to receive out of the proceeds all the money due on the first mortgage, or he could keep the property by paying only the excess it brings over the first mortgage, whereas, if there is a merger, he would be bound to pay the second mortgage in full in order to keep the property he bought, or obtain any of the proceeds of its sale.

It is claimed that Cowan, although made a party, did not file any pleading alleging his intention to hold his mortgage interest separate from the legal title, and that therefore he cannot claim any benefit on account of such intention. The mere transfer of the plaintiff's claim to him during the pendency of the action did not make it necessary that he should be made a party. The foreclosure suit could be continued in the name of the original plaintiff, for his benefit, without substituting him. Code Civ. Proc. § 385. He was not originally a party, and the complaint contained no allegation concerning him. The record does not contain the order of the court making him a party, but the only matter in the pleadings which required him to become a party was the allegation of the cross-complaint of the Bank of Monterey, alleging that he had been in possession of the premises, and had received rents therefor, for which an accounting was asked. There was no allegation therein that Cowan had purchased either the plaintiff's mortgage or the mortgaged premises. The allegation was that the Bank of Monterey had upon March 15, 1901, discovered that Cowan "claimed to be the owner" of the mortgage and notes, and that on November 25, 1901, it had discovered that he "claimed to be the owner in fee and entitled to the possession" of the premises. The denial by Cowan of these allegations was not a denial of his ownership or claim of ownership. It was simply a denial of the discovery. Therefore there was nothing in the record which required Cowan to allege his intention to keep his first mortgage alive. There was no issue tendered by the cross-complaint concerning his respective purchases of the mortgage and the fee. If the findings that those purchases were made were pertinent at all, it was solely because of the issue arising from the averment in the answer of the Bank of Monterey that its mortgage was prior to the mortgage of the plaintiff. This answer, however, being directed to the complaint of the plaintiff, must be taken to relate to the facts existing at the time the action was begun, and cannot be considered as tendering an issue concerning subsequent transactions. If the defendant desired to show the occurrence of facts after the action was begun, which would destroy the priority of the plaintiff's mortgage existing at the time, it should have made affirmative allegations stating the facts upon which it based its claim. It appears, therefore, that the findings of the court respecting the subsequent purchases of Cowan were outside of the issues; but, inasmuch as these purchases were shown apparently in response to the issue as to priority, the defendant Cowan, for the protection of his rights, is clearly entitled to avoid the apparent legal effect of his ownership of the first mortgage and the fee by claiming the equitable results flowing from his presumed intention. If, as the respondent seems to contend, there was no issue at all involving these purchases, and it was incumbent upon Cowan, if he desired to have his rights adjudged, to file a supplemental complaint, alleging his purchases and his intention to keep alive his first mortgage, then it would follow that these findings are entirely without the issues. In that case the court should have ignored these facts, and made its findings and decree foreclosing plaintiff's mortgage upon the issues tendered by the complaint, answer, and cross-complaint. We therefore hold that the mortgage to plaintiff was not merged by Cowan's purchase of the fee after he bought the mortgage.

4. A further claim is made on behalf of the respondent to the effect that the plaintiff's mortgage could not be foreclosed because the amended complaint contained no allegation that the mortgage debt, after the death of Brandt, had been presented to his administrator for allowance, nor any allegation waiving all recourse against any property of the estate, as provided by section 1500, Code Civ. Proc. This contention is, under the circumstances shown by the record, manifestly untenable. At the time of the trial the plaintiff asked leave of court to amend the complaint by inserting a waiver of all recourse against the property of the estate of George Brandt, other than that described in the complaint. To this the defendants objected, and the court sustained the objection in form, but allowed the plaintiff and the defendant Cowan to file with the clerk a statement that they waived all recourse against such property. The court should have allowed the amendment, and it was an abuse of discretion to refuse it; but, inasmuch as we think the paper filed by leave of court was in substance an amendment of the complaint, we think this error may be disregarded. The statement filed was entitled in the cause, and contained the waiver made necessary by section 1500, Code Civ. Proc., in cases where the claim has not been presented to the administrator. It was filed in the action and among the papers in the case, and, under the circumstances under which it was filed, it must be considered as a part of the complaint.

5. The appellant insists that this court should remand the cause, with directions to enter judgment in its favor for the foreclosure of this mortgage. Under the findings, we do not think this can be done.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

LEONARD v. McPHERSON et al. (S. F. 3,412.)*

LIBEL—NEWSPAPER PUBLICATIONS—COMPLAINT—DEMURRER.

Where an entire newspaper article, containing an alleged letter written by plaintiff, was charged to be false, and, if the letter were fabricated, the article, taken as a whole, was libelous per se, and was not a privileged publication specified by Civ. Code, §§ 45, 47, 48 (Code Civ. Proc. § 460), it was error to sustain a demurrer to the complaint for its failure to point out the portion of the publication charged to be libelous.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by J. J. C. Leonard against Duncan McPherson and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chas. M. Cassin and Lindsay & Netherton, for appellant. Joseph H. Skirm, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an action for libel. The demurrer of the defendants to the amended complaint of the plaintiff was sustained by the court below, and, the plaintiff declining further to amend, judgment was rendered against him and in favor of the defendants. This appeal is prosecuted from said judgment.

*Rehearing denied May 31, 1905.

It is alleged in the amended complaint that the plaintiff is, and for more than two years prior to the commencement of the action had been, engaged in the hotel business in the city of Santa Cruz, and was then, and for more than a year prior thereto had been, the sole owner and proprietor of the Hotel St. George, situated in said city, and, as such owner and proprietor of said hotel, was then, and had been for the period named, engaged in the hotel business, and catering to the public as such, including both the residents of said city and county of Santa Cruz, and others who arrived at said city from abroad, in the matter of hotel accommodations and board and lodging. That the defendants were, and for more than five years continuously had been, the exclusive proprietors and owners of the newspaper named the "Santa Cruz Morning Sentinel," published in the said city of Santa Cruz, which has, and has had, a large and extensive circulation in said city and county and state. That on the 30th day of March, 1902, the said defendants did falsely and maliciously, and with intention to expose the plaintiff to hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy, and to cause him to be shunned and avoided, and to be injured in his occupation and business, publish in said newspaper, of and concerning the plaintiff, the following article, to wit:

" 'For Shame! For Shame!

" 'Hotel St. George, Leonard & Walsh, Props.

" 'Santa Cruz, Cal., Nov. 8th, 1899.

" 'Mrs. C. W. Waldron, Dear Madam: It having been brought to our attention that you will not patronize anyone stopping at the "St. George," thereby decreasing our receipts between $2.50 and $3.00 per month, we have decided to retaliate in the following manner.

" '1st. We have notified our female help, which numbers eight girls at present, to take their patronage from you, under penalty of losing their positions.

" 'We have and do distribute among the business houses of this city from $1500 to $2000 monthly, and we will notify each and every one of them of your action, and notify them that we will withdraw our patronage from any of them that patronize you directly or indirectly during the term of your boycott of our house.

" 'We have never lowered ourselves to do anything of this kind previously, and hope never to have to do so again, and will not do it without notifying the parties concerned, as we do nothing underhanded, preferring all our actions to be open and aboveboard.

" 'Very respectfully yours,

" 'Leonard & Walsh.'

"In justice to Mr. Walsh, who is an intelligent gentleman, we will say that he disclaimed at the time all connection with the above threat. At that date J. J. C. Leonard was in active management, Mr. Walsh merely acting in an advisory capacity, although a partner in the hotel.

"Mr. and Mrs. Waldron were guests of the house when Leonard & Walsh became the lessees. While they were at the hotel during the Leonard & Walsh management their bills amounted to about $700. Desiring to go to housekeeping, as they had an American right to do, having become tired of hotel life, which was their great American privilege, they notified Mr. Leonard of their contemplated change on the eve of their leaving. This announcement aroused Mr. Leonard's anger to such a degree, at a second meeting, that he became insulting, apparently having been hurt at the idea of guests having the audacity to leave his inn without previously consulting him.

"The above letter, which is the very worst kind of a boycott, is self-explanatory. It can be seen at the Sentinel office by any one interested. It proves beyond doubt what may be termed 'bulldozing' tactics. It shows a desire to crush a woman engaged in business, although she had been a guest at his hotel and entitled to the most courteous treatment.

"Now for the facts to show that Mrs. Waldron was an innocent party, and the folly of jumping too hastily at conclusions: Gus E. Dorn, representing a San Francisco millinery house, had his trunks delivered at the St. George. He learned later that a former customer of his was stopping at the Ocean House, then conducted by the Pixleys. In order to sell her goods, he had his trunks taken to the Ocean House. Mrs. Waldron did not know that he had moved his trunks, nor did she care. It was Mr. Dorn's privilege to do what he pleased to accommodate or secure customers. As a matter of fact, Mrs. Waldron does not purchase, to any extent, of commercial travelers, preferring to make her selections at the wholesale houses in San Francisco.

"It was not on her account that Mr. Dorn decided to change from one hotel to the other, yet Mr. Leonard evidently jumped to the conclusion that it was.

"When Mr. Dorn heard of the letter he was greatly surprised and very indignant, knowing that Mrs. Waldron was an innocent party. He has never since visited Santa Cruz, although he used to come here often. Other commercial travelers for millinery houses also heard of the boycotting letter, and became so indignant over it that some of them cut Santa Cruz out of their itinerary.

"What can fair-minded people think of such a letter as the above?

"At the time Mrs. Waldron was advised by several prominent business people here to begin legal proceedings, but she decided to merely keep the letter as a souvenir of the present incumbent of the St. George."

And it is averred in the said amended complaint that the said publication was and is false and defamatory; that by means of said false and defamatory publication, as above alleged, said defendants did falsely and maliciously expose the plaintiff to general and public hatred, contempt, ridicule, and obloquy, causing him to be avoided and shunned, and did injure him in his occupation and business, to his damage in the sum of $10,000, for which judgment is prayed. The demurrer is placed upon the ground that the said amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and is ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain, specifying wherein it is alleged to be so ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain. In the order of the court below sustaining the demurrer it is recited, as a reason for sustaining the same, that a part of the publication consists of a letter written by the plaintiff himself, and that the pleader must select that portion of the publication upon which he bases his action. The amended complaint, however, as will be seen, denounces the whole article, as published, as being false, and this sweeping allegation applies to the letter alleged to have been written by the plaintiff, as well as to the comments upon it.

If the letter were fabricated, as must be assumed from the allegations of the complaint, then the article, taken as a whole, is libelous per se, inasmuch as it does not fall within the definition of a privileged publication. Civ. Code, §§ 45, 47, 48; Code Civ. Proc. § 460. The case of the late James Lick v. John J. Owen et al., 47 Cal. 252, is somewhat analogous to the one at bar. In that case the defendants, as editors and publishers of the San Jose Daily Mercury, published an article consisting of comments upon an alleged interview with Mr. Lick. In the interview Mr. Lick is alleged to have given, somewhat in detail, his early career, including wanderings in South America, and his arrival in California in pioneer days, and his various transactions and business in this state, where, by good luck rather than good management, he had accumulated a fortune. Subsequently, as stated in the article, defendants published a so-called "apology," making some few corrections in the alleged interview. Instead of demurring, the defendants in that case answered, admitted the publication, but alleging that it was published as a mere pleasantry, and without malice. The plaintiff submitted the case to the jury on the pleadings, and the only testimony for the defense was as to the exculpatory matter set up in the answer, denying that the publication was malicious. This being all the evidence, the court, of its own motion, charged the jury that the publication was libelous as tending to reflect shame upon the person of the plaintiff, and to hold him up to the people as an object of ridicule. In the opinion on the appeal in this court, it is said: "We agree with the court below on this point. * * * If the publication be libelous and not privileged, the law implies that it was malicious. This is not a mere presumption which may be wholly overcome by proof, but it is a legal conclusion, which cannot be rebutted. But whilst the absence of actual malice cannot be shown as a bar to the action, the defendant may plead and prove 'any mitigating circumstances to reduce the amount of the damages.'" And, as is said in Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 363: "All libels are conclusively presumed to be in some degree malicious." See, also, Fitch v. De Young, 66 Cal. 339, 5 Pac. 364.

The court below, under the circumstances, erred in sustaining the demurrer to the amended complaint. The judgment entered against the plaintiff must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to overrule the demurrer.

It is so ordered.

SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. v. CITY & COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 3,272.)*

TAXATION—ASSESSMENT—CHANGE OF ASSESSMENT—VALIDITY—STATUTE—NOTICE TO TAXPAYER—SUFFICIENCY—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. Loans secured by stocks and bonds are assessable for taxation as solvent credits.

2. In a suit by a taxpayer to recover a sum paid on an assessment for solvent credits on the ground that it had been added to the assessment without authority of the board of equalization, an allegation of the answer that defendant denied that such item was added without any authorization or direction by any board of equalization was sufficient to put the matter of authorization in issue.

3. In a suit by a taxpayer to recover taxes paid under protest on the ground that the assessment was not legally made the burden was on him to show that the acts relative to the assessment were unauthorized.

4. Pol. Code, § 3681, provides that the board of equalization may cause the assessor to assess any taxable property that has escaped assessment, or to make and enter new assessments; and section 3885 provides that no assessment or act relating to assessment or collection of taxes is illegal on account of informality. After an assessment book was delivered to the board of equalization, the assessor deducted from the item of "bonds" assessed to a taxpayer a certain sum, and assessed it as "solvent credits," the change being brought to the notice of the board, and the assessment as changed being allowed by the board to remain as the assessment, notwithstanding a claim made to the board by the taxpayer that the change had been unauthorized. Held, there was a proper assessment within the statutes.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by the Savings & Loan Society against the city and county of San Francisco. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Drown, Leicester & Drown, for appellant. Franklin K. Lane, City Atty., for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action to recover the sum of $5,702.46, taxes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, paid, under protest, upon an apparent assessment of $349,844 against plaintiff for solvent credits, upon the ground that said apparent assessment was void. The defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals therefrom upon the judgment roll.

At the time of the completion of the assessment book and its delivery by the assessor to the clerk of the board of supervisors, the only description of personal property contained in the assessment against plaintiff was to be found under the general column headed "Description of Property," with subheadings devoted to real property, and was as follows, viz.: "Fur. $1,000. Money $53,916. Bonds $569,952. Franchise $2,500. Bonds $1,183,244;" and in the column headed "Personal," under the subheading "Money and Solvent Credits," "$1,807,112," and under the subheading "Other Personal Property," "$1,000, 2,500," the various valuations aggregating $1,810,612. Thereafter, on July 14, 1899, while said assessment book was in the possession of the board of supervisors sitting and acting as a board of equalization, the assessor made the following changes in the descriptive part of the assessment, namely: He erased the words and figures "Bonds $569,952," and wrote in place thereof "Solv. Crdts. $349,844"; he changed the item "Bonds $1,183,244" to "Bonds $863,052"; and he changed the figures under the heading "Money and Solvent Credits" from "$1,807,112" to "$1,266,812," thus making the valuation of personalty aggregate $1,270,312, instead of $1,810,612. The county auditor computed the taxes to be paid by plaintiff upon its personalty upon said total sum of $1,270,312 only. When it came to the collection of taxes, it was ascertained and admitted that the only assessable bonds belonging to plaintiff on the first Monday of March, 1899, were certain municipal, county, and school district bonds, aggregating in value $220,108, and that the assessment on bonds was invalid to the extent of $642,944, the tax on which, at the rate for the year, was $10,479.98. This amount was therefore deducted by defendant, and the taxes on the remainder only claimed.

Plaintiff contended that the assessment was still further invalid to the extent of the $349,844 claimed to have been assessed on solvent credits, its claim being that no solvent credits had originally been assessed to it, and that it was only by reason of an unauthorized and void act of the assessor that it was apparently so assessed upon the roll in the hands of the tax collector. It accordingly paid the tax of $5,702.46 on such amount, under protest, and now seeks to recover it. The trial court found that the item of "Bonds $569,952" originally on the assessment roll in fact consisted of said sum of $349,844 in loans secured by stocks and bonds, assessable as solvent credits, and of $220,108 bonds of municipal corporations, and that the larger item of "Bonds $1,183,244" consisted entirely of bonds, including a duplication of the item of $220,108 municipal bonds. It further found, in effect, as follows, viz.: On July 11, 1899, plaintiff had been notified to appear before the board on July 14, 1899, to show cause why its assessment should not be increased. On July 13, 1899, it filed its verified petition asking for a reduction of its assessment for bonds by deducting $661,222.72. On July 14, 1899, it appeared before said board, after the changes heretofore noted had been made by the assessor, and in the presence of the board was informed by the assessor of such changes, and was requested by the assessor to examine the same, and, if dissatisfied therewith, to suggest the correction thereof. Plaintiff thereupon stated to the board that the changes had not been authorized, and were void, and asked for the reduction of its assessment on bonds, and failed to ask for any relief in regard to the changes, although it examined the roll and saw what alterations had been made. The board did not adjourn as a board of equalization until July 17, 1899. There is no claim that plaintiff did not own $349,844 of solvent credits, being the amount of loans secured by stocks and bonds, which were assessable as solvent credits (Sav. & L. Soc. v. City, etc., 131 Cal. 356, 63 Pac. 665; City, etc., v. Societe etc., 131 Cal. 612, 63 Pac. 1016; Security Sav. Bank v. City, etc., 132 Cal. 599, 64 Pac. 898). and the court expressly found that it did own such solvent credits. Plaintiff seeks to recover upon the ground that it was assessed in addition to its furniture, franchise, and money only for "bonds," and not for any solvent credits. It says that there was a valid assessment only for bonds in the aggregate sum of $1,753,196, and that such assessment has never been lawfully changed, and is still in force. Confessedly, an assessment limited literally to bonds could be enforced only to the extent of $220,108, so that, if it be determined here that it was never legally assessed for its solvent credits, it will escape payment of taxes upon $349,844, property owned by it, and for which it should have been assessed.

It must, of course, be conceded that a valid assessment is essential to the collection of a tax. As said by Mr. Cooley, it is the most important of all proceedings in taxation, is the first step, and the foundation of all others. Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 597 As said by this court in Lake County v. S. B. Q. M. Co., 66 Cal. 17, 20, 4 Pac. 876: "Without an assessment, all subsequent proceedings are nullities; and in making the assessment the provisions of the statute under which it is to be made must be observed with particularity." It must further be conceded that the assessor had no power to make any change in the assessment after he delivered his roll to the board of equalization, unless such changes were authorized by the board of supervisors under sections 3679 and 3681 of the Political Code, or with the written consent of the city and county attorney under section 3881 of the same Code. It is not contended that any change was made with the consent of the city and county attorney. Learned counsel for plaintiff are, however, in error in stating that there was no issue upon the point as to whether the changes were authorized by the board of supervisors. While the allegations in the complaint upon this subject are much more specific than the denials of the answer, the defendant did deny "that said item of solvent credits was added * * * without any authorization or direction by any board of supervisors or any board of equalization." This was sufficient to put the matter of authorization in issue, and to justify the finding of the probative facts in regard thereto. If the probative facts so found compel the conclusion that the particular changes made could be and were authorized by the board of supervisors, it appears to us the plaintiff's case must fail. Mr. Cooley says that the idea on which a suit for taxes paid is predicated is that the municipality has received that which, in justice, it ought not to retain, and that, therefore, where the proceedings have been simply irregular, the action will not lie. There must be something further. The tax must be void, a mere nullity. Cooley (3d Ed.) p. 1493.

It is provided by section 3885, Pol. Code, that "no assessment or act relating to assessment or collection of taxes is illegal on account of informality, nor because the same was not completed within the time required by law," and this section is applicable to proceedings before the board of supervisors sitting as a board of equalization. Buswell v. Board of Supervisors, 116 Cal. 351, 353, 48 Pac. 226; La Grange Min. Co. v. Carter, 142 Cal. 560, 564, 76 Pac. 241.

Section 3681 of the Political Code provides that the board of equalization "may direct the assessor to assess any taxable property that has escaped assessment," or "to make and enter new assessments (at the same time canceling previous entries), when any assessment made by him is deemed by the board so incomplete as to render doubtful the collection of the tax"; the statute further providing that the clerk shall notify the person interested by letter, at least five days before action taken, of the day fixed when the matter will be investigated, and also that the clerk of the board shall keep a record of all such changes. See section 3682, Pol. Code. This court has said: "Section 3681, Pol. Code, simply extends the power and duty of the assessor, enabling and requiring him, at the request of the board, to list and assess property which he had failed to assess, notwithstanding the time for assessments had passed, and the roll was no longer in his possession. And the exercise of this power is directly in accord with the policy and express provisions of the Constitution, which requires all property not exempt from taxation to be taxed." Farmers', etc., Bank v. Board, 97 Cal. 318, 323, 32 Pac. 312, 313.

There can be no doubt that, so far as the changes made are material here, viz., the change in the designation of the kind or quality of a portion of the personal property from "bonds" to "solvent credits," or from a specific kind of solvent credits to the general terms including them, they could have been made by the assessor under the direction of the board of equalization under the provisions of section 3681, Pol. Code. It is entirely immaterial in this connection whether the effect of such a change would be an "addition" to the assessment of property that had escaped assessment or simply a correction in the description of property already assessed, with an insufficient and incomplete description. This section would have authorized such a change in either event. This being so, the question is as to whether the change was authorized. The presumption in cases of this character is in favor of the assessment. It was incumbent upon plaintiff to allege and prove a case showing that the acts relative to this assessment for solvent credits were unauthorized by law. See San Francisco v. Flood, 64 Cal. 504, 508, 2 Pac. 264. It was in accord with this theory that plaintiff alleged an unauthorized addition of this item of solvent credits. We are of the opinion that the finding of the court in this regard establishes a case of a change made under the direction of the board of equalization. The procedure was somewhat informal, it may be conceded, but, as we have seen, mere informality will not invalidate. The change was made by the assessor while the roll was in the custody of the board. It was brought to the notice of the board, and the assessment, so changed, was allowed by the board to remain as the assessment against the plaintiff, notwithstanding the claim made to the board by plaintiff that the change had not been authorized. Although at the moment when actually made upon the roll the change may not have been authorized, the board could undoubtedly subsequently authorize and require such change, and it would be entirely unnecessary to go through the manual work of restoring the original entry and again making the same change. And where the board acquiesced in the change under the circumstances here appearing, and allowed the assessment to stand as changed, it, in effect, directed and required such change, and what up to that moment may have been absolutely unauthorized and void became valid.

The contention that the board was without power to authorize the change in this case for want of notice to the taxpayer is not well founded. According to the allegations of its complaint and the finding of the court, it appeared before said board in response to a citation to show cause why its assessment should not be increased; and from the findings it appears that it was then and there informed, in the presence of the board, of the changes that had been made. It did not take advantage of the opportunity afforded to urge and show that it did not own and should not be assessed for solvent credits in the amount stated, but contented itself with the claim that the change had not been authorized, and was void. The taxpayer had, however, voluntarily appeared before the board in response to a citation to show cause why its "assessment" should not be increased. This notice implied not only that the valuation of the very property assessed might be increased, but also that the subject of taxation might be increased by the addition of other property. Farmers', etc., Bank v. Board, 97 Cal. 318, 325, 32 Pac. 312. By its voluntary appearance the objection that five days' notice had not been given was waived (Farmers', etc., Bank v. Board, supra), and the board had jurisdiction to proceed. The provision as to notice is designed solely to give the taxpayer an opportunity to appear and contend against any improper changes being made; and when he is in fact before the board, with full opportunity to be heard in his own behalf, the fact that notice has not been given to him by the clerk for the prescribed time, or that a notice given lacked something as to the exact details of the proposed changes, cannot affect the jurisdiction of the board. Upon the appearance of the taxpayer here it was informed specifically as to the proposed changes, changes entirely within the power of the board to sanction. The only objection was, in effect, that such changes had not as yet been authorized.

We have fully considered the contention of defendant to the effect that certain findings are inconsistent with allegations of the complaint admitted by the answer and with certain allegations of the answer. So far as the particular matter which we have discussed is concerned, we have already indicated our opinion that the issue was made by the pleadings. The fact that the defendant had denied that any addition was made to the assessment by the change, and alleged that the plaintiff had originally been assessed for its solvent credits, did not bar it from also denying that, if any change had been made, such change had not been authorized by the board of equalization. The finding upon this issue is not inconsistent with any admission made by the pleadings. This is sufficient for the purposes of this decision, for the finding that the $349,844 solvent credits were originally included in the item of "Bonds $569,952," is not material to the judgment. The assessment of the solvent credits was a valid assessment, because made in compliance with law, under the direction of the board of equalization. We may say, however, that we do not consider the findings as to the composition of the item of "Bonds $569,952" to be without the issues. Whether or not this finding could stand in the face of the specific finding as to what the assessment was as it originally appeared upon the roll is another question, which also is immaterial here, in view of the conclusion we have reached upon the other branch of the case. It may well be contended that where the description in an assessment is clear and unambiguous as to the property to be assessed, it cannot be shown by extrinsic evidence that it was intended to include other property. It has often been said that the assessment roll, when completed and certified to the board of supervisors, is the only evidence of the acts and intentions of the assessor. People v. S. F. Sav. Union, 31 Cal. 132; The People, etc., v. The S. & C. R. Co., 49 Cal. 414; People v. Hastings, 34 Cal. 571, 574; Allen v. McKay, 139 Cal. 94, 100, 72 Pac. 713. While, too, under our statute (Pol. Code, § 3650, subd. 4), an assessment of personal property which did not show the number, kind, amount, and quality would not be invalid (San Francisco v. Pennie, 93 Cal. 465, 469, 29 Pac. 66; Dear v. Weineke, 94 Cal. 322, 29 Pac. 646; San Francisco v. Flood, 64 Cal. 504, 2 Pac. 264; People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 432, 441; Cooley on Taxation [3d Ed.] 644; 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law [2d Ed.] 682), the statute contemplates such a showing (Pol. Code, § 3650, subds. 4, 10, 11), and where the assessment does show the kind of property there is certainly room for the contention that the description thus given in pursuance of law cannot be treated as surplusage and wholly disregarded, and that the assessment thus made cannot be held to include property of a kind not suggested by the description given. But, as already said, it is not necessary here to decide these questions.

McDONALD v. PACIFIC DEBENTURE CO.

(S. F. 3,166, 3,314.)*

LOTTERIES—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—BREACH OF CONTRACT—RECOVERY—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

1. A complaint for money had and received, alleging that defendant was on a certain date indebted to a certain person in a specified sum for money had and received by defendant for the use and benefit of such person, while not strictly in compliance with the Code provision that the complaint shall consist of a statement of facts constituting the cause of action, is nevertheless sufficient.

2. An answer to such a complaint denying that defendant was indebted to the person in question in the sum alleged, or any other sum, for money had and received for the use and benefit of such person, or upon any account at all, was sufficient.

3. A contract between plaintiff and a corporation requiring it to pay certain coupons attached to the contract, in accordance with a table given, during the time that plaintiff was making certain required monthly payments to the corporation, the time or order of payment not appearing from the contract to have been based on any chance or hazard, did not amount to a lottery.

4. Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 2, provides that a party may rescind a contract, if, through the fault of the party as to whom he rescinds, the consideration for his obligation fails in whole or in part. Section 1691, subd. 2, provides that one rescinding a contract must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract, or must offer to restore the same on condition that such party shall do likewise, unless the latter is unable or positively refuses so to do. After plaintiff had made several payments, the corporation refused to receive any more payments, stating that it had decided to go out of business, whereupon plaintiff brought an action for the amounts that he had paid; producing on the trial his contract, and offering to cancel it or deliver it to defendant. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to recover; a return or offer to restore the contract not being a condition precedent to the bringing of the action.

5. It was proper to refuse to allow an inquiry in regard to the disposition of monthly payments to the corporation.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

Action by John McDonald against the Pacific Debenture Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Cavitt and C. A. Elliott (D. E. Alexander, of counsel), for appellant. Louis S. Beedy and John T. Pidwell, for respondent.

SHAW, J. These two cases present appeals from a judgment and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial in the same case. No. 3,166 presents the appeal from the judgment, and No. 3,314 an appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

The complaint sets forth a cause of action in 29 separate counts for money had and received. The plaintiff sues in the first count for money had and received on his own account by the defendant for his use, and in the subsequent counts upon similar demands by others, assignors of the plaintiff.

It is admitted by the respondent that, by reason of certain clerical errors in the computation of the amount, judgment was rendered for $52 in excess of the amount actually due to the plaintiff, and the judgment must be modified to that extent.

The respondent claims that the answer admits all of the allegations of the complaint, except the allegations of the assignment by the respective original claimants to the plaintiff in the action. The allegations in respect to the counts of the complaint, and the denials thereof in the answer, are all in the same form, and can best be shown by setting forth in full the portions thereof relating to the second count of the complaint. That portion of the complaint was as follows: "(2) That said defendant was indebted on the 2d day of July, 1901, to Withold Friedman in the sum of $218, lawful money of the United States, for money had and received by said defendant for the use and benefit of said Withold Friedman." The remaining portion of this count consisted of an allegation of the assignment, and a statement that the amount was unpaid. The answer as to this part of the second count of the complaint is as follows: "Denies that on the 2d day of July, 1901, or upon any day, or at all, it was indebted to Withold Friedman in the sum of $218, or in any sum or at all, for money had and received for the use and benefit of the said Withold Friedman, or for or upon any account or at all."

Although it is not strictly in compliance with the Code provision that the complaint shall consist of the statement of facts constituting the cause of action, yet it has been settled by repeated decisions that a complaint for money had and received, in the language contained in the complaint in this action, is sufficient. We are of the opinion that, where this form of complaint is used by the plaintiff, the defendant is not required to deny the allegations in any more specific language than that in which they are set forth in the complaint. The particular criticism of the respondent is that the answer does not deny that the defendant did in fact have or receive money for the use of Withold Friedman. The same criticism might be extended to the complaint in the form used by the respondent. It does not directly allege that the defendant had actually received money for the use of Withold Friedman. We can perceive no good reason for holding the defendant to a more strict rule of pleading than that allowed in favor of plaintiff. The cases cited by the respondent upon this proposition do not go so far as we are asked to go in this case, to hold the answer insufficient. Moreover, it appears from the record that the answers were treated in the court below, both by the court and by all the parties, as sufficient to raise an issue upon all the allegations in the complaint.

A considerable portion of the argument on both sides is devoted to a discussion of the question whether or not, conceding that the transaction between the defendant and the respective original holders of the demands sued on constituted a participation in a lottery scheme, the plaintiff is entitled to recover; it being claimed by defendant that the parties are in pari delicto in an unlawful contract, and that a court will not aid either, but will leave them as it finds them, and by the plaintiff that the holders of the contracts are not equally guilty with the company, and that plaintiff may recover, notwithstanding the fact that the money was paid for a share in a lottery scheme. We do not find it necessary to consider this question. There is no sufficient evidence that the enterprise was a lottery. The only evidence on the subject consists of the contents of one of the contracts or debentures issued by the defendants, which is set forth in full. It shows that, in consideration of the payment by the holder of $2 monthly for 120 consecutive months, the defendant agreed to pay the holder $400 in the manner provided in the contract. Eight coupons, for $50 each, payable to bearer, and numbered consecutively from 14,537 to 14,544, were attached to the particular contract set forth. These were to be surrendered and paid whenever "called for redemption" by the company. Fifty per cent. of the monthly payments and other receipts of the company was to be put into a "maturity fund," and used "for the payment of coupons under the redemption privilege as shown by the table of payments," and the other moiety was held for payment of such of the coupons as should not be called in during the 120 months, and to pay for the services of the company. The "table of payment of coupons" was, so far as necessary to give it, as follows:

1 then 4 then 8 then 16 then 24 then 32 then 40 then 48 2 then (paid) then 56 then 64 then 72 then 80 then 88 then 96 3 then 12 then 104 then 112 then 120 then 128 then 136 then 144

And so on indefinitely, using four as a multiple and paying six terminal coupons after each multiple until the terminal number shall exceed the number sold, when payment shall revert to the numerals and multiples.

There is no further explanation of what this "table of payment" means. Whether the puzzle can be solved with or without extrinsic aid not afforded by the record, we need not decide, for it is at least clear that on its face it does not make the time or order of payment of any coupon depend on chance or hazard. The effect of the contract is that the defendant will pay the coupons in accordance with the table given, whatever it may mean, during the time that the holder is making the monthly payments, and that at the expiration of that time (that is, 10 years after the monthly payments begin) it will pay whatever then remains unpaid of the $400 promised. We do not perceive in this contract anything which partakes of the nature of a lottery, and consequently the discussion concerning the rights of the respective parties upon the theory that the enterprise was illegal is not pertinent to the case.

Upon the facts as presented in the evidence, the case is comparatively simple. In the case of the contract executed by the defendant to the plaintiff himself, for instance, after the plaintiff had paid the sum of $54.50 in monthly payments, in accordance with the contract, he offered on July 1, 1901, to make the monthly payment then due under the terms of the contract. The defendant refused to receive the payment, and stated that the company had decided to go no further with its business; that it proposed to liquidate its outstanding indebtedness, and would no longer carry on or continue the performance of the contract on its part. The plaintiff was ready and willing to pay the installment then due, but the defendant not only refused to receive the same, but its agent refused further conference, and left the presence of the plaintiff without allowing him to make further tenders or demands. Thereupon, treating his contract as rescinded, the plaintiff brought the action to recover the sum of money which had been already paid in pursuance of the contract. The same transactions occurred with reference to each claimant who subsequently assigned his claim to the plaintiff, and which constitute the causes of action set forth in the complaint. The court was justified, from this evidence, in finding that the defendant refused to go on with the contract, that the consideration for the previous payments had failed by the fault of the defendant, and that the plaintiff had the right to rescind, and its conclusion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover is correct. Duncanson v. Walton, 111 Cal. 516, 44 Pac. 174; Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 2. It was not necessary to return or offer to restore the contract, as a condition precedent to the right to recover the money paid. The defendant's conduct was in effect a positive refusal under any circumstances to return the money already received, and this positive refusal relieved the other parties from the necessity of offering to return or cancel the contract prior to beginning the action. Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 2. Upon the trial the plaintiff produced all the contracts involved, and offered to cancel them or deliver them to defendant. This was sufficient to entitle plaintiff to recover.

Exceptions were taken to the refusal of the court to allow an inquiry in regard to the disposition of the monthly payments. We cannot perceive any theory upon which such evidence would be admissible. The liability of the defendant did not depend upon its ability to pay the demand, nor upon the disposition of the money it had received, but upon its refusal to proceed with the undertaking, and the consequent right of the holders of contracts to rescind.

There are no other questions in the record which we think worthy of notice.

The judgment of the court below is modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $52, allowing the same to stand as a judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for $2,112.50, with interest from its date; and as so modified the judgment is affirmed, without costs to the respondent. The order denying a new trial is also affirmed.

Action by Jeremiah Creed and wife against C. L. McCombs and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Submission of appeal set aside and cause resubmitted. Haas & Garrett, for appellants. Dunn & Crutcher, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This case presents questions of importance and of general interest to many parties not here represented. In the case of Chase v. Trout (L. A. 1,217) 80 Pac. 81, recently submitted to the court in bank, after rehearing, the questions involved were more fully argued, and for the purpose of fuller consideration of both cases the submission herein is set aside, and the cause resubmitted as of this date.

PEOPLE v. HOWARD. (Cr. 1,128.) (Supreme Court of California. April 8, 1905.) In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County. Wilson R. Howard appeals from a conviction. Affirmed. George W. Waldorf and James P. Sex, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James H. Campbell, Dist. Atty., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death. He appeals from the judgment. No argument, oral or written, has ever been made in support of the appeal, and upon motion of the Attorney General the case was submitted upon the record, which contains no bill of exceptions and discloses none of the evidence. We can discover no error in the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

WILKES v. THOMAS (McCOY, Intervener). (S. F. 4,027.) (Supreme Court of California. April 6, 1905.) In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; M. L. Short, Judge. Action by Albert R. Wilkes against Mary J. Thomas. Charles B. McCoy intervened. From the judgment rendered, and from an order denying a new trial, intervener appeals. Dismissed. Charles G. Lamberson, for appellant. Galpin & Bolton, for respondent. James F. Peck, Solinsky & Wehe, and Chas. C. Boynton, amici curiæ.

SHAW, J. This is a motion to dismiss the appeals of the intervener from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The appeals referred to are docketed on the Los Angeles calendar as L. A. No. 1,542. The case involves the respective rights of Albert R. Wilkes and Mary J. Thomas to purchase a part of the same lands as are involved in the case of Youle v. Thomas (S. F. No. 4,026) 80 Pac. 714, in which a similar motion was this day decided. In all material particulars the facts and questions of law are the same in this case as in that case. Upon the authority of that case, the appeals of intervener Charles B. McCoy from the judgment and order denying his motion for new trial, which appeals are docketed as L. A. No. 1,542, are dismissed.

1. Appeal—Order Granting New Trial—Presumption.

Where an order granting a new trial does not disclose the ground on which it was granted, and the record nowhere discloses that the motion for a new trial was not in part based on grounds which, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 657, 658, require the use of affidavits on the hearing, or that affidavits in support of one or more of such grounds were not in fact used on the hearing, it will be conclusively presumed on appeal from the order that the motion was in part based on some ground on which affidavits could be used, that affidavits were in fact used, and that they were sufficient.

2. Same—Bill of Exceptions.

A party desiring to appeal from the grant of a new trial is entitled to show what was used on the hearing of the motion by bill of exceptions settled as authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 651.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action by M. Isabel Wyckoff, as administratrix, against the Pajaro Valley Consolidated Railroad Company. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lindsay & Netherton, for appellant. S. F. Geil and C. F. Lacey, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial. The order granting the motion does not disclose the ground upon which it was granted, and the record on appeal nowhere discloses that the motion for a new trial made by defendant was not, in part, based upon grounds requiring the use of affidavits upon the hearing, such as irregularities, misconduct of the jury, accident, or surprise, and newly discovered evidence (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 657, 658), or that affidavits in support of one or more of such grounds were not, in fact, used on the hearing of such motion. The case is in no respect different from that of Skinner v. Horn, 144 Cal. 278, 77 Pac. 904, and 79 Pac. 597. In that case it was said by this court, speaking of an appeal from an order granting a new trial, "The burden is on him [the appellant] to show error in the action of the trial court. The presumption is that the order granting a new trial was properly made, and, in the absence of a bill of exceptions showing what was used on the motion, unless the record on appeal establishes the contrary, it will be conclusively presumed in favor of the order that the motion was in part based upon some ground upon which affidavits could be used, that affidavits were in fact used on the hearing, and also that such affidavits were sufficient to justify the court in the making of the order appealed from." 144 Cal. 280, 77 Pac. 905. It was further pointed out in that case that the party desiring to appeal from an order granting a new trial may always show what was used on the hearing of the motion by a bill of exceptions settled as authorized by section 651, Code Civ. Proc.

It is unnecessary to notice the other points made by respondent in support of the order appealed from, as such order must be affirmed for the reason already stated.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

BELL v. STANDARD QUICKSILVER CO. (S. F. 3,416.)

1. Corporations — By-Laws—Construction—Officers—Powers—Directors' Meetings.

The by-laws of a corporation provided that the directors should elect a president, and, if the president should be unable to act, the vice president should take his place and perform his duties, and, if both should be unable to act, they should appoint some other member of the board to do so, in whom should be vested for the time being all the duties and functions of the office; that the president, or, in his absence or inability to act, the vice president, or, in the absence or inability of both to act, the director appointed as provided should call the directors together, etc.; and that the president or two of the directors might call special meetings of the directors at any time, notice to be given in the manner prescribed. Held, that the last clause of the introductory paragraph should be applied separately to each subsequent clause and paragraph, so that the vice president had power to call special meetings; the power given to two of the directors to call such meetings being independent of that vested in the president, or the person acting as such in his absence.

2. Same—Special Meetings.

Where the by-laws of a corporation authorized the vice president to call a special meeting of the directors in the absence of the president, and it did not appear that it was conditional to the vice president's right to act that an effort to procure the president's presence was necessary, or that there was any fraudulent intent or purpose to take advantage of his absence, the call of a meeting by the vice president while the president was absent at his usual place of business, in another county than the domicile of the corporation, was not objectionable because the president, if notified, might have reached the corporation's principal place of business and acted on the call within four or five hours.

3. Same—Notice—Sufficiency.

Notice of a special meeting of the board of directors of a corporation, signed by its vice president, and mailed by him personally to the directors, constituted a sufficient written declaration of the necessity of such meeting to make a legal call thereof.

4. Same.

Where the by-laws of a corporation did not prescribe any form of notice of directors' special meetings, a notice directed to directors, and stating that a special meeting of the board of directors of the corporation would be held at the office of the company, in a certain room in a building in a specified city, on a specified date, and at a specified hour, signed by the vice president, who was also secretary, though failing to state the object of the meeting, constituted a sufficient compliance with the corporation's by-laws, requiring written or printed notice of such meetings to be given by mail, etc., and with Civ. Code, § 320, requiring that notice of special meetings, when no provision is otherwise made in the by-laws, must be in writing, and be given by the secretary.

5. Same—Powers of Vice President.

The by-laws of a corporation authorized the vice president, who was also secretary, to act in the absence of the president, and required the secretary to issue notices of directors' special meetings. On an issue as to the validity of a notice signed by the vice president, it was found that he was both vice president and secretary, that the president was absent, and that the vice president made the call and mailed the notices, which were set out in full. Held, that it would be presumed, in support of a judgment finding that such notice was valid, that the cause of the vice president's assumption of the functions of the office of the president in making the call was the absence of the president from the office, and that in mailing the notices the vice president was then acting in his capacity as secretary.

6. Pleading—Amended Complaint.

Where, in an action to set aside a stock assessment, it was alleged that more than one-fourth of the stock had been sold, paid for, and certificates issued prior to the assessment, as required by Civ. Code, § 331, in order to authorize the levy of an assessment, it was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion to deny plaintiff leave to file a second amended complaint, alleging that one-fourth of the capital stock of the corporation had not been subscribed at the time the assessment was made.

7. Same.

Where, in an action to set aside a corporate stock subscription, it did not appear that plaintiff did not know that the assessment was not levied for the purpose of paying expenses, debts of the corporation, or conducting its business at the time the original complaint was filed, and there was no claim that such contention could be proved, it was not error for the court to refuse to permit an amendment of the complaint containing an allegation of such fact.

8. Corporations — Stock Assessment — Action to Vacate.

Where, in an action to vacate a corporate stock assessment, the proof showed that notice of the directors' meeting at which the levy was made was mailed by T. in his capacity as secretary, instead of vice president, as the answer alleged, it was proper for the court to permit an amendment of the answer to conform to the proof.

9. Same—Evidence.

Where, in an action to set aside a corporate stock assessment, proof was introduced showing that the presence of the president at the office of the corporation to call the meeting could have been obtained within a few hours if an effort had been made in that behalf, and there was no allegation of fraud in the fact that the meeting was called by the vice president in the president's absence, it was not error for the court to refuse to compel the president to answer questions with reference to the corporation's ability to have obtained his presence to call the meeting if desired.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Teresa Bell, special administratrix of the estate of Thomas Bell, deceased, against the Standard Quicksilver Company. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, she appeals. Affirmed.

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. John Flournoy, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The object of the action was to obtain a decree declaring invalid an assessment of less than 10 per cent. upon the stock of the defendant corporation, and to set aside a sale under said assessment of 17,000 shares of the stock belonging to the estate of the deceased. The case was tried by the court, findings were filed, and judgment was entered for the defendant.

The principal point relied on by the plaintiff is that the assessment is void for the reason that it was made at a special meeting of the board of directors which was not regularly called. The board of directors consists of five members, of whom Thomas Derby was president, and H. H. Taylor the vice president and secretary. The by-laws contained the following provisions with respect to the calling of meetings of the directors:

"Article 7. President. The board of directors shall, at their first regular meeting, elect one of their number to act as president; and if at any time the president shall be unable to act, the vice president shall take his place and perform his duties; and if both the president and vice president, from any cause, shall be unable to act, they shall appoint some other member of the board to do so, in whom shall be vested for the time being, all the duties and functions of his office. The president, or in his absence or inability to act, the vice president, or in the absence or inability of both to act, the director, appointed as above provided:

"(1) Shall preside over all meetings of the stockholders and directors, and shall have the casting vote.

"(2) He shall sign, as president, all certificates of stock and all contracts and other instruments of writing which have been approved by the board of directors, and he shall draw checks upon the depositary of the company.

"(3) He shall call the directors together whenever he deems it necessary, and shall have, subject to the advice of the directors, direction of the affairs of the corporation, and generally shall discharge such other duties as may be required of him by the by-laws of the corporation.

"The president, or two of the directors, may call special meetings of the directors at any time, and notice shall be given of such called meetings by mailing a written or printed notice at the last known place of business or of residence of each director forty-eight hours prior to the time of meeting. Such service of notice shall be entered on the minutes of the corporation; and the said minutes, upon being read and approved at a subsequent meeting of the board shall be conclusive upon the question of service."

Upon a consideration of all the provisions of this article of the by-laws, it is clear that in the absence or inability to act of the president, the vice president is substituted for him, occupies his place, and possesses for the time being all the powers therein mentioned which the president would have if personally present and capable of acting. The last clause of the introductory paragraph of the article must be applied separately to each subsequent clause and paragraph, so that the power of the vice president to call special meetings is the same as if the article in that respect read as follows: "The president, or, in his absence or inability to act, the vice president, or, in the absence or inability of both, the director thereunto appointed by the board, shall call the directors together whenever he deems it necessary, and may call special meetings of the directors at any time, or two of the directors may call such special meetings." The power given to two of the directors to call special meetings is independent of that vested in the president, or the person who may be acting as such in his absence. The last paragraph of the article cannot reasonably be construed as a limitation of the power to the president personally, or to two of the directors, to the exclusion of the person who by the previous provisions may be for the time acting as president.

On the 3d day of August, 1898, Taylor, the vice president and secretary, made and sent through the mails to each director, properly addressed, a written notice in the following language:

"San Francisco, Aug. 3, 1898. Dear Sir: A special meeting of the board of directors of the Standard Quicksilver Co. will be held at the office of the company, Room 1, 2nd Floor of the Mills Building, San Francisco, Cal., on Wednesday, the 10th day of August, 1898, at half past one o'clock p. m.

"H. H. Taylor, Vice President."

During all of the year 1898 the president of the corporation was residing at New Almaden, in Santa Clara county, and was engaged in business there; and during the entire day on which this notice was made and sent to the directors he was actually in New Almaden, and absent from San Francisco. At this time the principal place of business of the corporation was in San Francisco, and its office was the room designated in the above notice. The fact that the president was absent in New Almaden at the time this meeting was called was a sufficient absence, within the meaning of the by-laws, to authorize the vice president to act in his place. It is true that it appears from the evidence that if he had been requested or notified to do so, and had been so minded, he could have traveled from New Almaden to the office of the corporation in San Francisco in four or five hours, for the purpose of considering the matter of the call. But there is nothing in the by-laws to the effect that the vice president cannot act for and in place of the president in his absence until after the president has been requested to attend, or notified of the importance of some act to be done, and has refused or neglected to attend for that purpose. Nor is there anything appearing in the case which would make such an effort to procure his presence necessary to the valid action of the vice president in his place. It is not claimed that there was any fraudulent intent or purpose to take advantage of his absence to make a call which he would not have made if he had been present. And indeed he acquiesced in the call, and attended the meeting without protest or objection, and voted for the assessment in question. It is not necessary, under the provisions of the by-laws, that the president shall be out of the state, or beyond the reach of mail or other communication, in order to authorize another to act in his place or exercise his power. This would not be claimed in regard to a check made in his absence. It might possibly be that temporary absence through some part of the day, where there was no emergency demanding immediate action before his return, even in the absence of fraud, might not be sufficient to authorize the vice president to act in calling a meeting. As to this we express no opinion. All that is necessary to decide upon this phase of the case is that where the president of a corporation resides and is engaged in business in another county, many miles distant from the place of business of the corporation, and is actually absent from that place of business, there being no claim that he customarily was in daily or frequent attendance at such place of business, and it would require several hours to procure his attendance, the vice president can, under these circumstances, and under the provisions of this by-law, act in his place during such absence.

Vice president Taylor was also the secretary of the corporation, and the findings show that he personally made and mailed to the respective directors the notice of the meeting above set forth. This was a sufficient compliance with the law and the by-laws in question. Conceding, for the purposes of the case, that some written declaration by the vice president was necessary to make a legal call, this instrument, being signed by him as vice president, was a sufficient official statement or order to answer that purpose. Section 320 of the Civil Code provides that notice of special meetings, when no provision otherwise is made in the by-laws, must be in writing, and must be given by the secretary. It does not, however, nor do the by-laws in question, prescribe any form of notice, nor require that it shall be signed by the secretary. Hence any form or manner of written notice sufficient to inform the directors that a special meeting of the directors is called, and of the exact time and place where it is to be held, will be valid. Granger v. Original E. M. & M. Co., 59 Cal. 682. Where the call is signed by an officer authorized to make it, as in this case, and contains in itself all the essential requisites of a notice, it will answer all the purposes of a notice under section 320 aforesaid. That section merely devolves upon the secretary the duty of giving the notice. To give a written notice is not to write or sign the paper expressing the information constituting the notice. It implies only that the person charged with that duty shall by some means see to it that the necessary notice is delivered to the person who is to receive it. It is the equivalent of the service of papers, and involves only a delivery of sufficient notice to the proper person. This duty Taylor, as secretary, performed when he mailed the notices in question to each director, properly addressed and postpaid.

The notice need not state the object or purpose of the meeting. Neither the by-laws nor the Code requires that it should. Granger v. Original, etc., Co., supra.

It is objected that there is no finding that Taylor acted as vice president because of the absence of the president in calling the meeting, nor that as secretary he gave the notice. The finding is that Taylor was both vice president and secretary, that the president was absent, and that Taylor made the call and mailed the notices; setting out the notice in full, as above set forth. It will be observed that the notice itself purports to be signed by Taylor in his capacity as vice president. We think these findings were sufficient. It was unnecessary to find except upon the ultimate facts. The findings must be construed strongly in support of the judgment. Private transactions are presumed to be regular, and the ordinary course of business is presumed to have been followed. It will therefore be presumed from the facts found that the cause of Taylor's assumption of the functions of the office of president was the absence of that officer from the office, and that in mailing the notices he was then assuming to act in his capacity as secretary—the capacity which required him to perform that duty. When a person holding an office which requires him to perform a certain act is found to have performed that act, it will not, for the purpose of defeating the judgment, be presumed that he did it otherwise than in his proper official capacity.

Upon examining the record, we think that all the findings are fully supported by the evidence. It would serve no useful purpose to discuss the evidence in detail upon this branch of the case.

We find no ground upon which the assessment could be declared invalid.

The court did not abuse its discretion in denying the plaintiff leave to file a second amended complaint. The statement that one-fourth of the capital stock of the corporation had not been subscribed at the time the assessment was made, which is one of the allegations not found in the previous complaint, is shown to be a mere conclusion and absolutely without foundation by the subsequent averments that at least three-fifths of the stock had been sold, paid for, and certificates issued therefor many years prior to the assessment. The issuance of the certificates for the stock disposes of all questions regarding the subscription therefor. The provision of the Code (Civ. Code, § 331) that one-fourth of the capital stock must be subscribed before an assessment can be levied is completely satisfied by the issuance of, and full payment for, certificates for more than one-fourth of the stock. The only other new matter in the proposed amendment was an allegation that the assessment was not levied for the purpose of paying expenses, conducting business, or paying debts of the corporation. There was, however, no showing that the plaintiff did not know of the facts involved in this allegation at the time the original complaint was filed, nor was there any claim that any evidence could be procured to prove the averments if the amendment had been allowed. The court, under these circumstances, might, in its discretion, have either allowed or refused the amendment, and in either case this court would not interfere.

It was clearly within the discretion of the court to allow the defendant after the trial to amend his answer so as to make it appear therefrom that the notices of the meeting of the directors in question had been mailed by Taylor in his capacity as secretary, instead of in his capacity as vice president, as the answer had previously alleged. The proof had indicated that his action in this particular was in his capacity as secretary, and it was proper to allow an amendment to conform to the proof.

Prior to the trial the deposition of the president, Derby, was taken, and in giving his deposition he declined to answer some questions intended to elicit the fact that his presence at the office of the corporation to call the meeting in question could have been obtained within a few hours if an effort had been made in that behalf. Error is assigned upon the refusal of the court to compel him to answer these questions. We do not see how the plaintiff could have been injured by this action of the court. The answers given by the witness, and which were introduced in evidence upon the trial, sufficiently showed this to be the fact, and there does not seem to have been any serious dispute upon it at any time. The questions intended to show that he had not been requested to attend were immaterial to the cause of action set forth in the complaint, there being no allegations tending to show any fraudulent purpose or intent.

Several rulings at the trial upon the questions arising upon the admission of evidence were excepted to, and are assigned as error, but they all relate to questions already discussed, and come within the principles already laid down. It is therefore unnecessary to mention them specifically.

RAISCH v. HILDEBRANDT et al. (S. F. 3,171.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — STREET ASSESSMENTS — FORECLOSURE — ACTIONS — PRIMA FACIE CASE—PLEADINGS—ADMISSIONS.

Where, in an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment, the allegations of the complaint that the assessment, warrant, diagram, certificate of city engineer, demand of payment, nonpayment, return of the warrant, etc., had been made and recorded, which, by St. 1885, p. 157, c. 153, § 12, is made prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment and of the prior proceedings, etc., were not denied, plaintiff was not bound to introduce formal proof of such proceedings to establish a prima facie case under Code Civ. Proc. § 462, declaring that every material allegation of the complaint not controverted by the answer filed must, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true.

Action by A. J. Raisch against Hulda Hildebrandt and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Otto tum Suden, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment. The complaint contains all the averments necessary to a complete cause of action on the lien, and, among other things, averments of the making and recording of the assessment, warrant, diagram, certificate of city engineer, demand of payment, nonpayment, return of the warrant, etc., which, by the terms of the statute, are "prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment and of the prior proceedings and acts of the superintendent of streets and city council upon which said warrant, assessment, and diagram, are based, and like evidence of the right of the plaintiff to recover in the action." These averments as to the assessment, warrant, diagram, certificate, etc., were not denied in the answer, although the answer does contain denials of preceding averments in the complaint—as, for instance, that the resolution of intention to do the alleged work was duly or at all passed by the board of supervisors; that the clerk printed for the required time a notice of the nature and character of the work to be done, inviting sealed proposals for doing the same; that the board opened the bids or awarded any contracts for the work; that plaintiff was the lowest bidder; that the superintendent entered into any contract with plaintiff to do the work, etc. At the trial plaintiff rested his case without introducing any evidence, upon the theory that, as his said averments of the making and recording of the assessment, diagram, etc., and the return and recording of the warrant were not denied in the answer, and must be taken to be true, therefore those averments made a prima facie case for plaintiff. Thereupon the defendants moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that plaintiff had failed to introduce any evidence tending to prove those allegations of the complaint which are denied in the answer. The court granted the motion for a nonsuit, and rendered judgment for defendant. From this judgment plaintiff appeals.

We think that the court erred in granting the nonsuit. It was evidently granted upon the theory that the admission in the answer of alleged facts which, under the statute, constituted a prima facie case for plaintiff, was not the equivalent of the proof of these facts, and that the warrant, assessment, diagram, certificate, etc., should have been formally introduced in evidence by plaintiff, notwithstanding their admission by the pleadings. But the case of Oakland Bank v. Sullivan, 107 Cal. 428, 40 Pac. 546, declares the law to be otherwise, and we see no good reason for not following it. That was an action to foreclose a mortgage, but it involved the validity of a street assessment set up in the cross-complaint of certain defendants. The cross-complainants introduced some evidence to sustain their lien, and defendant Sullivan, the owner of the land, moved for a nonsuit as to cross-complainants on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the lien, which motion was denied, and Sullivan appealed. The court said: "The court did not err in refusing to grant such motion, though the evidence offered may have been insufficient to make out a case for the plaintiffs in that cross-complaint had it been incumbent upon them to offer any proof at all. The act (St. 1885, p. 157, c. 153, § 12) provides that the 'warrant, assessment, and diagram, with the affidavit of demand and nonpayment, shall be held prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment * * * and of the right of the plaintiff to recover in the action.' Here the cross-complaint of Bannister & Lewis averred the delivery to them of such warrant, assessment, and diagram, and exhibited the character of the same with sufficient particularity to show that they were made in conformity with sections 8 and 9 of the act. It also alleged the making and return by their agent of the affidavit of demand and nonpayment, as required by the succeeding section 10. None of such averments were denied in appellant's answer. They were material allegations (Himmelman v. Danos, 35 Cal. 441), and, being undenied, stand as established facts in the case. It was therefore unnecessary to produce in evidence the documents thus alleged and described, and the prima facie effect imputed to them by the statute operated to cast upon appellant the burden of proof. He might, if he could, have disproved any statement of the cross-complaint put in issue by him, but it seems he made no attempt to do so." And after some allusion to a ruling in Himmelman v. Danos the court said: "But it does not compel formal proof of matters which, being alleged, are admitted either expressly or impliedly. Such cases are subject to the general rule of procedure prescribed by the Code (Pacific Paving Co. v. Bolton, 97 Cal. 9, 31 Pac. 625), among which is that every material allegation of the complaint not controverted by the answer filed must, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true. Code Civ. Proc. § 462. See City of Stockton v. Dahl, 66 Cal. 377, 5 Pac. 682." The principle might not apply to immaterial allegations, but the allegations here in question, as was stated in the Bank of Oakland v. Sullivan, were material. They were essential to plaintiff's cause of action.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

CRAIG v. BOONE, Tax Collector. (S. F. 3,192.)

TAXATION—INVALID TAX—TAX COLLECTOR—PAYMENT—RECOVERY—ACTIONS.

Where a tax collector, on receiving payment of a tax levied for the maintenance of a high school, paid the same into the county treasury, as required by Const. art. 11, § 16, Pol. Code, § 3753, he, being a mere agent for the collection and payment of the tax, was not liable to be sued in assumpsit by the taxpayer to recover the same on the ground that the tax was illegal.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County.

T. B. Bond and T. J. Sheridan, for appellant. McNab & Hirsch, for respondent.

SMITH, C. This is a suit to recover from the defendant the sum of $391, the amount of tax, with penalty, levied on the plaintiff's property for the maintenance of a pretended union high school. This was paid by the plaintiff under protest, and it is claimed by him, on the facts alleged in the complaint, that the tax was void. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment thereon entered. In support of the demurrer, one of the grounds urged is that the suit cannot be maintained against the tax colector, and this contention we think should be sustained. Whether the tax was void or the contrary, it was the duty of the defendant, on receiving this money, to pay it into the county treasury (Const. art. 11, § 16; Pol. Code, § 3753; San Francisco v. Ford, 52 Cal. 199); and having done so—as, in the absence of allegations in the complaint to the contrary, it is to be presumed he did—it has been said by the court, "It would violate all principles of justice to hold him liable to the plaintiff therefor" (Phelan v. San Francisco, 120 Cal. 5, 52 Pac. 39); and accordingly in a later case it is said: "He (the tax collector) was but the agent of the county for the collection of the tax. * * * He was not concerned with the validity of the tax. If he failed to collect it because of its illegality, he was not responsible to the county; and if he collected it, and it subsequently proved to have been illegally assessed, he was not responsible to the aggrieved taxpayer." Bailey v. Johnson, 121 Cal. 563, 54 Pac. 80. In the latter case, indeed, what was said was not necessary to the decision, and in the former there was another ground on which the case may have been disposed of. But, however this may be, we concur in the views expressed by the court. For the suit is in the nature of assumpsit for money had and received by the defendant to the plaintiff's use (Cooley on Taxation, 1482 N. and authorities cited), which cannot be maintained against a mere agent or servant after he has paid over the money to his principal (1 Chitty on Pleading, 365; Guy v. Washburn, 23 Cal. 113; Greenway v. Heard, 4 T. R. 553; Sadler v. Evans, 4 Burr. 1985, and other cases cited; Frye v. Lockwood, 4 Cow. 454; 2 Cooley on Taxation, 1482–3). Had the asesssment been void on its face (Cooley on Tax., 1477 et seq.), or were the money still in the hands of the defendant, or were the suit against the county treasurer into whose hands the money had passed (Id. 1482), the case might be different; but on these points it is unnecessary to express an opinion. Several cases are cited by the appellant in which suits of this kind were maintained against the tax collector. But none of these seem to have any application, unless it be McCabe v. Carpenter, 102 Cal. 469, 36 Pac. 836, which was in some respects different, and in which the point was not considered.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

GOLDBERG v. BRUSCHI. (S. F. 3,004.)

1. Quieting Title—Mineral Lands.

In a suit to quiet title to mining land, when plaintiff made his proof of citizenship and of discovery of gold-bearing quartz on the premises, and had shown a location according to the requirements of law, he established his case prima facie, and it was not necessary for him to make further proof that the land was unoccupied mineral land of the United States.

2. Same—Forfeiture—Evidence.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426], provides that on a failure to comply with the conditions imposed for acquiring mineral land the claim or mine on which such failure occurs shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location had ever been made. Held, that a forfeiture under the statute cannot be established except upon clear and convincing proof.

3. Same—Burden of Proof.

In a suit to quiet title to a mining claim, defendant having proved his location, it was plaintiff's right to assume the burden of showing defendant's failure to do the required amount of work on the claim, although he had not alleged any such forfeiture in his complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Mines and Minerals, § 101.]

4. Mining Lands—Relocation of Claim.

Rev. St. U. S. § 2324 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426], in relation to mining claims, provides that on a failure to comply with the conditions of the statute (among them being a requirement for a certain amount of annual work) the claim shall be open to relocation, as if no location had ever been made. Held, that where a locator failed to do the required work the land became subject to relocation, although the original locator remained in possession.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; John M. Corcoran, Judge.

Action by Max Goldberg against Demetrio M. Bruschi. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part and in part affirmed.

Leon Samuels (J. J. Trabucco, of counsel), for appellant. J. B. Curtin and Congdon & Congdon, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to quiet title to mining land. The cause was tried by the court, and defendant had judgment, from which plaintiff appealed on bill of exceptions.

The findings are made up largely of probative rather than of ultimate facts. It was found: (1) That one Francisco Bruschi, on March 15, 1885, located a quartz mining claim, the Quail quartz mine, 600 feet wide and 1,500 feet long, in Mariposa county, particularly described in the findings; that by mesne conveyances afterward, to wit, October 13, 1897, the said mine became the property of defendant. (2) That defendant on January 1, 1897, located a quartz mining claim of the same extent as the said Quail quartz mine, and adjoining it on the southerly end thereof, called the "Last Chance Quartz Mine," particularly described in the findings. (3) That prior to the month of December, 1899, defendant "did let, bond, and agree to convey" said two mines "to the Quail Mining Company," and that during all of said month of December and the month of January, 1900, said company was in possession of said mines, and "did cause to be erected upon said Quail quartz mine improvements consisting of hoisting works, barn, and blacksmith shop, and other buildings of the value of more than three thousand dollars, and had extended two tunnels and drifts that were on the said Quail quartz mine." (4) That during the month of December, 1899, one Barion entered upon a portion of said Quail quartz mine referred to in the foregoing paragraph 3, and attempted to make a location under the name of the "East Quail Quartz Mining Claim" by including a portion thereof together with other lands, thus conflicting with said Quail quartz mine to the extent of 7.34 acres, particularly described in the findings. (5) That plaintiff, through the said Barion, in the said month of December also entered upon said Last Chance quartz mine, and made a location named the "Indian Creek Quartz Mining Claim," a part of which so located embraced a portion of said Last Chance mine, and conflicted with said Last Chance mine to the extent of about 12.94 acres, and also conflicted with said Quail quartz mine to the extent of 0.093 acres. (6) That at the time said Barion made said locations he well knew that defendant was the owner of said Quail quartz mine and said Last Chance quartz mine, and knew that defendant had agreed to sell the same to said corporation, and knew that said company was in possession of each of said claims, and had expended large sums of money in working the same. As conclusions of law the court found: (1) That the defendant was, at the time the locations were made under which plaintiff claims, the owner of the said Quail quartz mine and the said Last Chance mine. (2) That in the absence of any issues raised by the pleadings, and in the absence of any proof by plaintiff that the work required to be done under section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426] was not done on defendant's said claim for the year 1899, he (defendant) "is entitled to the presumption of law that the law had been complied with, and that the amount of work required to be done upon each of said quartz mines * * * was done during the year 1899." (3) That plaintiff has no right to or interest in the portions of his said claim which lie within the exterior boundaries of defendant's said claims. Defendant had judgment in accordance with the foregoing, and it was also adjudged that plaintiff has no right to or interest in the said locations of plaintiff outside of the exterior lines of the said locations of defendant.

The pleadings were verified. Plaintiff did not, in his complaint, allege that defendant had forfeited his title to the mines, or either of them, claimed by him—i. e., did not plead forfeiture—nor did he offer any evidence of forfeiture in his opening case. After defendant had submitted his evidence of ownership, plaintiff in rebuttal sought to prove that as to the Last Chance mine defendant had forfeited his location by failure to do the work required by the Revised Statutes of the United States. Defendant objected on the ground that plaintiff had not pleaded abandonment or forfeiture. The court ruled that it would admit no testimony showing forfeiture or abandonment of the Last Chance by defendant. Plaintiff thereupon moved the court for leave to amend his complaint by alleging that "defendant has failed to perform any assessment work on or for the Last Chance claim either in the year 1897, 1898, or 1899, or at any time since the location thereof, and that said defendant has forfeited his said claim." The ground urged for the amendment was "that plaintiff was taken by surprise by the ruling of the court," and that plaintiff had relied upon his view of the law that "no proof of forfeiture could be made until defendant had shown the nature of his title, and that until then plaintiff was not called upon to plead or prove forfeiture." The court denied the motion. These rulings are urged as error.

Plaintiff specified numerous other errors, particularly as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support certain of the findings. The principal question presented by the appeal arises out of the rulings of the court above stated. The view taken by counsel for defendant, and apparently followed by the trial court, seems to have been that plaintiff could recover only on the strength of his own title, and that, if he expected to show that the title of defendant, whatever it might be, was for some reason forfeited, he should have so alleged in the complaint and proved it in his opening case; and that, not having done so, the refusal of the court to allow him to amend the complaint was not error, for the evidence would not be proper in rebuttal. It is true that in an action to quiet title to land the burden rests upon the plaintiff to show title in himself, failing which he is not entitled to recover. San Francisco v. Ellis, 54 Cal. 72; Winter v. McMillan, 87 Cal. 256, 25 Pac. 407, 22 Am. St. Rep. 243; Heney v. Pesoli, 109 Cal. 53, 41 Pac. 819; McGrath v. Wallace, 116 Cal. 548, 48 Pac. 719; Weed v. Snook, 144 Cal. 439, 77 Pac. 1023; Schroder v. Aden Gold Min. Co., 144 Cal. 628, 78 Pac. 20. This rule, however, does not require that plaintiff shall, in opening his case, show that the title which the defendant may plead in his answer has been for some reason forfeited. Plaintiff may not, and often does not, know what the adverse interest of defendant is against which plaintiff seeks to quiet his title. How, then, can he be expected to anticipate defendant's answer and plead forfeiture? When the answer came in, it was deemed to be denied. Of course, if plaintiff has shown no title or right of possession, and defendant is in possession, it is immaterial by what right defendant holds possession, and plaintiff cannot recover. Defendant's mistake and the error of the court probably arose from the mistaken belief that plaintiff should have shown, as part of his case, that defendant's pretended title was invalid, and that he could not do this in rebuttal. When plaintiff made his proof, as he did, of citizenship, and that he had made a discovery of gold-bearing quartz in the land, and had shown a location according to the requirements of the law, he established his case prima facie, and he was not called upon to make further proof that the land was unoccupied mineral land of the United States. It was shown to be public land, and the presumption is that all public land is unoccupied. Plaintiff's claims were located in December, 1899, and he had all of the year 1900 in which to do assessment work, and the action was brought in January, 1900. The burden was then put upon defendant to show that the location under which he claimed title was prior in time and superior in right. It was held in Trevaskis v. Peard, 111 Cal. 599, 44 Pac. 246, that "evidence of abandonment may be given without a special plea under a denial of title"; and in Contreras v. Merck, 131 Cal. 211, 63 Pac. 336, it was held not necessary for plaintiff to plead a forfeiture or abandonment of a prior location made by defendant. Defendant contends that the contrary rule was held in Quigley v. Gillett, 101 Cal. 462, 35 Pac. 1040, and in Harris v. Kellogg, 117 Cal. 484, 49 Pac. 708. In the first of these cases the question was as to the burden of proof where forfeiture is claimed, and what was said related to the defendant who disputed the validity of plaintiff's title and alleged forfeiture. Whether a defendant in such case as the present one is required to allege forfeiture before he will be permitted to prove it as a defense to plaintiff's title, is not the question here. The point decided in Harris v. Kellogg was as to the burden of proof. The rule of pleading now before us was not involved. The Revised Statutes of the United States (section 2324 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426]) do not use the word "forfeiture." The provision is: "Upon a failure to comply with these conditions [among them to do the required annual work] the claim or mine upon which such failure occurs shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made." Treating this provision as, in effect, working a forfeiture, the courts have held that it cannot be established except upon clear and convincing proof of the former owner to have had work performed or improvements made to the amount required by the law (Hammer v. Garfield M. & M. Co., 130 U. S. 291, 9 Sup. Ct. 548, 32 L. Ed. 964); and, as we have seen, the burden of proving failure to comply with statutory conditions is upon the one who asserts it. When, therefore, defendant proved his locations, it was plaintiff's right to assume the burden of showing defendant's failure to do the required work, and this he was not allowed to do.

As to the Quail quartz mine, we can see no ground whatever for questioning the conclusions of the trial court or the findings in respect of it. So far as the East Quail location of plaintiff and his Indian Creek location conflicted with the Quail claim of defendant, they were invalid. Plaintiff knew when he made his said locations that defendant had made a valid prior location of the Quail mine, was in actual possession through the company that held a bond on the mine and was then actively carrying forward development work, and had done work and had made improvements thereon of the value of $5,000. As to the Last Chance mine, defendant showed a valid location in January, 1897. There was no evidence submitted by defendant, or at all, of any work done on this claim from the time the location was made to the time plaintiff made his locations of the East Quail and Indian Creek claims. The only testimony of defendant's possession of the Last Chance claim was that given by himself. When asked if he continued in possession of the Quail mine, he replied: "Yes, sir. Up to the time I gave the bond to the Quail Mining Company and since the time that I located the Last Chance, I have continued in possession of the same." Whether this was actual possession—pedis possessio—or only the constructive possession which follows location, does not appear. It is not disputed that plaintiff's locations were valid as to land not embraced in defendant's Last Chance location, and as to this it was valid if the land was then unoccupied mineral land, and open to relocation. The position of the parties, briefly stated, was this: Defendant's claim was located in 1897. He remained in possession thenceforward, and was in possession at the time of plaintiff's location in 1899, but had done no assessment work, and was not at that time engaged in doing any work thereon. Plaintiff thereupon made locations including a portion of defendant's said claim, and, so far as it appears, it was accomplished peaceably, and without disturbing defendant's possession, such as it was. Clearly defendant's location of the Last Chance could not be the source of a valid claim after the close of the year 1898, unless he had done the required assessment work by that time, or unless he had in the year 1899, before plaintiff made his locations, begun development work, and prosecuted it diligently. But he did no work on his claim at any time, and it therefore ceased to have any validity as against a valid relocation. Defendant's counsel seem to hold the view that his possession was enough to remove the land from the category of unoccupied land, or at least that it was sufficient to prevent plaintiff from making a valid location. The case of Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 285, 26 L. Ed. 735, is cited. We do not think that case supports, or that any case can be found supporting, such contention, if that be defendant's view. Such a construction of the statute would permit a locator of mineral land to hold it against all the world for an indefinite time without doing any development work whatever. We think the findings that defendant is the owner of the portion of the Last Chance mine which is in conflict with plaintiff's locations is not supported by the evidence. It is not necessary to notice other points raised by the appeal.

It is advised that the judgment, so far as it affects the Quail quartz mine of defendant, be affirmed, and so far as it affects defendant's right to the ground in conflict in the Last Chance quartz mine of defendant it be reversed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment, so far as it affects the Quail quartz mine of defendant, is affirmed, and so far as it affects defendant's right to the ground in conflict in the Last Chance quartz mine of defendant it is reversed: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

146 Cal. 690

CUTTEN v. PEARSALL. (S. F. 2,912.)*

1. Contract—Action for Breach—Execution.

Where the complaint contained a copy of the written contract sued on, and the genuineness and execution thereof were not denied by verified answer, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 447, its execution and genuineness were admitted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 39, Cent. Dig. Pleading, § 864.]

2. Brokers—Action for Commissions—Evidence.

Where a contract provided that plaintiff should be paid $7,500 commissions for services when a sale of certain lands was consummated, a written contract of sale entered into between defendant and a third person was admissible to show consummation of a sale.

3. Same—Performance.

In an action on a contract for broker's services, evidence held to show performance by plaintiff of the conditions of his contract, and that the sale of the land had been consummated by defendant as provided by the contract for compensation.

4. Same—Instructions.

Where a contract for broker's compensation provided that plaintiff should be entitled thereto when the sale was consummated, and there was evidence that a sale had been made, defendant was not prejudiced by an instruction submitting plaintiff's right to compensation under the contract, without regard to the party to whom the lands were sold, which was objectionable as submitting the interpretation of the written contract to the jury.

---

*Rehearing denied June 5, 1905.

5. Trial—Instructions.

Refusal of an instruction substantially covered by another instruction given for defendant was harmless.

6. Appeal—New Trial.

In the absence of facts showing an abuse of discretion, an order denying a new trial, on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, will not be reversed on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; E. W. Wilson, Judge.

Action by David Cutten against C. E. Pearsall. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. N. Gillett and F. A. Cutler, for appellant. Ernest Sevier and Denver Sevier, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The complaint in the action under consideration contains three counts. The first is upon an express contract, a copy of which is set forth; the second is a common count in assumpsit; the third is a common count for money had and received. The contract set forth in the first count of the complaint is as follows:

"Eureka, California, Dec. 29th, 1899.

"It is agreed by C. E Pearsall and David Cutten, that his commissions for services rendered in securing lands in T 8 N, R 1 E and T 8 N, R 2 E, Humboldt Meridian, and for all services heretofore rendered by him, and for all services hereafter to be rendered by him in the sale of the tract of land on Little River and Maple Creek, known as the Pearsall deal, shall be the sum of $7,500.00, when the sale is consummated.

"[Signed] P. E. Pearsall.

"I approve the contract. B. F. Durphy."

It is also alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff had duly performed all the conditions of said contract to be performed by him, that the sale mentioned in said contract has been duly consummated, and that the defendant had not paid plaintiff said sum of $7,500, or any part thereof. The complaint is unverified, and the answer, which is also unverified, contains simply a general denial. The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum mentioned, to wit, $7,500, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from January 24, 1901. The defendant thereafter moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he appeals both from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

In support of the appeal, the appellant relies upon certain alleged errors committed by the trial court in the admission and exclusion of certain evidence, and in giving and refusing to give certain instructions. The main contention, however, appears to be, and is so admitted by counsel in the oral argument, that the evidence does not support the verdict.

It is claimed that the evidence fails to support the verdict, on the assumption or theory that the contract set forth in the complaint as the basis of the action is not the entire contract between the parties, but that it must be taken in connection with a prior written contract between the parties on the same subject. It appears that in the summer of 1897 plaintiff and defendant were engaged as brokers in the selling of lands in Humboldt county under an oral agreement. The plaintiff in his testimony stated: "I was to get the land together, assist in getting the land together, get it as cheap as possible, and at that time we had an understanding that we would divide the profits equally up to $12 an acre. * * * I did not know who the purchaser was to be until we started in. * * * In November, 1897, Mr. B. F. Durphy came; he was the supposed purchaser or promoter. * * * Mr. Durphy had parties in the East who were going to purchase it. * * * Through the year 1898 the sale was still being made to Mr. Durphy and the men he represented. I understood that he had men in the East who were going to take the land. I didn't care who Mr. Pearsall sold this land to. * * * During all this time Mr. Pearsall was still making the sale to Mr. Durphy, and I expected right along through the year 1898 and 1899, every month or two, that this sale would be closed. Mr. Durphy told us his plans, and what progress he was making." Finally, the parties entered into the following written contract:

"This agreement made this 17th day of March, 1899, between C. E. Pearsall of the County of Humboldt, State of California, the party of the first part, and David Cutten of the same County and State, the party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That it is hereby agreed by and between the parties hereto that the said party of the second part shall aid and assist the said party of the first part in securing titles to, deeds, assignments, transfers, and all other work requisite in selling a tract of 10,000 acres more or less of redwood or other lands, situate in Humboldt County, California, on Little River and Maple Creek in Township 8 North, Ranges 1 and 2 East, Humboldt Meridian, to B. F. Durphy, of Boston, Massachusetts, or to his agent, or to any other person or corporation through him or suggested by him, and in consideration for said services, it is agreed between the parties hereto, that the party of the first part shall pay to the party of the second part after the said lands are sold one-half of the product of what remains after deducting all necessary local expenses in making such sale together with the amount paid for said lands, from an average total of $12.00 per acre for each acre sold of the whole amount, and such payment is to cancel all claims the party of the second part may have against the said party of the first part. * * * And it is further agreed between the parties hereto that if for any reason this sale cannot be made, the party of the second part shall have no claim against the party of the first part for services rendered in this matter."

Prior to the execution of the foregoing contract, the parties, Cutten and Pearsall, had been operating under an oral agreement, as already stated. Subsequently, it appears that there was some misunderstanding or hitch in the contemplated deal between defendant and Durphy, and the plaintiff became dissatisfied with the terms of the agreement entered into on his part, fearing that in case the lands should be turned over by defendant to some other parties he might lose his commissions, or the value of his services, entirely. He testifies: "In the fall of 1899 Mr. Durphy and Mr. Wandesforde and Mr. Pearsall were quarreling among themselves, and the price of the land kept going up until I became alarmed that if the sale was made my profits would be cut out by reason of the increased price of the land, and I wanted Mr. Pearsall to give me a specified sum instead of the commission that I was to receive. This sum was $7,500." He further testifies: "I said: 'You folks have your difficulties among yourselves. I want a contract for a stipulated sum.' * * * I told him I wanted a contract signed now, before I went any further with the thing, or else I would see about it, and I wrote up the contract and he signed it, and Mr. Durphy was there, and I said to Mr. Durphy: 'You approve this contract; you see that I will get my money.' That is what he approved it for; that is all I cared about. * * * I wanted Mr. Pearsall to sell the lands to anybody."

It will be seen by reference to the two contracts that the one sued upon is different in two very important points from the contract of March, and the latter was evidently intended between the parties to be substituted for the former. The compensation to the plaintiff for his services was to be a definite sum instead of commissions, and the qualification in the former contract, that the sale contemplated was to be "to B. F. Durphy, of Boston, Massachusetts, or to his agent, or to any other person or corporation through or suggested by him," was entirely omitted from the last contract, and in lieu thereof the payment was to be made "when the sale is consummated." This last contract is the one sued upon, and the complaint contains a copy thereof, and the genuineness and due execution of such instrument is admitted by the failure of the defendant to deny the same by a verified answer. Code Civ. Proc. § 447. The terms of the last instrument between the parties, to wit, the one in suit, having been reduced to writing, there can be no evidence of terms other than the contents of the writing, except in certain specified cases, none of which are applicable here. The validity and genuineness of the instrument are admitted by the pleadings, as already shown, and there is no mistake or imperfection in the writing which appears or has been put in issue by the pleadings. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856. The intention of the parties is to be ascertained from this writing alone. Civ. Code, § 1639. The only part of the agreement in suit about which there can be any doubt, and in reference to which oral testimony would be permissible at all to explain it, is what is understood as the "Pearsall deal." The plaintiff testifies that the sale of this land was known as the "Pearsall deal," and the witness Durphy testified: "The words 'Pearsall deal' refer to the Little river and Maple creek tract of land." The witness Wandesforde's testimony is similar.

The complaint, after setting forth the contract—the genuineness and due execution of which are admitted—alleges that the plaintiff has duly performed all the conditions of said contract to be performed by him, and that the sale of the lands mentioned in said contract has been duly consummated, and that the defendant has not paid the plaintiff the sum of $7,500, or any part thereof. The only issues presented by the pleadings to be passed upon by the jury were, first, whether the plaintiff had performed the conditions of this contract—and there seems to be no question as to that—and, second, whether the sale of the land mentioned in the contract had been consummated. In the oral argument on behalf of the appellant, counsel says: "It appears that, nearly two years after the original contract was entered into, the defendant did effect a sale of the lands to parties other than B. F. Durphy. This fact appears from a contract of sale in writing, entered into between Pearsall and one Henry;" and counsel complains that this evidence was introduced against the objection of the appellant. It being an issue to be proved whether the sale had been consummated, it was proper for the plaintiff to introduce any competent evidence to support that issue on his behalf, and it makes no difference whether the evidence was obtained from the defendant or from any other party. The evidence shows that the plaintiff did fully perform the contract on his part to be performed, and that he has not been paid for his services according to the contract is quite evident from the protracted contest on the part of the defendant to resist such payment.

Defendant's motion for a nonsuit, under the circumstances, was properly denied.

As already stated, the court did not err in permitting the plaintiff, over defendant's objection, to offer in evidence the contract bearing date August 21, 1900, between the defendant and J. E. Henry & Sons. The purpose of the evidence was in support of the allegation of the complaint, which was denied by the defendant, that the sale of the lands mentioned in the contract sued upon had been duly consummated.

Appellant takes exception to a portion of the instruction given at the request of the plaintiff, as follows: "That a sale of said lands was either made to B. F. Durphy or to the person suggested by or through him, or, if not made to such a person, that it was understood and agreed between the parties that the plaintiff should receive such compensation, no matter to whom such lands should be sold." Appellant claims that there is no evidence to warrant such an instruction. By the terms of the written contract sued upon, the plaintiff is entitled to his compensation "when the sale is consummated," and, as already stated, the limitation in the former contract is entirely omitted. The only objection that can be made to the portion of the instruction complained of is that it submitted to the jury the question that was proper for the court to determine as matter of law, to wit, the interpretation or meaning of the written contract sued upon. Code Civ. Proc. § 1858. It is not apparent, however, that the action of the court in this respect could have prejudiced the defendant.

The appellant further assigns as error the refusal of the court to give defendant's instruction No. 6, but the court did give defendant's instruction No. 5, as modified, in the following language: "If a party to a contract breaks it, and fails thereby or refuses to carry out its terms, the other party may treat the contract as at an end, and the party causing a breach thereof cannot maintain an action thereon against the other party. Therefore I instruct that if you find from the evidence that the plaintiff under the contract set forth in his complaint was to render certain services to the defendant in the sale of the tract of land mentioned in the said complaint, and which consisted in part of securing deeds of said land to be made in the name of the said defendant and placed in escrow, to be delivered to him upon the payment of the price of the land conveyed thereby; and if you further find that after the execution of the said contract the said plaintiff, without the consent of the defendant, abandoned the contract between them, and, in pursuance of such abandonment, went to different owners of said land and induced them not to leave their deeds in the defendant's name, but to make new deeds in favor of one H. W. Wandesforde, and in pursuance of which, and for the purpose of preventing the said defendant from consummating such sale, deeds to said land were so made in favor of the said Wandesforde—then I instruct you that the said plaintiff cannot recover in this action, and your verdict should be for the defendant." This instruction as given substantially covers the ground embraced in the sixth instruction, and therefore the refusal to give it was harmless; and the same may be said of defendant's instruction No. 7, given by the court as modified.

The main ground on which the motion for a new trial was based was the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict.

"The granting or denying a new trial on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, rests so fully in the discretion of the trial court that its action is conclusive upon this court, unless it appears that there has been an abuse of such discretion." Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 413, 35 Pac. 1024.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SHAW, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment. The contract of December 29, 1899, provided that the plaintiff should receive $7,500 for his services in "the sale of the tract of land on Little river and Maple creek, known as the 'Pearsall deal,'" and that the money should become due when the sale was consummated. The complaint avers that the sale had been consummated before the action was begun. The answer denies this allegation. It therefore became a material issue in the case whether or not the sale referred to in the agreement had been consummated at the time the action was begun. The above-quoted clause is ambiguous, and for this reason it was competent to introduce parol evidence of the circumstances under which the agreement was executed, for the purpose of determining therefrom what was meant by the phrase "Pearsall deal." Upon this question the evidence was conflicting. The theory of the plaintiff was, and there was evidence in support of it, that, prior to the execution of either of the contracts referred to, the plaintiff and the defendant, with others, were engaged in the enterprise of obtaining options from a large number of owners of small tracts of timber land for the purpose of obtaining control of a large body of such land and making a sale thereof to some third person, and that this particular enterprise was what was known as the "Pearsall deal," and that in the light of this testimony the sale of the tract known as the "Pearsall deal," mentioned in the contract sued on, meant any sale of the particular tract which was then under the control of the parties to any person. The theory of the defendants, on the other hand, was that at the time the contract of December 29th was executed the only deal in contemplation between the parties, and the one referred to in the contract sued on was the sale to B. F. Durphy of the particular tract of land upon which they had previously obtained options, being the sale referred to in the agreement of March 17, 1899, set forth in the opinion of Mr. Justice VAN DYKE, and that, as this sale had never been consummated, the plaintiff was entitled to no compensation. It was a question for the jury to determine which of these two interpretations of the ambiguous phrase of the contract was the real expression of the intention of the parties. Upon this point the court instructed the jury that the contract could be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates, in case the intention could not be ascertained from the writing alone; and that if they found that it was understood by the contract that the plaintiff should have no claim against the defendant for services in the sale of the land unless the same should be sold to Durphy or his agent, or some person suggested by him, and that the sale was not made to such person, then they should find for the defendant; but that if they found that it was the intention of the parties that plaintiff should receive the compensation specified, no matter to whom the lands should be sold, and that thereafter the defendant sold the land to third persons, then the verdict should be for the plaintiff for the sum sued for. This is undoubtedly correct, and the only criticism to be made is that it directs the jury more to the ultimate conclusion to be reached by it than to the particular facts which it should find in order to arrive at the conclusion. It would have been better, for instance, if the court had instructed the jury to ascertain from the circumstances the meaning of the phrase "Pearsall deal" as used in the contract sued on, and that if they found it was meant by the parties to refer to the particular sale of the land to Durphy or his agent, or to some one suggested by him, as provided in the previous agreement of March 17, 1899, and that such sale had not been made, then they should find for the defendant; but that if they found that the parties customarily used the phrase "Pearsall deal," not to designate any particular sale of lands, but to designate a particular tract or aggregation of tracts of land upon which they had procured options for the purpose of making a sale thereof in one body to any purchaser who could be found at a satisfactory price, and that it was used in this sense in the contract sued on, and that thereafter a sale of said lands had been made by the defendant, then the plaintiff should recover. But the instructions given were in substance to the same effect, and I do not think they could have been misleading to the jury.

There was evidence sufficient to sustain the verdict upon the theory contended for by the plaintiff.

FRASER v. CALIFORNIA STREET CABLE R. CO. (S. F. 3,391.)

1. Street Railroads—Injuries to Passenger—Contributory Negligence.

In an action against a street railroad company for injuries to a passenger who came in contact with a vehicle while he was standing on the running board of defendant's car, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

2. Same—Instructions.

In an action against a street railroad company for injuries to a passenger, instructions that defendant was not responsible for injuries which were the proximate result of plaintiff's negligent failure to use his natural senses for his own safety were proper.

3. Appeal—Exclusion of Evidence—Harmless Error.

In an action for personal injuries, error, if any, in excluding X-ray photographs of plaintiff, and evidence that he was permanently injured, was harmless, where the jury found that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

Action by Alexander Fraser against the California Street Cable Railroad Company. There was judgment for defendant, and from an order denying motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

GRAY, C. Action for injury to the person of plaintiff through the negligence of defendant while the former was a passenger on a street car of the latter. The defendant had a verdict and judgment in its favor, and the plaintiff appeals from an order denying him a new trial.

Appellant's first and principal contention is that the verdict is contrary to evidence because the evidence shows that the defendant's negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury. Without substantial conflict the evidence shows that the plaintiff as a passenger boarded defendant's car going west on California street at the northwest corner of California and Sansome streets. The car at that time was well loaded with passengers, the seats being all taken, with three or four standing inside the middle or inclosed section of the car, and one standing on the rear platform at the front of the rear open section, and with his back against the right hand rear window of the closed or middle section. Plaintiff, a young man, 20 years of age, with some two years' experience in riding on these same cars, took a standing position on the right hand rear "foot or running board just above the ground that passengers use in getting on and off the cars," holding to the stanchion with one or both hands. At this time there were no persons standing on the platforms or footboards of the front open section, and plaintiff seems to have been the only one standing on the footboards of the rear open section. There was but one person standing on the platforms of the rear open section of the car so far as the evidence discloses. It is apparent that the plaintiff was not forced to ride on the footboard of the car, but might have taken a more secure position thereon if he had seen fit to do so. He rode in this position across Leidesdorff street, a distance altogether of one short block, when his body came in collision with the front footboard, otherwise called the dashboard, of a heavy wagon that was standing stationary back into the curb, "not exactly square," on the north side of California street, just west of Leidesdorff, the horses hitched thereto turned west up California street at right angles with the wagon. The motorman saw this wagon just west of Sansome street and approached it at half speed. He passed it without any part of it coming in contact with the car, and estimates that the dash or footboard in question came no nearer than 12 or 14 inches from the closed section of the car. Another witness familiar with the measurements of the car says that the footboard on which plaintiff stood extends but four inches beyond the outside line of the inclosed part of the car. It appears then that the foot or dash board of the wagon which injured the plaintiff must have been at least 8 inches outside of the outer edge of the footboard upon which plaintiff stood when injured. If the jury believed this evidence—and we must in support of the verdict presume that they did believe it—they were probably satisfied that the plaintiff negligently failed to keep a lookout in front, and negligently swung his body farther out from the stanchion than was necessary or compatible with safety. We do not mean to say that it is negligence per se for a passenger to ride where the plaintiff rode; but we do think that common prudence required that he should while riding there either keep his body well within the lines of the car, or if he was disposed to swing out beyond those lines he should have kept a diligent lookout to avoid coming in contact with other vehicles. There is no evidence that there was any irregularity in the track or any lurching of the car or moving of the wagon. It is common knowledge that on the streets of a city like San Francisco the street cars are continually passing other vehicles even closer than 12 inches and the plaintiff must have known of that fact. The facts and conclusions to be drawn therefore were for the jury, and we cannot say as a matter of law that they were not warranted in finding from the evidence that plaintiff's injury was the proximate result of his own negligence.

The cases of Lee v. Market Street Ry. Co., 135 Cal. 295, 67 Pac. 765, Esrey v. S. P. Co., 103 Cal. 541, 37 Pac. 500, and other cases cited by appellant bear very little analogy to the case in hand. The principle that "he who last has a clear opportunity of avoiding an accident by the exercise of proper care to avoid injuring another must do so" cannot be applied to the facts of this case. There is no evidence here that the employés of defendant at any time had any notice that plaintiff was occupying a dangerous position or was conducting himself in a negligent manner. They had a right to assume that persons riding where plaintiff rode would use reasonable care, and at least not allow themselves to come in collision with objects that came no nearer than a foot from the body of the car.

Several instructions of the court to the effect that defendant is not responsible for any injuries to plaintiff which were the proximate result of his negligent failure to use his natural senses for his own safety are complained of. It is well-settled law that if the negligence of the plaintiff contributes proximately to the injury of which he complains he cannot recover. The instructions complained of are within that rule, and in no way do they conflict with the other rule already referred to, that he who has notice of another's danger, and a clear opportunity to prevent his injury, must take advantage of that opportunity or be liable for his negligence in failing so to do, even though the other person may have been placed in the position of danger by his own negligence.

The alleged error of the court in excluding the X-ray photograph of plaintiff offered by him in rebuttal did not harm the plaintiff. The verdict for defendant must have been based on the ground that the injury to plaintiff was the result of his own contributory negligence, and not on any ground that he had not suffered injury, for the evidence without conflict shows that he did suffer serious injury. The X-ray photograph could have thrown light on nothing but the extent of the injury suffered, and this becomes immaterial in view of the verdict that plaintiff is not entitled to recover at all. The same thing may properly be said of the question asked as to whether the plaintiff was permanently injured. We see nothing further in the case requiring special notice.

We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

HUMBOLDT LUMBER MILL CO. v. CRISP et al. (S. F. 3,263.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—DESTRUCTION OF BUILDING—LIEN ON LAND.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1183, 1185, giving a mechanic's lien upon property upon which labor is bestowed or for which materials are furnished, and declaring that the land upon which the building is constructed, together with a convenient space about the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, shall also be subject to the lien, one furnishing material for a building which is destroyed by fire without the fault of the owner, before completion and before the claim of lien is filed, is not entitled to a lien on the land.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see vol. 34, Cent. Dig. Mechanics' Liens, § 413.]

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; F. M. Angellotti, Judge.

Action by the Humboldt Lumber Mill Company against Edward Crisp and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel Rosenheim, Alex. G. Eells, and H. K. Eells, for appellant. E. C. Chapman and Adams & Adams, for respondents.

GRAY, C. This action was brought to enforce mechanics' liens upon three acres of land owned by defendant upon which a house in course of construction had been destroyed by fire, without any fault of the owner, before it was completed, and before the claim of lien was filed. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiffs appeal therefrom.

We are of opinion that under the peculiar language of our mechanic's lien law the lien has nothing to which it can attach if filed after the destruction of the building. Section 1185 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The land upon which any building, improvement, well, or structure is constructed, together with a convenient space about the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, to be determined by the court on rendering judgment is also subject to the lien, if at the commencement of the work, or of the furnishing of the materials for the same, the land belonged to the person who caused said building, improvement, well, or structure to be constructed, altered or repaired, but if such person owned less than a fee simple estate in said land, then only his interest therein is subject to such lien." If there is no building, it will be impossible for the court to determine that any land "may be required for its convenient use." In this case it was essential that the findings should dispose of all questions as to the land that might be necessary for the convenient use of the building, and accordingly the court did find "that the said land is not, nor is any part thereof, required for the convenient use and occupation of the building for and upon which plaintiffs furnished labor and material." This finding was the logical deduction from the other findings of the court to the effect that before the building was completed, before it was delivered to the owner, and before any lien was filed, it was destroyed by fire without any fault of defendant. In view of these findings and the above-quoted statute, the court could enter no judgment decreeing a lien upon any land. It would not fit the language of the Code, nor answer the requirements thereof, to confine the findings to "such portion of the land as was necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building designed," as contended by appellant, for the Code says "so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof." This language looks to an existing house that can be occupied in the future, and not to a vacant lot upon which no house exists.

In addition to the foregoing considerations, our mechanic's lien law proceeds upon the theory that the laborer and materialman has an equitable right to follow his labor and material into the building of which it has become a component part, and have a lien on the building because it contains in it such labor and material, and that it is not just that the owner should succeed to that labor and material without seeing to it that compensation is rendered therefor to the persons furnishing such labor and material. In Tuttle v. Mountford, 7 Cal. 358, it is said: "The lien of the mechanic, artisan, and materialman is more equitable and more favored in law, because these parties have, at least in part, created the very property upon which the lien attaches." In Avery v. Clark, 87 Cal. 628, 25 Pac. 921, 22 Am. St. Rep. 272, it is said: "The principle upon which liens are allowed in favor of mechanics and materialmen is that their labor and materials have given value to the buildings upon which they have been expended, and that it is inequitable that the owner of the land who has contracted with them for such improvement, or who has stood by and seen the improvement in progress without making objection, should have the benefit of their expenditures without making compensation therefor." In Henderson Lumber Co. v. Gottschalk, 81 Cal. 641, 22 Pac. 860, it is said: "The owner is not made personally liable to the materialman, but his property is made liable for the material which he has actually received and retains in his building. This it seems to us is eminently just and right." The decisions in this state seem to regard the benefit conferred upon the owner by placing the labor and materials in his building as the true consideration for conferring the right of lien upon the parties furnishing such labor and materials. It cannot be said that this consideration exists where, as in this case, the building is destroyed before completion and before delivery to the owner. Here the owner has not derived, and can never derive, any benefit from the labor and materials furnished.

A further reason why the lien should not apply to the land in this case is found in a consideration and comparison of sections 1183 and 1185 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The first of these sections gives a lien "upon the property upon which they have bestowed labor or furnished materials." The second section cited says that certain land "is also subject to the lien." In these provisions we see an intention of the Legislature to make the lien on the building the principal thing, and the lien upon the land on which it is situated an incident of the completion of the building, and that, when the building is destroyed before completion, there can be no lien against the land on which it was being erected; "that the lien shared the fate of the building, and that the reason for binding the land ceases with the destruction of the building." Goodman et al. v. Baerlocher, 88 Wis. 287, 60 N. W. 415, 43 Am. St. Rep. 893; The Presbyterian Church v. Stettler, 26 Pa. 246; Wigton & Brooks' Appeal, 28 Pa. 163; Civ. Code, § 3540; Bouvier's Law D. "Accession."

The above and foregoing constructions of our mechanic's lien law also find support in the following well-considered cases: Coddington v. Dry Dock Co., 31 N. J. Law, 477; Wood & Co. v. Wilmington Conference Academy, 1 Marv. (Del.) 419, 41 Atl. 89; Holzhour v. Meer, 59 Mo. 434; Shines, Executrix, v. Heimburger, 60 Mo. App. 174.

The courts of several of the states undoubtedly hold that the mechanic's lien extends to the land, even though the building be destroyed before completion; but an examination of these cases discloses that in many instances they turn upon the peculiar language of the statute there under consideration, charging the land primarily with the lien. It will be unnecessary to review the cases from those states which adhere to the doctrine last referred to. It is sufficient to say that we concur in the reasoning of those cases cited from Pennsylvania and Wisconsin. The mechanic's lien statutes of these two states seem to accord most nearly with our own. There are, however, stronger reasons to be found in our statutes why the lien should not apply to the land, the building being destroyed, than are to be found in the statutes of any other state. One of these reasons is already adverted to, and consists in the fact that the land to which the lien is to apply must be designated by the court, and is limited to the convenient occupation of the building.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

THRASHER v. MORAN. (S. F. 3,235.)

1. MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Where a complaint to foreclose a mortgage alleged that it provided that, in case of foreclosure, plaintiff should be entitled to 10 per cent. on the amount due, as "counsel fees," and that the mortgagor and the mortgaged property should be liable to plaintiff for "counsel fees," and prayed judgment for the amount due on the mortgage, "with interest, disbursements, costs, and counsel fees," a judgment by default allowing an "attorney's fee" was not objectionable on the ground that the complaint did not demand judgment therefor.

2. SAME—CAUSE OF ACTION.

A mortgagee's right to attorney's fees provided for in a mortgage in case of foreclosure is not a cause of action, but, like the costs, is a mere incident thereto.

3. SAME—COMPLAINT—INTEREST.

Where a complaint to foreclose a mortgage prayed for interest on the note, according to its terms, from its date, it was not necessary to allege, as a separate allegation, that interest was claimed at the rate specified in the note from the date of filing the complaint to the entry of judgment.

4. SAME—JUDGMENT.

Where a note secured by a mortgage drew 10 per cent. interest, a judgment authorizing foreclosure, with interest from the date thereof at the rate of 10 per cent., was erroneous as to the interest after judgment; the legal rate being but 7 per cent.

5. APPEAL—TRIVIAL ERROR—COSTS.

Where a judgment foreclosing a mortgage, appealed from, was erroneous only in that it allowed interest at 10 per cent. after judgment, instead of 7, such error was trivial and insufficient to entitle appellant to the costs of the appeal.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by William P. Thrasher against Thomas Moran. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified.

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Jas. P. Sweeney, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This is an appeal from a default judgment of foreclosure, on the judgment roll, without a bill of exceptions.

It is claimed that the prayer of the complaint did not ask for attorney's fees, and that, as the relief granted against a defendant by default cannot exceed that prayed for in the complaint, the judgment is erroneous as to attorney's fees. The law is as stated by appellant, and the question is as to whether or not the complaint, in effect, did pray for attorney's fees. As a copy of the complaint, with a copy of the summons, was served upon appellant, he must be held to have had notice of all that the complaint stated to him, without regard to imaginary or technical criticism. He appeared by his attorney, and, as he did not answer the complaint, this court will not look with favor upon technical questions that in no way affect the merits. The defendant, with a copy of the complaint in his hand, and his attorney in court, allowed judgment to go against him by default. Therefore his position is such that this court does not feel inclined to relieve him unless the positive mandates of the law entitle him to relief.

The complaint alleges that the mortgage provides that in case of foreclosure the plaintiff shall be entitled to 10 per cent. upon the amount found to be due, as "counsel fees," and that the mortgagor and mortgaged property shall be liable to plaintiff for such "counsel fees." In the prayer of the complaint, after asking for judgment for the amount due on the promissory note, with interest, plaintiff asks that the property be sold, "and the proceeds applied to the payment of the amount due on said note and mortgage, with interest, disbursements, costs, and counsel fees." We think appellant understood the meaning of the above language. The fact that the decree provided for an attorney's fee of $50 did not take him by surprise. In O'Neal v. Hart, 116 Cal. 69, 47 Pac. 926, this court held that a provision in a mortgage to the effect that in a suit for its foreclosure the decree may be had for the sale of the mortgaged premises, and out of the proceeds there might be retained the costs and charges of making such sale, including counsel fees, authorized the court to include such counsel fee in its decree as a part of the obligation secured by the mortgage. In Alexander v. McDow, 108 Cal. 28, 41 Pac. 24, where the complaint contained no allegation as to attorney's fees, but the promissory note set forth in the complaint provided for them, and the prayer of the complaint asked for them, this court said: "It is fairly deducible from the complaint, therefore, that plaintiff asks an allowance of a specific sum as being reasonable and due for attorney's fees under the contract." And this court has held that it is not necessary for the complaint to allege that the mortgage provides for attorney's fees. Orange Growers' Bank v. Duncan, 133 Cal. 254, 65 Pac. 469. The attorney's fees are not the cause of action, but, like the costs, a mere incident to it. Carriere v. Minturn et al., 5 Cal. 435; Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 571, 14 Pac. 514; Rapp v. Spring Valley Gold Co., 74 Cal. 532, 16 Pac. 325; White v. Allatt, 87 Cal. 248, 25 Pac. 420.

The complaint prayed for interest on the promissory note according to its terms from its date. It was not necessary to state, as a separate allegation, that interest was claimed at the rate specified in the note from the date of filing the complaint to the entry of judgment. The case cited by appellant does not lend countenance to such contention. The judgment directs the commissioner out of the proceeds of sale to pay "the costs, taxed at $21.95, and the sum of $50 counsel fees of foreclosure, with interest thereon from this date at the rate of ten per cent. per annum." This part of the judgment is erroneous, as the legal rate of interest after judgment is 7 per cent. The judgment should be modified by striking out the words "ten per cent.," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "seven per cent." As the matter is trivial, and the attention of the court below was not called to it, the appellant should not recover the costs of this appeal. We advise that the judgment be modified by striking out the words "ten per cent.," and inserting in lieu thereof "seven per cent." and, as thus modified, it be affirmed; the respondent to recover costs of this appeal.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is modified by striking out the words "ten per cent.," and inserting in lieu thereof "seven per cent.," and, as thus modified, it stands affirmed; the respondent to recover costs of this appeal: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

MASKEY v. LACKMANN, Sheriff, et al. (S. F. 3,377.)

1. APPEAL — RULING ON DEMURRER — FACTS NOT ALLEGED.

In reviewing a ruling on a demurrer, facts not alleged cannot be considered, although both parties admit that they exist.

2. SHERIFF'S SALE — APPARENT VALIDITY — CLOUD ON TITLE—ATTACHMENT—RELEASE.

In an action to recover a sum paid under protest to redeem land from a sale on execution, which sale, it was alleged, was in fact invalid, but apparently valid, so as to constitute a cloud on plaintiff's title, it appeared that plaintiff acquired title from the judgment debtor before the judgment was rendered, but after an attachment had been levied on the land. It was alleged that the attachment was issued and levied on the day the action was begun, and that some three months thereafter the sheriff accepted an undertaking for the release of the attachment, and on the next day released it of record. It was not alleged that, at the time the undertaking was accepted and release executed, the sheriff had previously returned the attachment, nor that the writ was not then in his possession, nor that no summons was issued, nor that he did not receive the writ of attachment with the summons, nor that he did not make due and correct return to the writ. Held, that it must be assumed that the return to the writ would have shown that the attachment had been released, and that hence the sale did not constitute a cloud on plaintiff's title.

Action by Frank Maskey against John Lackmann and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Olney & Olney, for appellant. George D. Squires, for respondent Lackmann. Marcus Rosenthal, for respondents Whyte and Hesser.

SHAW, J. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, judgment entered accordingly, and the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint attempts to state a cause of action against the defendant to recover the sum of $1,061.50, paid by the plaintiff to Lackmann as sheriff, under protest, to redeem certain real estate belonging to plaintiff from a sale thereof on an execution issued on a judgment in favor of A. C. Whyte against Hilley Rosencrantz, a former owner of the real estate, from whom, by mesne conveyances, the plaintiff obtained his title. The contentions of the plaintiff are that the sheriff's sale was a cloud on his title and valid on the face of the record, though invalid in fact, and that money paid to remove or prevent a cloud upon the title to land is paid upon compulsion and may be recovered by action. We think the complaint does not show that the sheriff's sale was a cloud on the title. In considering this question we are confined to the facts alleged in the complaint. We cannot consider facts not alleged, although both parties admit that they exist. And with respect to any official conduct of the sheriff in the proceedings, as to which the complaint is silent, we cannot, in aid of the plaintiff's case, supply facts not alleged, nor assume that the sheriff officially did otherwise than what the law would require him to do under the circumstances appearing. Maskey acquired title under a conveyance by Rosencrantz, the judgment debtor, made before the judgment in Whyte v. Rosencrantz was rendered, but after an attachment issued in the action had been duly levied on the land. The title under the sheriff's sale, as against the plaintiff, therefore, depended on the continuance of the lien of the attachment and its subsequent merger in the judgment. The action of Whyte v. Rosencrantz was begun on February 25, 1895, and the attachment was issued and levied on that day. On June 20, 1895, the sheriff accepted an undertaking for the release of the attachment, given in pursuance of section 540 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and released the attachment, and on June 21, 1895, in consideration of the undertaking, he officially executed a release, which was duly recorded in the office of the recorder. The complaint does not state that, at the time this undertaking was accepted and the release executed, the sheriff had previously returned the attachment, nor that the writ was not then in his possession, nor that no summons was issued, nor that he did not receive the writ of attachment with the summons, nor that he did not make due and correct return to the writ. As to these things it is silent. Under section 559, Code Civ. Proc., he may have received the writ with the summons, and in that event he would be required by that section to return it with the summons, an event which could lawfully have been delayed until after the date of the release. This section also requires him to state in his return to the writ his proceedings thereon. It was decided in Hesser v. Rowley, 139 Cal. 410, 73 Pac. 156, that a sheriff has no authority to release an attachment after he has returned the writ. We cannot assume, in the absence of any averment to support the action, that the sheriff had returned the writ before he made the release, nor that his return showed the levy alone without the release. We must, on the contrary, assume that which, for all that appears in the complaint, may have been true, namely, that he made the release before the return, and that his return showed all his proceedings, including the release, as well as the levy.

It follows from this that the record necessary to support the sheriff's sale would also show its invalidity. In order to show the levy of the writ, whereby the lien had attached to the real estate before its conveyance to the plaintiff's predecessor, who purchased before the judgment, it would be necessary for the person claiming under the sheriff's sale to put in evidence the return to the writ of attachment. We must assume that this return recited the fact of the acceptance of the undertaking and the execution of the release of the levy. This would extinguish the lien, and render the sale nugatory against a purchaser from the judgment debtor before judgment. In ejectment against Maskey by the purchaser at the sheriff's sale the action would be defeated upon the evidence of the proceedings upon which the sale was founded, and in such an action Maskey, as defendant, would be entitled to a nonsuit at the close of the evidence for the plaintiff therein. As owner he would not be required to offer any evidence to defeat a recovery. Under these circumstances the record of the sheriff's sale, or the deed thereunder if it had been executed, would constitute no cloud on the plaintiff's title. "If such proof would be necessary, the cloud would exist. If the proof would be unnecessary, no shade would be cast by the presence of the deed." Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 134. To the same effect, see Lick v. Ray, 43 Cal. 88; Bolton v. Gilleran, 105 Cal. 244, 38 Pac. 881, 45 Am. St. Rep. 33; Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Cal. 264; Fulton v. Hanlow, 20 Cal. 485.

It is conceded by the plaintiff that the payment to redeem was voluntary unless the sale would cast a cloud on the title, and that, if it was a voluntary payment, his action must fail. There can be no doubt that this is a correct principle. Having reached the conclusion that the complaint does not show that there was a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, it will be unnecessary for us to consider the question whether or not, if the contrary had been shown, the payment would be recoverable as a payment made under compulsion. The demurrer was properly sustained.

3. SAME—ACTIONS AGAINST ADMINISTRATORS.

Where an administrator appeared to an action, and demurred solely as administrator, and the judgment entered after sustaining his demurrer ran in his favor solely as administrator, and he, as an individual, was not brought within the jurisdiction of the court, and plaintiff's counsel in their brief treated the action as one against the administrator as such, the action would be deemed on appeal to have been one against the estate, and the judgment would be sustained if no cause of action was alleged against it.

4. SAME—TORTS OF ADMINISTRATOR—LIABILITY OF ESTATE.

The estate of a decedent is not liable to the widow for the misapplication by the administrator of the proceeds of an insurance policy paid to the administrator for the widow.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Welles Whitmore and Frank Little, for appellant. Thomas C. Huxley, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Plaintiff brought this action against James Stanley, as administrator of the estate of her deceased husband, and the sureties on his official bond as public administrator, to recover the sum of $4,895.65, proceeds of a policy of insurance on the life of decedent, which policy, according to the allegations of the complaint, was payable "to his executors or administrators, * * * for the benefit of his wife, the said Julia A. Nickals, if she should survive him." It was alleged that he had, as administrator, collected said amount on said policy, and had used and expended all of the same "in paying the debts of said William W. Nickals, deceased, and the expenses of his last illness and funeral, and costs of administration of said estate," instead of paying the same to plaintiff. This was the sole ground of plaintiff's action. It may be assumed that Stanley applied for letters of administration of this estate as public administrator, and that his official bond as public administrator stood in lieu of the ordinary administrator's bond required by law. Section 1727, Code Civ. Proc. Such bond was conditioned to the effect that said Stanley should faithfully execute the duties of public administrator of Alameda county, Cal. No final account of his administration of said estate has ever been filed by Stanley. It is not alleged that any account has ever been presented by said Stanley as administrator, or that the court in probate has ever made any order of distribution, or any order setting apart any property or money to the widow. Stanley, as administrator, and two of the defendant sureties, demurred to an amended complaint on various grounds, and the demurrers were sustained with leave to amend. Plaintiff failing to amend, judgment went in favor of said defendants, and from this judgment plaintiff appeals.

It is clear that no cause of action is stated against the defendant sureties. Under the terms of their contract, they were responsible only for the faithful performance of such duties as were imposed by law upon Stanley, as administrator of the estate of the deceased. If the proceeds of the insurance policy were received by Stanley as a trustee for the widow, and solely for her use, because of the terms of the agreement between deceased and the insurance company, such proceeds were in no sense property of the estate, and were not received by him in the discharge of any official duty as administrator. The property was, in such event, the property of the widow, and Stanley was simply her agent or trustee in regard thereto. The sureties on his bond as administrator had not undertaken to be responsible for the faithful performance of his duties as such agent or trustee, or for the faithful performance of any duties except those relating to the administration of the decedent's estate. If the proceeds of the policy did become assets of the estate, there could be no liability on the part of the sureties in regard thereto prior to an order or decree of the court in probate fixing the liability on the part of the administrator. It does not appear that there has been any such order or decree. An administrator holds all of the assets of an estate subject to the control of the court having jurisdiction of the estate, and that court has sole and exclusive jurisdiction to settle the accounts of the administrator, and to determine to whom the property of the estate shall be set apart or distributed. The liability of the administrator, arising from his dealings with the property of the estate, can, during the pendency of the administration and the lifetime of the administrator, be determined only by the judgment or order of such court, and until such determination has been made no action can be maintained upon the administrator's bond. It has been repeatedly held that an action cannot be maintained against the sureties of an executor, administrator, or guardian for breach of the bond until the amount of indebtedness has been determined by order of the probate court. See Cook v. Ceas, 143 Cal. 221, 225, 77 Pac. 65, and cases there cited; Reither v. Murdock et al., 135 Cal. 197, 67 Pac. 784; Chaquette v. Ortet, 60 Cal. 594. These decisions are applicable here.

As to the defendant Stanley, the action has apparently been treated as an action against him in his official capacity as administrator only. It was so limited in the title of the action as given in the complaint, but the allegations of the complaint make it somewhat uncertain as to whether it was intended to sue him individually or as administrator solely. The fact that the sureties on his bond were joined with him as defendants indicates an intention to sue him individually, for they would not be proper parties defendant in an action against him purely as administrator. However this may be, he appeared, and demurred solely as administrator, and the judgment is in his favor solely as administrator, and it does not appear that James Stanley individually was ever brought within the jurisdiction of the court in this action. It may be added that counsel for plaintiff in their brief treat the action as one against Stanley in his official character only. The question as to whether the complaint stated a cause of action against Stanley individually is therefore not involved in this appeal. We must take the action against Stanley as one against him in his representative capacity only, and therefore as simply an action against the estate of his intestate. Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 492, 494, 51 Pac. 695; Schlicker v. Hemenway, 110 Cal. 579, 42 Pac. 1063, 52 Am. St. Rep. 116. The demurrer interposed by defendant Stanley as administrator was the demurrer of the estate only. If the complaint failed to state a cause of action against the estate, the demurrer of the representative thereof was properly sustained. Plaintiff has cited some cases from other jurisdictions in which it is held that, where the property of another has been appropriated to the use of an estate by an administrator or executor, the estate may be held liable. It is well settled here that an estate cannot be held liable for a tort committed by an administrator or executor. Sterrett v. Barker, supra; Melone v. Davis, 67 Cal. 279, 282, 7 Pac. 703; Eustace v. Jahns, 38 Cal. 3, 21, 23. The foundation of this action is the alleged personal tort of Stanley, viz., the conversion by him of personal property of the plaintiff. He could not, by any such wrongful act on his part, bind the estate, but, if guilty thereof, would be personally liable therefor. As said in Eustace v. Jahns, supra: "The very nature of the action imports the culpable delinquency of a sentient being, and a personal liability in consequence thereof, a delinquency or misfeasance which cannot be affirmed of an estate; and when such liability is established, and the extent thereof determined by the judgment of a competent court, it is enforced against the individual perpetrator of the wrong." If sued individually, Stanley could have defended under his claim as administrator, and put in issue the question as to whether the money was the property of plaintiff or of the estate, but, if he had failed in substantiating his claim, judgment must necessarily have been against him, and could not be against the estate. Sterrett v. Barker, supra. The fact that persons interested in the estate may have profited by reason of the wrongful act of the administrator cannot affect the question as to the liability of the estate. It may be that, where the property of another has been actually used for the benefit of an estate, an action in equity may, under some circumstances, be maintained against the estate and those interested in the property thereof to have the claim of the owner made a charge against such assets of the estate as may properly be held chargeable therewith. It is, however, unnecessary to express any opinion on this question. This is not such an action. There is no allegation intimating that there is any property of the estate, and the action is simply an action at law against the estate, based upon the alleged personal tort of the administrator. As we are satisfied that the complaint failed to state a cause of action against any of the respondents, it is unnecessary to consider any of the other points made by the demurrers.

WEAVER v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 3,351.)*

1. JUDGMENTS — CONCLUSIVENESS — RESTRICTION AS TO SCOPE.

Where the Supreme Court reversed a general judgment for plaintiff, and directed the entry of a restricted judgment to be satisfied out of certain funds, and plaintiff acquiesced therein, and had judgment entered in the superior court in accordance with the form prescribed by the Supreme Court, the judgment as so entered became conclusive upon the parties, and could not be altered or modified, and a general judgment procured, by the bringing of another action founded thereon.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — PAYMENT OF CLAIMS—DISCRETION.

Const. art. 11, § 18, as amended in 1900, providing that the city and county of San Francisco may at any time pay the unpaid claims, with interest thereon, for materials furnished and work done during specified years, out of the income and revenue of succeeding years, is permissive, only, and gives the city a discretion in allowing and paying the claims.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by D. S. Weaver against the city and county of San Francisco. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., and John P. Coghlan, Asst. City Atty., for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This appeal is taken by the defendant, the city and county of San Francisco, from a judgment rendered against defendant in favor of the plaintiff upon the pleadings. The record consists of the amended complaint, demurrer to the same, order overruling the demurrer, answer on the part of the defendant, notice of motion to take judgment upon the pleadings, and the so-called findings, and the judgment entered in accordance with the motion, and notice of the appeal.

The complaint counts upon a former judgment rendered in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, April 24, 1896, which judgment, it is alleged, was rendered in favor of the plaintiff herein and against the defendant herein, for the sum of $2,226.69 principal, $511.31 interest, and $108 costs of suit, amounting in the aggregate to $2,846. The said judgment so given was rendered and entered, it is alleged, in pursuance of and in obedience to the direction of the Supreme Court of California on appeal by said plaintiff from a judgment rendered and entered against him on the first trial of the case. The complaint further alleges that part of said judgment, to wit, the sum of $2,226.70, was paid by the defendant on the 8th of October, 1901, and that no other sum of money had been paid thereon, and that said judgment so rendered and entered was for material furnished, work done, and labor performed for defendant by the plaintiff during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893. It is further alleged in the complaint that under the amendment of the state Constitution the said defendant is authorized and empowered to pay such demands, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and that the amount of interest due, owing, and unpaid on said judgment so given, rendered, and made, at the rate of 5 per cent., is $775.30, and the balance of the principal unpaid is $1,619.30. In the answer the judgment counted upon in the action is set out in full. Said judgment recites that the cause having been appealed to the Supreme Court of the state of California on the 25th day of March, 1895, and remittitur from said Supreme Court having been filed in the clerk's office, reversing the judgment appealed from, with directions to render judgment for plaintiff for $2,226.69, but limiting its payment to the funds of said city and county for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, coming on regularly for hearing, etc., thereupon, in accordance with said direction, enters judgment accordingly. "Said judgment to be paid out of the income and revenue of said defendant provided for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893."

The appellant contends, first, that said judgment entered April 24, 1896, in pursuance of the directions of this court, became res adjudicata, and could not be modified or amended by bringing another action founded upon said judgment; second, that the amendment of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution in November, 1900, referred to and relied upon by the plaintiff, removing the restriction contained in said section as it originally stood, and allowing the city and county of San Francisco to pay claims accruing during certain fiscal years is permissive, merely.

In the opinion of this court on the appeal from the former judgment it is said: "Whoever deals with a municipality does so with notice of the limitations of its powers, and with notice, also, that he can receive compensation for his labor or materials only from the revenues and income previously provided for the fiscal year during which his labor and materials are furnished, and with the knowledge, too, that all other persons dealing with the municipality have the same rights to compensation and are subject to the same limitations as he is. Even though at the time of making his contract there are funds in the treasury sufficient to meet the amount of his claim, he is charged with notice that these funds are liable to be paid out for municipal expenditures before his contract can mature into a claim against the city, and, if others whose claims have accrued subsequent to his are able to intercept these funds, he is in the same condition as any creditor who has dealt with one whose assets are exhausted before he presents his claim." But it is added by the court: "In the present case it appears from the findings of the court that the whole amount of the tax that was levied for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, has not been collected, and it may be that in the future there will be received into the treasury from this tax a sufficient amount of money from which the plaintiff's claim may be satisfied. At all events, he has the right to a judgment against the city for the amount of his claim, with the limitation that it shall be satisfied out of the income and revenue provided for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, after the payment of such other demands against such income as are properly payable in preference to his own. The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to enter a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $2,226.69, and directing that the same be satisfied out of the income and revenues of the defendant provided for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, in accordance with the foregoing opinion." Weaver v. San Francisco, 111 Cal. 325, 43 Pac. 972. No petition for rehearing or other modification of said judgment was asked on the part of the plaintiff, as might have been done, had the plaintiff desired a general judgment instead of the one directed to be entered. In the case of Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 527, 45 Pac. 824, 50 Pac. 670, involving a similar question of liability of a city, after a rehearing granted, this court in bank in that case said: "On a former hearing of this cause judgment in favor of the city of San Diego was reversed, with direction to the superior court to enter judgment in favor of the water company for the reasonable value of the use of its distributing plant, etc.; said judgment to be payable only out of the revenue of those fiscal years during which the city held possession of the plant. A rehearing was ordered principally upon the question as to the proper form of the judgment. Upon further consideration of the case, we have reached the conclusion that the water company should have an ordinary general judgment for whatever amount shall be found due it, without any direction as to the revenues out of which the judgment shall be satisfied." Accordingly in that case a general judgment was ordered to be entered, and the same might have been done in this case, had the plaintiff been dissatisfied with the judgment containing the limitation in question. But the plaintiff acquiesced in the form of the judgment and the limitation contained therein, and upon the going down of the remittitur, on April 24, 1896, upon his motion, judgment was rendered and entered in his favor in the superior court in the manner and form as directed by this court, as already shown. The judgment so rendered and entered in the superior court in accordance with the direction of this court was, however, never modified, and therefore became res adjudicata binding upon both parties. As said in Wallace v. Eldredge, 27 Cal. 498, "A judgment is a contract, in the highest sense of the term, and, as an obligation, it possesses a force superior to that of a specialty or simple contract. Chit. Cont. 1a; Black. Com. 382; 1 Pars. on Cont. 7." "In fact, the court had no power or authority to modify or change the judgment as directed to be entered by this court. No provision can be ingrafted upon it, nor can any be taken from it." Elliot on Appellate Procedure, § 576. "The judgment of this court concludes the parties, and it is too late now to change it." Argenti v. Sawyer, 32 Cal. 414. In Chafoin v. Rich, 92 Cal. 471, 28 Pac. 488, it is said: "Where the Supreme Court directs a particular judgment to be entered, the court below must not retry the cause, but must enter the judgment directed, and the entry of a different judgment is void."

*Rehearing denied June 12, 1905.

After the adoption of the amendment to section 18, art. 11, of the Constitution, modifying the limitation contained in said section as it originally stood, the defendant herein, as appears by the admission of the amended complaint, paid the amount of the principal for which said judgment was rendered, to wit, $2,226.69, leaving the interest and costs of suit unpaid; and it is for the recovery of these unpaid amounts, with accruing interest thereon, that the present suit is brought, and for which a judgment absolute in terms was rendered by the court below. We think the contention of the appellant that the former judgment had become the law of the case is correct, and that its terms and conditions cannot be altered or modified by bringing another action founded upon it.

The amendment to section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution adopted in 1900, already referred to, consisted of a proviso added to said section as follows: "Provided, however, that the city and county of San Francisco may at any time pay the unpaid claims, with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent. per annum, for materials furnished to and work done for said city and county during the forty-first, forty-second, forty-third, forty-fourth, and fiftieth fiscal years, and for unpaid teachers' salaries for the fiftieth fiscal year, out of the income and revenue of any succeeding year or years, the amount to be paid in full of said claims not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, and that no statute of limitations shall apply in any manner to these claims." And also containing another provision in reference to the indebtedness of the city of Vallejo, in Solano county. The amendment, it will be seen, removes the limitation formerly imposed upon the city in reference to the payment of certain claims of indebtedness applicable to certain fiscal years, and up to a certain aggregate amount. In the construction of a Constitution or statute, words and phrases are construed according to the context and approved usage of the language. Civ. Code, 13; Code Civ. Proc. 16. From its very terms, the amendment in question is permissive only, giving the city some discretion in allowing and paying the claims referred to, up to the limit prescribed. The plaintiff himself does not pretend that the city is bound to pay his claim, but alleges in his complaint that under the constitutional amendment in question "said defendant is authorized and empowered to pay such demands." It is alleged in appellant's brief, and not controverted by respondent, that under this amendment money was raised by the city and county of San Francisco to pay certain back indebtedness, and that a portion was set aside to pay the bills of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and that of that the respondent received the amount of his original claim; this being considered at the time his fair proportion of the money allowed for the indebtedness of that year.

It is ordered that the judgment appealed from be, and the same hereby is, modified by adding thereto the proviso contained in the original judgment, to wit, "Said judgment to be paid out of the income and revenues of said defendant provided for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893," and that, as so modified, said judgment is affirmed. Further ordered that appellant recover its costs on appeal.

PETERSON v. GIBBS et al. (S. F. 3,281.)

1. QUIETING TITLE—NONSUIT—WHEN PROPER.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, authorizing the bringing of an action to determine adverse claims to real property, the court should, in its decree, declare and define the interests of the respective parties as established by the evidence; and a judgment of nonsuit is improper where plaintiff establishes any legal interest in the property, although he fails to establish that his land is free of the claim asserted by defendant.

2. DEEDS — CONVEYANCE OF TIMBER — CONSTRUCTION.

An instrument by which the owners of land "grant, bargain, sell and convey" all the timber standing or lying on certain lands, and give the vendees 10 years in which to remove the timber —the vendees agreeing that, if the timber is not removed within 10 years, they will pay a yearly rental for the privilege of removing the same—and providing that each of the parties will pay one-half of the taxes upon the land until that time, constitutes an agreement for the absolute sale of the timber, whether removed within the 10 years or not, and the only effect of a failure to so remove it is to give rise to the obligation of the vendees to pay the annual rental.

3. QUIETING TITLE—PROTECTION OF DEFENDANT'S RIGHTS.

Since, under Civ. Code, §§ 658, 660, standing timber is, in effect, declared to be real property, and since title thereto may be transferred to and held by one who is not the owner of the land, a decree quieting title to land, the timber standing on which has been conveyed to another than the owner of the land, should protect the rights of the owner of the timber by reserving or excepting the timber from its operation.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. M. Mannon, Judge.

Action by Andrew Peterson against J. H. Gibbs and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

McGarvey & Bledsoe, for appellant. McNab & Hirsch, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal from the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial. The trial court granted the defendants' motion for a nonsuit, and judgment was thereupon entered that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that defendants recover their costs.

The principal question presented is as to the action of the court in granting defendants' motion for a nonsuit.

The action was commenced July 19, 1901, to quiet plaintiff's title to certain land in Mendocino county. Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that on July 18, 1891, one Oppenlander was the owner in fee simple of said land; that on said day Oppenlander sold and conveyed the same to him; and that he ever since has been, and now is, the owner in fee simple and in possession of all thereof. He further alleged that the defendants claim an interest therein adverse to him, but that such claim was without any right whatever. He asked that the defendants be required to set forth all adverse claims asserted by them, that such claims be determined by the decree, and that it be adjudged that defendants have no estate or interest in the property. The defendants, by their answer, filed January 15, 1902, denied that plaintiff was the owner in fee or in possession of any part of said land, and admitted and alleged that they claimed an interest therein, to the extent that they are the "absolute owners of all the timber upon the above-mentioned premises, whether standing, lying, or growing," with the right to do all things on said land which might be necessary for the purpose of manufacturing the timber and removing the same, and to make roads and build camps thereon, and the right of ingress and egress upon and across the land, and also full rights of way for the purpose of removing said timber as the defendants might acquire upon the adjoining land or lands in the vicinity of the lands described in the complaint. They asked for a decree that plaintiff take nothing by his action, that it be decreed that defendants are the owners of all the timber upon the said land, "whether said timber be lying, standing or growing," and that they are entitled to remove the same. Upon the trial it was shown by plaintiff that, subject to such rights as were possessed by defendants under an instrument executed by the owners of the land on December 28, 1887, purporting to grant and convey the timber thereon and on other lands, he was the owner of all the land in dispute; under a deed of grant executed on July 18, 1891, by Oppenlander, the then owner, subject to defendants' rights, and also that he had been in possession of all the land ever since the date of his deed. The said instrument of December 28, 1887, was one whereby the then owners had purported to "grant, bargain, sell and convey" to the defendants "all the timber now standing, lying or being on" certain lands of the grantors, including the land in controversy, and, in addition to such purported grant, contained the following provisions:

"And the parties of the first part promise and agree to and with the parties of the second part, that they shall have a period of ten years in which to remove the timber from the above described lands, and they do covenant and promise to allow and empower the parties of the second part, their agents and servants, to enter in and upon the real estate upon which the timber hereby conveyed is growing or situate as above described, to cut such timber, manufacture the same into lumber, and do all things upon such land which may be necessary for the purpose of manufacturing such timber into lumber and the removal thereof, as well as the right to make roads and build camps upon such land, and also full ingress and egress have over such land for the removal of the timber hereby conveyed, and also such timber as the parties of the second part may acquire upon adjoining land or lands in the vicinity of the lands of the parties of the first part as described herein. The parties of the second part hereby covenant and agree to and with the said parties of the first part, that if the timber is not removed from the above described lands within a period of ten years that they will pay a yearly rental to the parties of the first part, of two hundred dollars a year thereafter for the privilege of removing such timber from the lands of the parties of the first part, with the covenants and agreements of the parties of the first part herein to continue until all of the timber is removed, and it is agreed between the parties hereto that all the privileges granted herein are to continue until such timber is removed, subject to the provisions of this agreement.

"It is further agreed by and between the parties hereto, that each of the parties hereto are to pay one-half the taxes upon all of the foregoing described real estate that may be levied upon such land for state, county or municipal purposes during each and every year from the date hereof until all the timber is removed from such real estate."

This instrument, in consideration for the execution of which the defendants paid $7,000 in cash, was the sole basis of defendants' claim. It had been duly recorded, and plaintiff had full notice thereof. The deed to him contained this provision, viz.: "Excepting and reserving, however, for the benefit and use of a former grantee of mine, the standing and down timber on the hereinafter granted land, and the privilege to work it up and to remove it from said land." At the time of the commencement of this action, defendants had not commenced to remove any timber from the land. The defendants, who had never been notified of the transfer of the land by Oppenlander, to plaintiff, had, acting under their agreement, paid Oppenlander, each year after the year 1897, the sum of $200. Plaintiff had paid all the taxes on the land, but it did not appear that any demand for reimbursement had ever been made upon defendants. This, aside from some evidence going to show that it was the expressed intention of defendants at the time of the negotiations resulting in the agreement of December 28, 1887, to commence cutting and removing the timber in not to exceed three years from such date, was substantially the case made by plaintiff.

Even if it be conceded that the case shows all that is claimed for it by defendants, we are of the opinion that the motion for a nonsuit was improperly granted. At most, the plaintiff had simply failed to establish that his land was free of all valid claim on the part of defendants. He had, however, clearly shown that he was the owner in fee of the land, subject only to the interest held by defendants in the timber "standing, lying or being" on said land on December 28, 1887, with such rights of entry, rights of way, etc., as were given by the contract of that date. Although he had not come up to the full measure of the allegations of his complaint as to the invalidity of the claim asserted by defendants, he had shown a legal title in himself, sufficient to enable him to maintain the action to quiet his title to the land, such as it was, and to have the adverse claim of defendants in regard thereto, fully defined and determined. The mere fact that a defendant in an action brought under the provisions of section 738, Code Civ. Proc., is shown to have some valid interest or estate in the property in controversy, does not warrant the denial of all relief to the plaintiff, who has also shown a valid interest therein. Such an action is brought, as authorized by the statute, "for the purpose of determining" any adverse claim that may be asserted therein by a defendant to the land in controversy; and this does not mean that the court is simply to ascertain, as against a plaintiff shown to have a legal interest, whether or not such defendant has some interest, but also that the court shall declare and define the interest held by the defendant, if any, so that the plaintiff may have a decree finally adjudicating the extent of his own interest in the property in controversy. The object of the action is to finally settle and determine, as between the parties, all conflicting claims to the property in controversy, and to decree to each such interest or estate therein as he may be entitled to. Of course, if the plaintiff fails to show any legal interest in the property in controversy, and as to which he asserts title, he must fail altogether, and could not complain of a judgment of nonsuit, but where he shows any legal interest he is entitled to have that interest declared by the court. See, generally, upon the nature and object of the statutory action to quiet title, Stoddart v. Burge, 53 Cal. 394; People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 5 Pac. 263, 6 Pac. 481; Pennie v. Hildreth, 81 Cal. 127, 22 Pac. 398; Castro v. Barry, 79 Cal. 443, 21 Pac. 946; Bulwer C. S. Mining Co. v. Standard S. M. Co., 83 Cal. 589, 23 Pac. 1102; Quint v. McMullen, 103 Cal. 381, 37 Pac. 381. By the order granting a nonsuit the plaintiff was, in effect, declared to have no legal interest whatever in the property in controversy. This was, of course, erroneous.

As the case made by plaintiff showed him to be the owner of the land in controversy, subject only to such interest in the timber thereon and such rights of entry and rights of way as defendants may be determined to have under their contract, the motion for a nonsuit should have been denied. The judgment must therefore be reversed, in order that the conflicting claims of the parties to the land in controversy may be fully and finally determined and settled by a decree.

Counsel have on this appeal discussed the question as to the proper construction of the written instrument under which defendants claim an interest in the real property involved in this action. It was upon the theory that this instrument showed an absolute sale of all the timber "standing, lying and being" on the land at the date thereof, that the learned judge of the court below granted the motion for a nonsuit. It is proper that we should say, for the guidance of the court on a new trial, that, in our judgment, this was a correct construction of the instrument. It is true that the timber was sold in contemplation of its removal from the land, and that it was the understanding of all parties that it should be so removed. While there is much apparent conflict in the decisions as to the proper construction of a contract for the sale of standing trees to be removed, it is well settled that such a sale may be absolute, and the agreement to remove within a specified or reasonable time merely a covenant, in which case the timber remains the property of the purchaser, although not removed within the specified time. See 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 541 (2d Ed.); Hoit v. Stratton Mills, 54 N. H. 109, 20 Am. Rep. 119. The question in each case is as to what is the contract between the parties. Here there is absolutely nothing in the terms of the agreement which can be construed as making the removal of the timber a condition precedent to the passing of title, or as causing delay in such removal, beyond the period of 10 years from the date of the instrument, or failure to pay the rental reserved or one-half the taxes, to operate as a divesting of the title conveyed. The terms of the instrument literally signify an absolute conveyance of the timber, and there is nothing in the provisions relied upon by plaintiff to impair the force of the plain words of present grant. The provision to the effect that the vendees should have a period of 10 years in which to remove the timber that they had purchased must be read in connection with the provision to the effect that, if it is not removed within 10 years, the vendees "will pay a yearly rental to the parties of the first part, of two hundred dollars a year thereafter for the privilege of removing such timber," etc. This provision, together with the provision for the payment by the vendees of one-half of all taxes that may be levied upon the land from the date of the agreement until all of the timber has been removed, both of which are mere covenants in no way affecting the title, must be held to express the agreement of the parties as to the effect of any failure of the vendees to remove the timber within the designated period of ten years.

Much reliance is placed by plaintiff upon certain evidence claimed to be admissible for the purpose of showing that it was the intention of the parties that the vendees should commence to remove the timber within three years from the date of the agreement. At most, this evidence only tended to show that the vendors entered into this agreement relying upon the statements of the vendees that they expected to commence the work of removing the timber within three years. It in no degree affects the contract entered into, or assists in the construction thereof. There is nothing therein that is at all inconsistent with the clear and unambiguous provisions of the contract.

There can be no doubt that at the time of the transfer of the timber the same was a part of the realty. Sections 658, 660, Civ. Code. Nor can there be any doubt that the title to the standing timber could be transferred to and held by one who was not the owner of the land. See Sears v. Ackerman, 138 Cal. 583, 72 Pac. 171. Whether, by a conveyance of standing timber to be removed, the timber is, in contemplation of law, severed from the land and transformed into personal property (see Kingsley v. Holbrook, 45 N. H. 313, 86 Am. Dec. 173; Hoit v. Stratton Mills, 54 N. H. 109, 20 Am. Rep. 119; Purner v. Piercy, 40 Md. 212, 17 Am. Rep. 591), or continues to be an interest in the realty, it is clear to us that, so long as it remains actually affixed to the land, a decree quieting plaintiff's title to the real property, without reserving or excepting such timber from its operation, would cut off all rights of the defendants therein. Defendants are therefore entitled to have their rights in relation to the timber fully reserved from the effect of any decree that may be made.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

TOWNE v. UNITED ELECTRIC GAS & POWER CO. (L. A. 1,430.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—SAFE APPLIANCES—USE OF DEFECTIVE APPLIANCE.

Defendant, an electric light company, furnished its linemen with several pike poles (long poles having an iron ferule and an iron pike in the end) of the character and construction customarily used in bracing electric light poles while removing the same. One of these pike poles had become dull at the point and unfit to be used with safety. While plaintiff was on an electric light pole, stripping the wires, one of his fellow servants picked up and used the blunt pike pole, which did not fix the electric light pole so as to properly hold the same, and it in consequence fell, whereby plaintiff was injured. Held, that defendant had properly fulfilled its duty of furnishing suitable tools and appliances, and the injury was in no way the result of its negligence.

2. SAME—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

The injury was the result of the negligence of the fellow servant, who picked up the defective pole without observing its patent defect.

Beatty, C. J., and Angellotti, J., dissenting.

Commissioners' Decision. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by Amos A. Towne against the United Electric Gas & Power Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Cochran, Williams & Phillips and Hunsaker & Britt, for appellant. Waters & Wylie, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Plaintiff recovered judgment for $2,500, damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the negligence of defendant while in its employ as a lineman. Defendant has appealed from the judgment and the order denying its motion for a new trial. The controlling question here is as to whether or not the injury was proximately caused by defendant's negligence.

The facts as shown by the findings are substantially as follows: At the time of the injury plaintiff was, and for several months had been, in the employ of defendant in its construction and repair department as a lineman. He was one of a gang of four men under the superintendency of one Bevans, who had directed the men to strip the wires from and remove certain electric light poles, situated in the streets of Santa Monica, which by reason of their long use were believed to be decayed and unsafe. Plaintiff knew the character of the work required of him, the dangers attending it, and the fellow servants employed to assist him. It is not claimed that defendant was negligent in the selection of the fellow servants. The men were furnished, among other appliances, with two or three pike poles (which were about 10 or 12 feet in length, about 2 inches in diameter, one end having an iron ferule on it, and an iron pike in the end, about 1½ inches in length) to be used in bracing the electric light poles to be removed, and to keep them from falling while the man engaged in removing the wires was up the pole from which the wires were being removed. This was the method employed to safeguard the pole from falling and to prevent accidents, all of which plaintiff knew. All of the said pike poles were of the character and construction usually and customarily used for such purpose, but one of said poles had become dull at the point and unfit to be used safely. The evidence does not show that any of the other pike poles had become dull or out of repair, nor is there any evidence showing that Bevans or any of the men knew that the pike pole was dull, but the condition of the pole could have been ascertained by an examination thereof. On the morning of the accident, plaintiff was directed by Bevans to climb and clear the wires from one of said poles, which was 25 feet in height. Bevans also directed one of the men to brace the electric light pole with a pike pole on the unprotected side. The man took from the pike poles, which were then and there on the ground within reach, the pike pole which had become dull and worn at the point, and forced the barbed portion thereof into the electric light pole, about eight feet from the ground, and rested the other end of the pike pole upon the ground, for the purpose of forming a brace and holding the pole in place after the wires should be removed therefrom. There was also attached to the top of the electric light pole a rope, the other end of which was held on the ground by one of the gang of men, for the purpose of holding the electric light pole in place and keeping it from falling. While the electric light pole was thus supported, plaintiff, pursuant to the directions of Bevans, climbed it for the purpose of stripping the wires. While plaintiff was at the top of the pole after he had stripped the electric wires from it, it fell, and caused him to fall to the ground and receive serious injuries by reason thereof. The electric light pole fell because it was decayed at the ground, and because the pike pole, being dull, did not penetrate the electric light pole a sufficient depth to hold, but broke out or slipped, thus letting the pole fall to the ground.

The court found that the injury to plaintiff was caused by reason of the use of the pike pole, which had become dull at the point, and was not caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. The burden was upon plaintiff to prove his allegation that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant. The only act of negligence claimed is that the defendant allowed the pike pole to become dull or blunt at the point. If the defendant was guilty of negligence or want of ordinary care, it is liable; otherwise not. Negligence is the breach or omission of a legal duty. Donovan v. Ferris, 128 Cal. 54, 60 Pac. 519, 79 Am. St. Rep. 25. It was the duty of the defendant to furnish suitable tools and appliances to plaintiff and his fellow servants for the work which they had in hand. The court found that the pike poles furnished "were of the character and construction usually and customarily used for the purpose for which the same were furnished." Therefore there was no negligence in furnishing tools with which the work was done. If the pike pole became dull by reason of use, it was as much the duty of the plaintiff and his fellow servants as it was of defendant to have had it sharpened and repaired, provided the means were furnished by defendant with which such repairing could be done. It is the duty of the employé to use ordinary care and skill, and it certainly is the duty of the employé to know whether the tools with which he is working have become dull or in need of sharpening. Having eyes, he must use them, and, being informed, he must act upon the information. If one of the pike poles furnished by the defendant had had the point broken off by the plaintiff and his fellow servants in taking down the very first pole they came to, and they had used such pike pole with the broken point on the next electric light pole, and damage had been caused thereby, would it have been the negligence of the defendant? Would defendant have to have one man employed for the special purpose of watching the points of each pike pole, another for the purpose of watching each guy rope, and another for the purpose of watching the steel points attached to the shoes of the climber of the poles? We think that a reasonably prudent employer would have performed his duty by furnishing proper pike poles, and that a reasonably prudent employé would not use a pike pole after the point had become dull and blunt.

In the case of Webber v. Piper, 109 N. Y. 496, 17 N. E. 216, where the injury was caused by a circular saw, dull from use, the court said: "A master builder might furnish proper tools to his workmen, but it would not be his duty to sharpen every chisel as it became dull, or set every saw when the need arose."

In Cregan v. Marston, 126 N. Y. 568, 27 N. E. 952, 22 Am. St. Rep. 854, it was said to be the duty of the master to furnish safe appliances, and "that is the master's right and duty; but the servant who uses them can and should keep them in order for their proper and safe daily use, when furnished with the necessary means of so doing, and when perfectly capable of correcting the defect."

In Bailey's Personal Injuries, vol. 1, § 259, it is said: "The general rule does not apply to defects arising in the daily use of an appliance which are not of a permanent character, and do not require the help of skillful mechanics to repair, but which may easily be and usually are repaired by the workmen, and to repair which proper and suitable materials are supplied."

In the late case of Helling v. Schindler (filed November 11, 1904) 78 Pac. 710, in which the injury was alleged to have been caused by the reason of the dullness of the knives of a buzz planer, the cases referred to above were cited with approval by this court, and it was there said: "We are of the opinion that it is clear that any such mere dullness of the knives in the planer in question, produced by the ordinary use thereof, as might be sufficiently remedied by the use of a file in the hands of one of the employés, was a defect of such a nature that the employer could not be held responsible therefor, in the absence of other circumstances."

It was the duty of the fellow servant using the pike pole to have selected and used, from "said pike poles then and there on the ground," one fit and proper to be used. In picking up, selecting, and using the dull pike pole, without looking at the point, when others were within reach, the fellow servant by his negligence caused the injury to plaintiff. It is said in Sherman and Redfield on Negligence (5th Ed.) § 195: "The master performs his whole duty by using as much care in furnishing instrumentalities for the use of his servants as a man of ordinary prudence, in the same line of business, acting with a prudent regard to his own safety, would use in supplying similar things to himself, if he were doing the work. He is not in fault without proof of notice of the defect, nor as to repairs and replacements, until he has had a reasonable time after, or constructive notice, to perform his duty. The master is not expected to stand over each servant every moment, to discover instantly a defect in good materials and tools, caused by their careless use. Nor is he bound to keep such a close watch over the details of the work as to enable him to repair every deterioration in instrumentalities of work, resulting from a servant's use thereof, as soon as it occurs. * * * A master who has provided an ample supply of proper appliances ready at hand is not necessarily responsible to a servant for the neglect of a fellow servant to use such appliances."

In the late case of Amburg v. Paper Co., 97 Me. 327, 54 Atl. 765, the plaintiff was injured by the falling of a heavy iron press roll, caused by a fellow servant selecting and using an inch rope, which broke in lowering the roll, instead of using a larger and stronger one which was within his reach. The court held the master not at fault, and the negligence to be that of a fellow servant. The court said: "It is to be assumed in such case, and the master has a right to assume, that the servants will use the means for renewal and repair which the master has placed at their hands, and that, if ropes become worn and unsuitable, others will be selected in their stead out of the supply furnished for them by the master; and if the servant whose duty it is to make the selection is negligent in so doing, and selects an unsuitable or unsafe one, it is not the negligence of the master, but it is the negligence of a servant, for which the master is not responsible."

In Hefferen v. Northern Pacific Railroad Co., 45 Minn. 471, 48 N. W. 1, 526, it was held that a father could not recover damages for injury to his minor son caused by the use of a worn and battered side set, from which a thin scale of steel flew into the son's eye. The side set was selected and used by a fellow servant when others were provided. The court said: "The defect and whatever risk there may have been were perfectly apparent; and if a workman should, of his own choice and unnecessarily, use a tool thus plainly defective, when others were provided for his use, he is not absolved from the consequences of his own choice. It cannot be said to be the duty of a master, under ordinary circumstances, who provides and keeps proper tools for the use of his servants, to see to it that all such as from use become obviously unfit for service are removed beyond the reach of his servants. The servant is no less bound to be careful concerning his own safety than is the master, and where proper instruments are provided for the use of the servants, and their ordinary duties require and enable them to select such as are suitable, they must act with reasonable discretion. Under such circumstances, it is a want of reasonable discretion for them to act blindly upon the assumption that none of the implements will ever become dull or worn, or otherwise obviously defective. All human experience is to the contrary."

The above case was followed and approved in Ling v. St. Paul M. & M. Ry. Co., 50 Minn. 160, 52 N. W. 378, where it was held that the master was not responsible for damages caused by the falling of a heavy flue sheet, which fell by reason of a fellow servant selecting and using a defective iron hook when proper ones were within reach and accessible.

Where damages were caused to a servant by a sledgehammer that had become cracked and battered by use, and there were other sound and safe ones at hand, which the servant might have selected and used, the master was held not liable, and the negligence that of the servant. Rawley v. Colliau, 90 Mich. 31, 51 N. W. 350. So where a molder was injured by the escape of heated metal from a mold, caused by the selection and use by a fellow servant of a defective flask in making the mold, where numerous flasks were on hand for use that were not defective, the master was held not liable. Kehoe v. Allen, 92 Mich. 464, 52 N. W. 740, 31 Am. St. Rep. 608. And where plaintiff was badly injured by a defective rope breaking while lifting a heavy piece of machinery, the rope being selected by a fellow servant, when proper ones were within reach, the defendant was held not liable. Prescott v. Ball Engine Co., 176 Pa. 459, 35 Atl. 224, 53 Am. St. Rep. 683. The court there said: "We see no reason to doubt that the rigger was a vice principal, and as such charged with the duty of keeping ropes on hand, some of which should be at all times suitable for use. But it was not his duty to select the rope to be used on each occasion when a rope was wanted. If good ropes were in stock, and a poor one was used because of haste or carelessness or mistake of judgment, it was not the fault of the rigger as vice principal, but of the workmen themselves, and the injury suffered because of the unsuitable rope could not give the injured person a cause of action against his employer. In the nature of things, the ropes will wear from using. * * * If a poor one was used when a good one was within reach, this was negligence, and, whether chargeable to the plaintiff or to a co-employé, it relieves the defendant from all liability for the injury sustained."

A case directly in point is Carroll v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 160 Mass. 152, 35 N. E. 456. There the plaintiff was injured by the falling of a telegraph pole, caused by the use of a shovel in supporting the pole, instead of using a proper appliance called a "deadman." The end of the deadman broke, and, instead of getting another like implement, the fellow servant picked up and used a shovel. The defendant was held not liable, and the court said: "The short answer is that there is no evidence that the defendant did not furnish a sufficiency of proper tools at the depot from which those which were used were taken, or within convenient reach, and that, when proper appliances of this sort are furnished by the employer within convenient reach in a case like the present, he has done his whole duty, and is not bound to see that every gang of workmen takes as many tools as the event may show to have been desirable." See the following authorities in support of the same principle: Thyng v. Fitchburg Railroad, 156 Mass. 13, 30 N. E. 169, 32 Am. St. Rep. 425; New Omaha Thomson-Houston Electric Light Co. v. Rombold (Neb.) 97 N. W. 1030; Cregan v. Marston et al., 126 N. Y. 568, 27 N. E. 952, 22 Am. St. Rep. 854; Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916; Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017.

In the late case of Kerrigan v. Market St. Ry. Co., 138 Cal. 506, 71 Pac. 621, the plaintiff was injured by the falling of a lot of ties in front of defendant's car, which carried plaintiff with them under the car, the falling being caused by the sudden stoppage of the car, and the stakes in front of the ties being too short and not of sufficient strength to hold the ties. Defendant had plenty of proper stakes on hand, within reach of plaintiff and his fellow servants, which they could have selected and used, but did not do so. It was held that it was not the duty of defendant to adjust and place the proper stakes on the car in front of the ties. The case of Wall v. Marshutz, 138 Cal. 522, 71 Pac. 692, is not in conflict with the rule as adopted in this case. In that case there was evidence tending to show that the appliance, an iron clamp, was defective, and that the injury was caused by such defective appliance. It was there said, in speaking of the selection of tools or appliances by fellow servants, that the rule applies "only to cases where the selection of the tools used in the work devolves upon the employés engaged in the work generally, one of whom is the person injured, and not where it devolves exclusively upon the foreman of the work." In the case at bar the selection of the pike pole devolved upon the employés generally. It was not the duty of the foreman to go from one squad of men to another, simply for the purpose of picking up a pike pole from the ground and handing it to the man about to use it. The men using the pike poles were fully as competent as the foreman to select and use proper ones. Defendant performed its duty when it furnished the usual proper and safe appliances.

Respondent places much stress upon Silveira v. Iversen, 128 Cal. 187, 60 Pac. 687. In that case the contention of plaintiff was that "the reefing pennant was rotten, and that it broke, to his injury; and that in this respect defendants failed in their duty, as his employers, to provide safe appliances with which to do his work." The question as to the selection of a defective implement by a fellow servant where proper ones are furnished and on hand is not discussed. We have found no case that sustains the plaintiff's contention here.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed: VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

SHAW, J. I concur. The case of Wall v. Marshutz may be further distinguished. In the case at bar the employer did actually furnish to the employés a number of pike poles to be used when required. The points of the pikes would gradually become blunt by use, and it was manifestly the duty of the employés generally, and an implied condition of the contract of each, first, to observe when one became too blunt to be safely used, and either to repair them in that respect or return them to the employer for that purpose; and, secondly, when selecting one for use, to examine their condition and select one that was fit. In these respects the case is similar to Helling v. Schindler, cited in the principal opinion. In Wall v. Marshutz the different kinds of clamps for use were not furnished to the employés generally, but were kept in a place apart from the place of use, and were selected by the foreman, and it was his particular duty to select the sort of clamp best adapted for the work in hand. The other employés were under no duty in respect of such selection.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I dissent. This case is clearly distinguishable from Helling v. Schindler and kindred cases cited in the opinion. Those were cases where the implement became defective during the use thereof by certain employés, and the defect was incident to and caused by the use thereof by them, and was of such a nature that the employés actually using the implement were bound to contemplate and take notice thereof. Such cases are not applicable where, as here, the tools and implements used by the men were delivered by the employer to his employés on the morning of the accident, and, at the time of such delivery by the employer, one of them was defective and unfit for use. The trial court found this to be the condition of affairs here, and that the accident was due to such defective condition. It further appears from the findings that the defect was of such a nature that it would be observed only on a careful examination. We have thus simply a case where the employer furnished to his employés an appliance defective and unfit for use, and the defect was not obvious. The fact that other appliances of a similar character in good condition were furnished at the same time cannot affect the question here presented. The employés had the right to assume that all the tools and implements delivered to them by their employer for immediate use by them were, at the time of such delivery, in a reasonably safe condition for such use, unless the defect was obvious. To hold otherwise appears to me to seriously encroach upon the rule as to the duty of the employer to furnish implements reasonably sufficient for the purposes intended.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. According to the findings of the superior court, Bevans was not simply the foreman of the gang of men engaged in removing the pole which fell; he was foreman of defendant's construction and repair department, and "all of said pikes and poles were under the charge and care of said Bevans, whose duty it was, among other things, to see that the same were kept in repair." As I understand the other findings, the two or three pike poles furnished this gang of men were issued by him as being all of them fit for use as braces. There is no evidence and no finding that any one of them was in better condition than the one used, and the fact that it was dull could only have been ascertained by a careful examination. By this I do not understand that it required any prolonged or critical inspection of the point of the pike to discover its actual condition, but rather that it required some nicety of judgment to decide when one of these pikes had reached that degree of dullness to cause it, after being "forced into the pole," to slide along the grain of the wood and splinter out, instead of penetrating further when the weight of the pole was thrown against it. If it did require such nicety of judgment to determine that the appliance was unsafe, it is an unwarranted assumption to say the plaintiff and his fellow servants were bound to take notice of the fact, when the foreman especially charged with the custody and repair of the pikes had issued it for his use. I find no distinction in principle between this case and Wall v. Marshutz. Bevans here, as much as Walsh in that case, was specially charged with the duty of selecting the proper appliance for the work in hand, and when he delivered three pikes to plaintiff and his fellow servants, to be used in the work to be done, it was an assurance, not that among them they would find one or two fit for use, but that they were all fit for use; and, considering his position and his duties, they were justified in trusting to his judgment, unless his mistake was apparent, and that does not appear.

LEAN v. GIVENS. (S. F. 3,118.)*

1. EXECUTION—LEVY—LIEN OF LEVY—HOMESTEAD—LIEN ON EXCESS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 681, so far modifies the common law that the only means of enforcing a judgment is by execution; and, under section 688, land may be taken, as well as personal property, in the same manner as upon a writ of attachment, but it is not affected by the execution until there is a levy. The levy is by section 688 made in the same manner as upon an attachment, by filing with the county recorder a copy of the writ, with a notice, etc. Civ. Code, § 1240, declares that the excess in value of the homestead property over and above the exemption allowed is subject to execution. Sections 1245–1261 provide a plan whereby the excess may be subjected to sale, but the levy on the property covered by the homestead declaration must be made, as the first step in the proceeding to subject the excess to the payment of the judgment. Held, that where an execution levy is made on land embraced in a valid declaration of homestead, the judgment not being a lien, the levy creates a lien conditionally, to become absolute in the event that it is determined in proceedings under sections 1245–1261 that an excess exists, and a purchaser after the levy takes subject to such lien.

2. HOMESTEAD — EXECUTION — EXEMPTION—DETERMINATION OF EXCESS—REPORT OF APPRAISERS—NOTICE.

Civ. Code, §§ 1245–1261, provides a plan whereby, when land claimed as a homestead is levied on, the excess of value over the exemption may be subject to sale on execution; and section 1254 provides that, on the report of the appraisers, if it appears that the land exceeds in value the exemption, and that it cannot be divided, the court must direct its sale under execution. Held, that where a homestead claimant was not the head of a family, and the appraisers reported that the property could not be divided, there was no necessity for a notice of the hearing of the report of the appraisers.

3. SAME—ABANDONMENT OF PROCEEDINGS.

The fact that there was 16 months' delay after the levy of an execution on a homestead before proceedings were taken under Civ. Code, §§ 1245–1258, providing a method for subjecting to execution the excess of value over the exemption, did not show an abandonment; a part of the delay being explainable by the pendency of a suit to enjoin execution sale.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; A. L. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by Walter J. Lean against J. A. Givens. From an order in a proceeding under Civ. Code, §§ 1245–1258, directing a sale of certain lands on execution, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Jarman, for appellant. Chas. W. Davison and J. H. Russell, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order of the superior court in a proceeding under the provisions of sections 1245 to 1258, inclusive, of the Civil Code, directing the sale on execution of certain lands held by the judgment defendant as a homestead. The judgment defendant, Juliet H. Stark, was not the head of a family, and consequently the amount of the homestead exemption was only $1,000. The judgment was entered and docketed on October 23, 1899, and the homestead was selected prior to that date. The appraisement made in the proceeding showed the property comprising the homestead to be worth $4,700. The execution was levied on the property on November 4, 1899, and an attempt was made to sell, upon the claim that the homestead was invalid. This sale was enjoined, and final judgment was made in the injunction suit on May 18, 1900, prohibiting the judgment plaintiff from enforcing the levy otherwise than by proceedings under Civ. Code, §§ 1245–1258, inclusive. On May 2, 1900, the judgment defendant sold and conveyed the land to the appellant, Givens, and on October 12, 1900, the judgment was assigned to the respondent, Walter J. Lean. The petition for the appointment of appraisers under section 1245, Civ. Code, was not filed in the superior court of the county until March 5, 1901.

There is thus presented the question whether or not the levy of an execution on property described in a declaration of homestead, which exceeds in value the amount of the homestead exemption, creates any lien on the land, so far as there is an excess over the homestead exemption. We refer to the lien of the levy as distinct from the judgment lien, because in Lubbock v. McMann, 82 Cal. 230, 22 Pac. 1145, 16 Am. St. Rep. 108, it appears to have been held that a judgment is not a lien on any part, either in extent or value, of the homestead premises, even in cases where there is an excess in value above the homestead exemption. This is contrary to the rule in other states, in which the extent of the exemption of the homestead is measured by a certain limited value. See note to Vanstory v. Thornton, 34 Am. St. Rep. 505. In several other cases in this state, where the fact of there being an excess in value was not apparent, the court has stated in general terms that a judgment is not a lien upon property embraced in a valid declaration of homestead. Dam v. Zink, 112 Cal. 92, 44 Pac. 331; Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 120, 24 Pac. 852, 21 Am. St. Rep. 26; Barrett v. Sims, 59 Cal. 615; Bowman v. Norton, 16 Cal. 213; Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181, 76 Am. Dec. 516.

Conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the judgment is not even a provisional or conditional lien on the possible excess in value, we are of the opinion that the levy of an execution on the property establishes a lien thereon to the extent of the excess over the homestead exemption which may ultimately, by proper proceedings under the Civil Code, be determined to exist, and that the substituted defendant, Givens, having purchased after the levy, took the land subject to the right of the judgment plaintiff to have it sold upon such proceedings.

The rule at common law was that an execution was a lien on personal property from the time of its issuance, although there was no levy. 2 Freeman on Ex. §§ 199, 200. But at common law neither a judgment nor an execution was a lien on land, and the method of applying the land of the judgment debtor to the satisfaction of a judgment was by means of a writ of elegit, whereby the officer, after exhausting the personal property, could seize the land, and apply the rents and profits of one-half thereof upon the writ. 3 Freeman on Ex. § 370. The common law is in force in this state, except as modified by statute or the Constitution. Pol. Code, § 4468. It has been so far modified by the Code that the only means of enforcing a judgment for money is by writ of execution (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 681, 683), and that land may be taken on the execution as well as personal property (Code Civ. Proc. § 688). The real estate of a judgment debtor is "liable to execution," and "may be attached on execution" in the same manner as upon a writ of attachment, but it is not affected by the execution until there is a levy. Id. The effect of these provisions, in connection with the common law in force, is to enlarge the execution, by making it enforceable against land, and to make it, when levied, a lien or charge on the land. Where the judgment is a lien on the land there is no real necessity for a formal levy, as it adds nothing to the effect of the sale on execution. Lehnhardt v. Jennings, 119 Cal. 195, 48 Pac. 56, 51 Pac. 195. But where the judgment is not a lien the property is not taken on execution until there is a levy, and the lien does not begin until that act is done. Summerville v. Stockton M. Co., 142 Cal. 540, 76 Pac. 243. The levy of an execution is made in the same manner as upon an attachment (Code Civ. Proc. § 688); that is, by filing with the county recorder a copy of the writ, with a notice that the land (describing it) is attached, and serving a similar notice on the occupant (Code Civ. Proc. § 542). The purpose of a lien is to cut off rights of third persons which might otherwise accrue between the time of levy and the time of sale. The filing of the notice in the office of the recorder is clearly for no other purpose than to give notice to third persons of the prior charge. Section 537, Code Civ. Proc., declares that the plaintiff in an action may "have the property of the defendant attached, as security for the satisfaction of any judgment that may be recovered," and section 688 provides that land and other property "may be attached on execution, in like manner as upon writs of attachment." Considering the effect of all these provisions, we think it is clearly shown that the levy of an execution upon land, where the judgment is not a lien, creates a lien on the land from that date, which will charge whatever interest in the land is or may be made to be subject to the execution, including the excess in value of homestead property over the homestead exemption. That a levy creates a lien on land where none exists by the judgment has always been assumed by this court, and it is generally understood in the profession to have that effect. See Blood v. Light, 38 Cal. 657, 99 Am. Dec. 441; Beaton v. Reid, 111 Cal. 486, 44 Pac. 167; Summerville v. Stockton M. Co., supra; Lehnhardt v. Jennings, supra.

Section 1240 of the Civil Code, in effect, declares that the excess in value of the homestead property, over and above the exemption allowed, is subject to execution in the manner provided in the subsequent sections of that chapter. Sections 1245 to 1261 provide a plan whereby this excess may be subjected to sale on the execution where the homestead antedates the judgment. The levy on the property covered by the homestead declaration must be made as the first step in the proceeding to subject the excess to the payment of the judgment. Civ. Code, § 1245. We conclude that by this levy a lien is imposed on the property conditionally, to become absolute in the event that it is determined in the proceeding that an excess exists, and that a purchaser after the levy takes subject to the lien. The statement in Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 120, 24 Pac. 853, 21 Am. St. Rep. 26, that "a levy creates no lien," is qualified by the subsequent language of the opinion, and, when taken in connection with the facts involved, must be understood to mean that it does not create a lien that will continue after the lien of the judgment would have expired, nor a lien which can exist independent of proceedings under the Civil Code to enforce it.

The appellant contends that the proceeding was irregular because there was no time fixed for a hearing upon the report of the appraisers, and the order of sale was made without any notice other than the original notice of the time and place of hearing the petition. The Code does not require any notice or hearing after the report of the appraisers is filed. It seems to contemplate that the order for a sale, where the report is that the land cannot be divided, or for a partition, if it is divisible, is to be made by the court ex parte, from an inspection of the report alone. Section 1254 provides that "if, from the report, it appears to the judge that the land claimed exceeds in value the amount of the homestead exemption, and that it cannot be divided, he must make an order directing its sale under the execution." In the case at bar the court finds that the claimant is not the head of a family, and hence her right to a homestead is entirely of statutory creation, and is subject to the statutory conditions with respect to its sale on execution. As the statute does not require notice of the hearing of the report of appraisers, and the homestead exemption is purely a statutory right limited by statutory conditions, the courts cannot impose restrictions upon the right of the creditor to enforce a sale in addition to those imposed by statute. There can be no occasion for further orders of the court or judge in the matter in cases like the present, where the report is that the property cannot be divided. The value is finally determined by exposing the property to sale. If a bid is not made in excess of the amount of the exemption, the proceedings are ended. If a larger amount is offered, it conclusively proves that the value exceeds the exemption; and in that event the excess is of right applicable on the debt, and the claimant has no just cause to complain. His homestead exemption was from the beginning subject to the contingency which has happened, and his valuation of the property is, by the statute which gives him the exemption, made subject to revision by appraisers appointed upon the petition of a judgment debtor. It may be that where the report is that a division can be made, and the excess set off for sale, there should be further proceedings, hearings, and notices for the purpose of securing the right to a just division, as was held in Brown v. Starr, 75 Cal. 164, 16 Pac. 760. That, however, was a homestead of the head of a family. In any case, however, we perceive no good reason for holding that further notices must be given where the appraisers report that the property cannot be divided. Neither the court nor the judge is given power to revise or set aside the decision of the appraisers as to the possibility of making a fair division. The remarks in Stone v. McCann, 79 Cal. 462, 21 Pac. 863, with respect to further notice upon the hearing of the report of the appraisers, is merely a part of the argument upon another question, and the subject-matter of the notices was not before the court. It is not to be considered as authority, at least with regard to a homestead claim by one not the head of a family.

With respect to the delay of 16 months after the levy before the institution of the proceeding under the Civil Code to obtain a sale on execution in pursuance of the levy, it is sufficient to say that it does not establish the fact that the execution levy was abandoned. Part of the delay is explained by the pendency of a suit to enjoin the sale. If the defendant believed the subsequent delay unreasonable, and had good cause for such belief, she should have proceeded in the superior court by motion to have the levy vacated, and her grantee was entitled to the same remedy.

The order is affirmed.

GIVENS v. LEAN et al. (S. F. 3,029.)*

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by J. A. Givens against Walter J. Lean and others. From an order refusing to enjoin defendants from selling certain property under execution, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Jarman, for appellant. J. H. Russell and Chas. W. Davison, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of the court, refusing to enjoin the defendants from selling the property of the judgment defendant on execution in pursuance of an order in the case of Hoyt v. Stark, and it involves the same proceedings considered in the case of Lean v. Givens (S. F. 3,118, this day decided) 81 Pac. 128. Having reached the conclusion in that case that the proceedings involved in this case were in all respects regular, it follows that the order of the court appealed from in this case must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

146 Cal. 734

PEOPLE v. DELBOS. (Cr. 1,177.)

1. Larceny — Distinguished from False Pretenses.

Defendant undertook to buy a lodging house for prosecutrix, who had money in the hands of a trustee. Defendant, on learning of a house that could be bought for $90, made a bargain with the owner for the sale thereof to prosecutrix for $90, and then represented to prosecutrix that she had purchased the house for her for $500. Prosecutrix then said to defendant she would pay $400 down, and the balance in a few days, and requested the defendant to get $400 from the trustee of prosecutrix —at the same time sending instructions to the trustee to deliver it to the defendant—and the trustee delivered it accordingly. Defendant thereupon delivered to prosecutrix a bill of sale, which had previously been signed by the owner of the house, purporting to sell the property to prosecutrix, who thereafter paid the balance of the purchase money to the defendant. From the beginning, defendant's intention was to obtain the money from prosecutrix ostensibly to use in paying for the property, but really to convert all of it to her own use, except the $90. At the time prosecutrix delivered the money or caused it to be delivered to the defendant, she did not intend then to part with her property in the money to any one; her intention being that the defendant should receive the money from the trustee for her, carry it to the owner of the house to be purchased, and then pay it over on behalf of prosecutrix. Held, that defendant was guilty of larceny, and not of obtaining money by false pretenses.

2. Same—Cross-Examination.

The theory of the defense was that the defendant had purchased the lodging house, and paid the seller $90 for it with defendant's own money, intending, however, to sell it to prosecutrix for $500; and there was evidence tending to support the theory. Held, that where, on cross-examination, prosecutrix answered affirmatively the questions whether defendant told her that the seller wanted $500 for it, and whether it was because defendant told her that that witness turned over the money to defendant, the refusal to permit the witness to answer the further question, "You say now that you did not buy the lodging house from her?" was erroneous, as an undue restriction on cross-examination.

3. Same—Evidence—Admissibility.

The rejection of evidence tending to lay the foundation for proof that the case was instituted by prosecutrix to extort money from defendant was not erroneous, where the prosecutrix was not first asked the direct question whether she had not begun the prosecution for that purpose, though it would have been proper to show such fact to impeach her motives.

McFarland, Henshaw, and Van Dyke, JJ., dissenting in part.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. H. Dunne, Judge.

Angele Delbos was convicted of larceny, and she appeals. Reversed.

A. Ruef, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., R. C. Van Fleet, and Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of grand larceny, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

It is claimed that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence. We think the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict. The charge was that the defendant had on the 12th day of December, 1902, stolen from one Maria Marquet the sum of $400 in money. The particular claim is made that the evidence does not show a larceny of the money, but an obtaining of the money by false pretenses. There was legal evidence tending to show that the defendant and the prosecuting witness, Maria Marquet, were cousins by marriage, and somewhat intimate; that Maria Marquet wanted to buy a lodging house, and defendant undertook to buy one for her; that the defendant learned that one Stalford had a lodging house for sale, which could be bought for $90; that she made the bargain with Stalford for the sale thereof to Maria Marquet at that price, and then represented to Mrs. Marquet that she had purchased the lodging house for her (the prosecuting witness) for the sum of $500; that Mrs. Marquet then said to defendant that she would pay $400 down, and the balance in a few days, and requested the defendant to get the $400 from a Mrs. Janzi, who had that much money belonging to Mrs. Marquet, at the same time sending instructions to Mrs. Janzi to deliver the money to the defendant, which Mrs. Janzi accordingly did, and defendant thereupon delivered to Mrs. Marquet a bill of sale, which had been previously signed by Stalford, purporting to sell the property to Mrs. Marquet; and that Mrs. Marquet afterwards paid the balance of the purchase money to the defendant. The evidence indicated that Mrs. Delbos had, from the beginning of the transaction, intended to obtain the money from Mrs. Marquet, ostensibly to use in paying for the property sold by Stalford to Mrs. Marquet, but really to convert all of the same to her own use, except the $90 actually paid to Stalford. The distinction between larceny and false pretenses sometimes depends on a close analysis of facts and legal principles. It is stated in Harris on Crim. Law (3d Ed.) p. 194: "The most intelligible distinction between false pretenses and larceny has been thus set forth: 'In larceny, the owner of the thing has no intention to part with his property therein to the person taking it, although he may intend to part with the possession. In false pretenses, the owner does intend to part with his property in the money or chattel, but it is obtained from him by fraud.'" (The italics are our own.) The intention of the owner is described in somewhat different language in other authorities, but the meaning is the same. Thus Bishop says that: "If by fraud a person is induced to part with his goods, meaning to relinquish his property in them, as well as his possession," the person thus obtaining them is not guilty of larceny, but of false pretenses. 2 Crim. Law, § 808. And Clark says: "Where the owner of goods delivers possession, intending to part absolutely with the ownership, there can be no larceny." Clark's Crim. Law. McClain says of this class of cases, where the crime is held to be larceny: "The title remains in the owner, and the subsequent conversion and the original intent to deprive the owner of his property supply the necessary elements of larceny." 1 McClain's Crim. Law, § 562. These authors are here speaking of the intention of the owner with respect to the relation which the person then receiving the goods shall bear to them; that is, the owner's intention as to the effect which the delivery of the possession to the defendant shall have on the title. If such delivery is intended to transfer the title absolutely, there is no larceny, for the goods are then no longer his property, and a subsequent theft of them would be a theft of the goods of the person to whom title was thus transferred; and furthermore the defendant would then be invested with the title himself, and could not be guilty of stealing that which is his own. In the case at bar, at the time Mrs. Marquet delivered the money, or caused it to be delivered, to the defendant, she did not intend then to part with her property in the money to any one. Her intention was that the defendant should receive the money from Mrs. Janzi for her, carry it to Mr. Stalford, the seller, and then pay it to Mr. Stalford on behalf of Mrs. Marquet. If this had been done as intended, the money would have remained in law the property of Mrs. Marquet until its final delivery to Mr. Stalford in payment of Mrs. Marquet's debt on the purchase price of the house. The title thus remaining in Mrs. Marquet, it was subject to larceny as of her property, and the fraudulent appropriation by the defendant to her own use—she having had the intention from the beginning to obtain it for that purpose—constituted, in law, an act of larceny. The distinction has been frequently made by the decisions in this state. People v. Abbott, 53 Cal. 284, 31 Am. Rep. 59; People v. Raschke, 73 Cal. 382, 15 Pac. 13; People v. Rae, 66 Cal. 425, 6 Pac. 1, 56 Am. Rep. 102; People v. De Graaff, 127 Cal. 676, 60 Pac. 429. In People v. Rae the distinction is thus stated: "Where, by means of fraud, conspiracy, or artifice, possession of the property is obtained with felonious intent, and the title still remains in the owner, larceny is established, while the crime is false pretenses if the title, as well as the possession, is absolutely parted with. The evidence was sufficient in this respect to justify the verdict."

It is further to be observed in this connection, in consequence of another point presented in the case, that if the defendant had herself some property interest in the goods sold, and had, by means of criminally false and fraudulent pretenses, made the sale of that interest to Mrs. Marquet for an extravagant price, and thereupon Mrs. Marquet had delivered the money to Mrs. Delbos, not to be carried to the original seller, Mr. Stalford, but to pay upon the price of the sale direct from the defendant to Mrs. Marquet, the crime might have been that of obtaining money by false pretenses, but it would not have constituted larceny, because in that case there would have been an intention on the part of Mrs. Marquet to transfer the title to her money directly to the defendant upon the delivery thereof to the defendant by Mrs. Janzi. The money in that case would not have remained the property of the prosecuting witness after its delivery to the defendant.

This leads us to the consideration of a ruling of the court on the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness, which we think was error. The theory of the defense was that the defendant had purchased the property from Stalford, and paid for it with her own money, intending, however, to sell it again to Mrs. Marquet, the prosecuting witness; that, in pursuance of that intention, she caused the bill of sale to be made out direct from Stalford to Mrs. Marquet; that thereupon she made the sale to Mrs. Marquet, received the $400 as part payment, and delivered the bill of sale. The testimony of the defendant and some corroborating evidence was in harmony with this theory. While the prosecuting witness was on the stand, testifying for the people, after having detailed the transaction, and stating that the defendant purchased the property from Stalford for her (the prosecuting witness), upon cross-examination the following occurred: "Q. You say that Mrs. Delbos told you that Stalford wanted five hundred dollars for this place? A. Yes, sir. Q. And it was because she told you that that you turned over this money to her? Is that right? A. Yes. Q. You say now that you did not buy the lodging house from her?" This latter question was objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and the objection was sustained, to which defendant excepted. In view of the theory of the defendant, and the testimony in support thereof, and the principle of law to which we have adverted, we think this ruling of the court was erroneous. It tended to elicit from the prosecuting witness a direct statement whether or not she had in fact bought the lodging house from the defendant, instead of from Mr. Stalford. If she had answered that she had done so, the result, as we have seen, would be that the taking of the money would not be larceny. This was the crucial point in the case, and the court should have allowed greater latitude in the cross-examination concerning it.

There were other exceptions to the refusal of some evidence tending to lay the foundation for proof that the prosecution was instituted by the prosecuting witness for the purpose of extorting money from the defendant. It was proper to show this fact to impeach the motives of the prosecuting witness, but the questions asked should have been preceded by a direct question. The prosecuting witness should have been first asked if she had not begun the prosecution for that purpose. The ruling was technically correct.

The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; LORIGAN, J.

McFARLAND, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment reversing the order and judgment appealed from. I also concur in that part of the opinion of Mr. Justice SHAW which holds that the court below erred in sustaining an objection to the question asked by appellant of the prosecuting witness—if she had bought the lodging house of appellant. But in my opinion, all the evidence in the case, taken together—as to matters occurring both before and after the delivery of the $400 to appellant—shows that when the money was given to appellant the title to the same passed, and was intended by the prosecuting witness to pass, without any expectation of getting it back, and that, therefore, under the law as both parties assert it to be, the appellant, whether or not she was guilty of any other crime, was not guilty of larceny.

EARL v. BOWEN et al. (L. A. 1,663.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CONTRACTS — EXECUTION—ORDINANCES—ORDERS.

St. 1889, p. 458, c. 1, art. 1, § 2, par. 24, provides that the city of Los Angeles shall have certain enumerated powers, which shall be exercised by ordinance, except "as hereinafter provided." Paragraph 23 declares that the city may exercise all necessary municipal powers, except such powers as are forbidden or controlled by general law. Article 3, § 12, p. 462, provides that all legislative powers shall be vested in the council, subject to the power of veto and approval by the mayor, and shall be exercised by ordinance, and that other action of the council may be by order on motion. Article 3, § 16, p. 462, provides that six members of the council shall constitute a quorum, but no ordinance shall be passed or other act done making any contract, etc., involving the payment of money, except by vote of two-thirds of the members of the whole council, but that all other ordinances may be passed by a majority vote. Held, that the making of a contract for city advertising was not an exercise of legislative power, but an administrative act, which the council might perform by order instead of by ordinance.

2. SAME—EXECUTION OF CONTRACT.

St. 1889, p. 506, c. 1, art. 20, § 207, declares that the city of Los Angeles shall not be bound by any contract, "unless the same is made in writing by order of the council, the draft thereof approved by the council, and the same ordered to be, and be, signed by the mayor, or some other person authorized thereto in behalf of the city: provided that the approval of contracts by the city attorney, as required by" article 4, § 49, shall be indorsed thereon before the council shall have power to approve the same. Held, that the fact that the city clerk was ordered to sign a contract for public printing by the city before the contract was prepared, and in fact signed the draft before it was approved by the council, did not invalidate the same; the approval by the council, with the clerk's signature attached, being equivalent to the council's approval of the contract before the clerk signed.

3. SAME—AUTHORITY OF CLERK.

Under St. 1889, p. 506, c. 1, art. 20, § 207, providing that the city of Los Angeles shall not be bound by any contract, "unless made in writing by order of the council, the draft thereof approved by the council, and the same ordered to be, and be, signed by the mayor, or some other person authorized thereto in behalf of the city," the council had authority to direct a contract for public printing to be signed by the city clerk.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Bill by Edwin T. Earl against M. W. Bowen and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson and Sheldon Borden, for appellant. W. B. Matthews, City Atty., Herbert J. Goudge, Asst. City Atty., and Hunsaker & Britt, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to restrain the defendant officers of the city of Los Angeles from giving out public printing and advertising to defendant, the Times-Mirror Company, under a contract between that company and the city. Demurrers to the complaint were interposed for insufficiency of facts, and because of uncertainty and ambiguity in the complaint, and that plaintiff has not legal capacity to bring the action. The demurrers were sustained; and, plaintiff declining to amend, judgment passed for defendants, from which plaintiff appeals.

Briefly stated, the complaint shows: That prior to May 31, 1904, the city council, without passing any ordinance on the subject, secured bids from various newspapers for the city printing for the year commencing June 8, 1904, and received, among others, a bid from the Times-Mirror Company. On May 31, 1904, the council duly and regularly adopted the following resolution, two-thirds of the council voting therefor: "Mr. Davenport moves that the bid of the Times-Mirror Company at sixty cents per inch for publishing the city advertising be accepted, and the city attorney be instructed to prepare and present the necessary contract and bond with the said Times-Mirror Company, and that the city clerk be instructed to sign the same for and on behalf of the city." The city attorney prepared the draft of the contract involved, without further action of the council, and on June 6, 1904, "indorsed thereon in writing his approval of said draft as to form," and thereafter, on the same day, the city clerk signed the contract as follows, "City of Los Angeles, by H. J. Lelande, City Clerk," and the Times-Mirror Company also signed it; and thereafter on the same day the city attorney presented the contract and bond to the council, and by a vote of six of its members the council approved the bond and contract. No further action was taken by the council or by the clerk or by any other officer of the city with reference to the execution of the contract. It was further alleged that city printing has been given out under this contract, and will, unless an injunction issues, continue to be given out, thus creating pretended claims against the city, resulting in a misappropriation of public moneys or necessitating expense and multiplicity of action to defend against them, all to the irreparable injury of plaintiff and the other taxpayers of the city. The only points discussed in the briefs arise on the general demurrer. Questions arising on other grounds of the demurrer are therefore deemed waived.

Plaintiff's contention is that the contract is invalid: (1) Because all powers conferred by its charter upon the city must, in the absence of an express exception, be exercised by ordinance. (2) Because, by the express terms of the charter, all "legislative power of the city," must be exercised by ordinance, and the power to make a contract of this character is a legislative power. (3) Because the charter prescribes certain formalities in the mode of executing a contract after it has been properly authorized by ordinance. That these formalities are mandatory, and no contract is binding unless they are observed, which was not done in this instance. (4) Because the city clerk has no authority and is not authorized to sign a contract on behalf of the city, and the council has no power to authorize or order him to do so, and, if the council could so authorize him, it can only be done by ordinance.

Defendants' position is: (1) That in awarding the contract the council acted in its business or administrative capacity, and not in the exercise of its legislative or governmental powers. (2) That no rule of law, independent of statutory or charter provisions, requires authority to enter into a contract on behalf of a municipality to be conferred by ordinance. (3) That the charter of the city expressly authorizes the council to contract by order. (4) That the mayor is not a component part of the council when exercising the contracting power of the city, and has no power to veto the action of the council relating to contracts. (5) That all formalities required by the charter were observed. (6) That the council had authority to order the clerk to sign the contract on behalf of the city, and no ordinance was required for that purpose. (7) That the facts stated in the complaint are insufficient to entitle plaintiff to injunctive relief.

It is not disputed that the mode of contracting prescribed by the city's charter is the measure of the city's power to contract. The case seems to turn largely upon the question whether the initial steps in the mode prescribed must be taken by ordinance, or may be taken by order of the council. Section 2, par. 24, art. 1 (St. 1889, p. 458, c. 1), provides that the corporation shall have certain enumerated powers, which "shall be exercised by ordinance, except as hereinafter provided." None of these enumerated powers bears directly upon the making of contracts, unless it be paragraph 23, relied on in part by appellant, which declares that the city may exercise all municipal powers "necessary to the complete and efficient management and control of the municipal property and for the efficient administration of the municipal government, * * * except such powers as are forbidden or are controlled by general law." In the enumeration of powers and duties of the council, it is provided by section 12, art. 3, p. 462, that "all legislative power of the city is vested in the council, subject to the power of veto and approval by the mayor, as hereinafter given, and shall be exercised by ordinance; other action of the council may be by order upon motion." An ordinance becomes operative without the mayor's approval unless he returns it to the council with his objections in writing within 10 days after it shall have been presented to him; otherwise his approval is necessary. If he disapproves, he must return it with his objections, and it does not become operative unless passed by three-fourths vote where a two-thirds vote is required to pass the ordinance in the first instance, and in all other cases by a vote of two-thirds. Section 37, art. 3, p. 465. The mayor's veto power does not extend beyond ordinances. Section 16, art. 3, p. 462, is as follows: "Six members of the council shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but no ordinance shall be passed or other act done granting a franchise, making any contract, auditing any bill, ordering any work to be done or supplies to be furnished, disposing of or leasing the city property, or doing any assessment or street improvement, or building sewers, or any other act to be done involving the paying of money, or the incurring of debt by the city, unless two-thirds of the members of the whole council vote in favor thereof. All other ordinances may be passed by a vote of a majority of the whole council." Nine members compose the council. Article 2, § 3, p. 458. Section 20, art. 3, p. 462, is as follows: "The meetings of the council shall be public, and a journal of its proceedings shall be kept by the clerk under its direction, and the ayes and noes shall be taken and entered in the journal in the final action upon the granting of franchises, making of contracts, auditing bills, ordering work to be done, or supplies furnished, disposing of or leasing city property, the passage of any ordinance, the ordering of assessments for street improvements, or building of sewers, or upon any act that may involve the payment of money, or the incurring of debt by the city, and upon the payment of the salaries of municipal officers, and in all other cases upon the call of any other member." Section 207, art. 20, p. 506, entitled "Contracts," is as follows: "The city of Los Angeles shall not be and is not bound by any contract, or in any way liable thereon, unless the same is made in writing by order of the council, the draft thereof approved by the council, and the same ordered to be, and be, signed by the mayor, or some other person authorized thereto in behalf of the city: provided that the approval of contracts by the city attorney, as required by the provisions of art. IV of this charter [section 49, p. 472], shall be endorsed on the draft thereof before the council shall have the power to approve the same; but the council, by an ordinance, may authorize any officer, committee or agent of the city to bind the city without a contract in writing for the payment of any sum of money, not exceeding three hundred dollars." The provision in section 49, art. 4, referred to last above, is that the city attorney "shall approve in writing the drafts of all contracts before the same are entered into on behalf of the city."

The foregoing are the only provisions of the charter pointed out by appellant as having direct reference to contracts. In addition thereto, and as showing the care with which the payment of "claims and demands" is safeguarded, reference is made to article 21 (St. 1889, p. 506, c. 1), from which it will be seen that all claims and demands against the city, except certain claims not now involved, must take a prescribed course before they can be paid. They must not only be approved by the council, but must then go to the mayor for approval or disapproval, which latter action, if taken, may be overruled by a two-thirds vote of the council. Provision is also made by which the auditor has certain supervisory power, and his adverse action may be overruled by the council, as in the case of the mayor. These provisions are instanced by appellant to show a carefully devised procedure to protect the city against improper expenditure, which it is claimed "becomes a mere farce if the six councilmen necessary to approve the claims, in the first instance, and to overrule the objections of the mayor or auditor in case of rejection by either of these officials, have absolute * * * power, subject to no check, * * * to make the contracts on behalf of the city under which the great bulk of the money for claims and demands will be paid out." We cannot see that this feature of the charter throws any light upon the question. The provisions just referred to would apply equally to a claim or demand based upon an ordinance. Under the provisions of section 16, art. 3, supra, the council can do no act "involving the paying of money, or the incurring of debt by the city, unless two-thirds of the members of the whole council vote in favor thereof." The charter makers may have regarded this as sufficient security against improvidence in expenditures. However this may be, we must take the charter as we find it, and construe its provisions as they have been enacted. Electric L. & P. Co. v. City of San Bernardino, 100 Cal. 348, 34 Pac. 819.

The charter does not attempt to define what acts are intended to be embraced by the terms "legislative power," nor does it define the meaning of the term "order" as used in the charter. We may look to the nature or character of the act to be performed to determine whether it should be classified as legislative or as administrative, and we may also look to all of the charter provisions to see whether the intention of its makers was to include the making of contracts, such as we have here, among the powers to be exercised by order. A particular act might very properly be regarded as legislative in its character, and yet the charter might authorize its exercise by order or resolution by a specific provision to that end.

It is noticeable that, in the 38 sections prescribing the powers and duties of the council, in nearly every instance where a power is given it is expressly required to be exercised by ordinance, but in no instance is it expressly stated that contracts entered into or other acts done by the council involving the paying of money shall be authorized by ordinance. The limitation put upon the council by section 16, art. 3, is that no ordinance shall be passed, except by a two-thirds vote, "or other act done granting a franchise, making any contract, auditing any bill," etc. (enumerating many other acts), "unless two-thirds of the members of the whole council vote in favor thereof." It cannot be reasonably claimed that this section requires the "making any contract" to be authorized by ordinance, any more than it requires the "auditing any claim" to be so authorized, and certainly it will not be contended that the auditing of a claim must be by ordinance. Looking to section 20, art. 3, we find "making of contracts" included among the other acts mentioned in section 16, and associated with these is "the passage of any ordinance." No inference can be drawn from these sections that contracts must be authorized by ordinance. Section 37 (page 465) of this article gives the veto power to the mayor only as to ordinances. In matters involving the payment of claims, as we have seen, his power is to approve or disapprove when sent to him. But no implication follows that contracts must be authorized by ordinance, or that the veto power should extend to them. Jacobs v. Board of Supervisors, 100 Cal. 121, 34 Pac. 630. Section 12 of this article, above quoted, vests all "legislative power" in the council, subject to be vetoed by the mayor, and "shall be exercised by ordinance," and it is provided that "other action of the council may be by order upon motion." We do not think that the making of a contract such as the one here is the exercise of "legislative power," in its true sense, as used in the charter.

The distinction between the power of a municipal corporation to contract and the power to legislate, considered apart from any express or implied provision of the charter, is well recognized. The council acts in a double character—in a public and political character, exercising subordinate legislative powers, and in its private character, exercising the powers of an individual or private corporation. S. F. Gas Co. v. City of S. F., 9 Cal. 453, in which case it was said that "the purchase of gas involves only the exercise of a power of a private corporation. It requires the exercise of no political power." So, also, in contracting for water supply, as held in Ill. Trust & Sav. Bank v. City of Arkansas, 76 Fed. 271, 282, 22 C. C. A. 171, 34 L. R. A. 518. Held, also, in Kramrath v. City of Albany, 127 N. Y. 575, 580, 28 N. E. 400, that the leasing or furnishing of a room for the transaction of the city's affairs is a mere business act, and may be delegated to agents or committees, which, it may be remarked, could not be done if purely legislative in its character. See, also, Ukiah v. Ukiah W. & I. Co., 142 Cal. 173, 179, 75 Pac. 773, 64 L. R. A. 231, 100 Am. St. Rep. 107; Seward v. Town of Liberty Bank, 142 Ind. 551, 552, 42 N. E. 39; Town of Gosport v. Pritchard, 156 Ind. 400, 404, 59 N. E. 1058; 1 Dillon on Mun. Corps. (4th Ed.) § 66. We do not think Mr. Justice McKee, in Los Angeles Gas Co. v. Toberman, 61 Cal. 199, relied on by appellant, intended to intimate that the distinction above pointed out does not exist, when he spoke of the making of a contract for lighting the streets of Los Angeles as having reference to the legislative power of the council under the charter of 1877 (St. 1877–78, pp. 675, 678, c. 440). The point decided did not turn upon the question we are now considering.

Appellant says in his brief: "The making of a contract may not be, and probably is not, under the authorities, a governmental or legislative function; but a wholly different principle is involved in, and should be applied to, the execution of contracts necessary, and only necessary, 'for the efficient administration of the municipal government.'" Counsel here has reference to subdivision 23, § 2, art. 1 (St. 1889, p. 458, c. 1), supra. This section enumerates the subjects over which the corporation has power, but in none of the subdivisions is the making of contracts mentioned. Subdivision 23 would seem to be little, if anything, more than a statement that the corporation has power to do what would be implied if the statement had not been made. Subdivision 24 declares that all the powers conferred by the article "shall be exercised by ordinance, except as hereinafter provided." To give subdivision 23 the all-embracing interpretation contended for would make an ordinance necessary to the validity of almost every administrative act of the council. The argument proves too much. But if the making of a contract is the exercise of the "municipal powers necessary * * * for the efficient administration of the municipal government," as is urged, it is to be "exercised by ordinance except as hereinafter provided." Subdivision 24. And this brings us to notice article 20, § 207, supra. If this section has the meaning contended for by respondent, the provisions of article 1 and subsequent provisions referred to in article 3 must give way to it. The section stands alone, as article 20 and its provisions relate to a particular subject, namely, the making of contracts, and, we think, "must govern in respect to that subject as against general provisions in other parts of the statute, although the latter, standing alone, would be broad enough to include the subject to which the particular provisions relate." Endlich on Interpretation of Statutes, p. 288, cited in Frandzen v. San Diego, 101 Cal. 317, 35 Pac. 897; State ex rel. Lutfring v. Gœtze, 22 Wis. 363; Healy v. Superior Court, 127 Cal. 659, 60 Pac. 428. Appellant contends that there is neither an express nor an implied exception in section 207 to the requirement of section 2, subd. 24, that all powers of the municipality "shall be exercised by ordinance"; that, on the contrary, it is perfectly consistent with that provision, and "merely provides a mode for exemplifying contracts after they have been duly authorized by ordinance." We cannot so restrict the meaning of the section. If the making of the contract in question was essentially a "legislative" act, and therefore to be exercised by ordinance, there might be force in the suggestion that section 207 merely provides a mode or means of exemplifying the contract. But as we cannot regard the making of the contract to be purely a legislative act, and as there cannot be found in any previous provision of the charter either an express or implied direction that contracts must be authorized by ordinance, we are of the opinion that section 207 plainly authorizes the council, by order, to enter into the contract. In saying that the city "shall not be, and is not, bound by any contract * * * unless the same is made in writing by order of the council," etc., it was equivalent to saying that it could be bound by order, subject, of course, to the observance of the provisions of the section. The last paragraph of the section gives support to this construction, for it says: "But the council, by an ordinance, may authorize any officer, committee, or agent of the city to bind the city without a contract in writing for the payment of any sum of money not exceeding three hundred dollars." In the particular now being considered the provisions of section 207 are the same as section 1, article 12, of the charter of 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 675, c. 440), cited by appellant on another point, next to be noticed.

Appellant contends that the order in which the acts prescribed by section 207 are to be done is material, and that because the clerk was ordered to sign the contract before it was prepared, and signed it before the draft was approved by the council, the contract is invalid. Citing Frick v. Los Angeles, 115 Cal. 512, 47 Pac. 250, and Times Pub. Co. v. Weatherby, 139 Cal. 618, 73 Pac. 465. In the Frick Case, section 207 was before the court, but the point decided was that because the mayor, who was directed to sign the contract, did not do so, the section was violated. In the other case a similar section (167, art. 13, c. 5, p. 398, St. 1895) in the charter of the city of Eureka was involved, but there the council did nothing but invite proposals and accept the bids. There was no compliance with the charter provision. In the present case the contract was prepared by the city attorney, and his approval was indorsed thereon. It was then signed by the Times-Mirror Company and by the clerk of the city. It was then presented to the council, and was approved by it. All these acts were done on the same day (June 6, 1904). In Goodyear Rubber Co. v. Eureka, 135 Cal. 613, 67 Pac. 1043, the court said: "It is immaterial whether the city attorney's approval was before or after the mayor had signed the contract." Appellant replies that the Eureka charter differed from the Los Angeles charter in this: that the Los Angeles charter provides that the city attorney's approval shall be indorsed on the contract "before the council shall have power to approve." This provision was complied with in the present case. But the Eureka Case applies, since the order in which the city attorney was to approve was the same as the order in which the clerk here was to sign. However this may be, we think, when the council approved the contract with the clerk's signature attached for the city, it was in every essential equivalent to approving it before the clerk signed. The essential thing to be done was the preparation and indorsement of the draft by the city attorney, and its approval by the council. Whether the clerk signed for the city before or after the approval of the council was of no material consequence. The only requirement of the charter as to the order in which the contract is to be signed is that the city attorney's approval as to form must be indorsed on the contract before the council can approve. Estate of Johnson, 98 Cal. 531, 33 Pac. 460, 21 L. R. A. 380; Derby v. City of Modesto, 104 Cal. 515, 38 Pac. 900. But it is more seriously argued that the clerk had no authority to sign the contract, because he is not a person authorized to sign contracts for the city, and the council had no authority to order him to do so, except by ordinance. This contention is also based on the claim that the words "authorized thereto" introduce a vitally different feature from the provision in the old charter which did not contain those words. As to the point that it is not one of the duties of the clerk to sign contracts, the same may be said of the mayor, and the argument would result in showing that the council has no power to cause a contract to be executed. The signing of the contract by the clerk was but a ministerial act, involving the exercise of no discretionary power, and could be delegated. 1 Dillon's Mun. Corp. § 96; Hitchcock v. Galveston, 96 U. S. 341, 24 L. Ed. 659. In Los Angeles Gas Co. v. Toberman, supra, it was said: "As the signature of contracts in writing is no part of the duties of the mayor, authority to sign comes from the council; and when that body, by its order, directed its clerk to sign the contract under consideration, and he signed it, it was well executed, and, if otherwise made according to the charter, it is valid and binding on the city." The order designating the clerk to sign the contract was also his authority for signing it. We cannot agree with appellant that the addition to the old charter of the words "authorized thereto," embraced in the new charter, has introduced a vital difference, and must necessarily mean previously "authorized thereto" by some general law or by the provisions of the charter. We think that, taking the section (207) in its entirety, and remembering that the act to be performed was but ministerial, and that the charter nowhere authorizes any officer to sign contracts for the city, and does authorize the council to designate the mayor or some other person, it would be an unwarranted construction to adopt appellant's meaning of the section. If by the charter the mayor was authorized to sign contracts, there might be force in the argument that "some other person authorized thereto" should also be some person having similar or previous authority. But this some other person may be some other person than an officer of the city, in which case it would be unreasonable to hold that the council should first pass an ordinance conferring the authority, and thereafter make the order directing him to sign. The natural and obvious construction, it seems to us, is that the order directing the clerk to sign for the city carries with it his authority.
